The Scottish Unitarian Christian Association, which was formed some seventeen years since, is the medium of your grant to the second church in Glasgow, and to the church at Paisley. It contributes also to the ministry at Aberdeen. The labours of the Rev. H. Williamson have been specially devoted, according to the wishes of your committee, to the strengthening of the congregation in Dundee, and preparing it to become self-supporting. With this view they have resolved to do all they can towards relieving their funds from the burden of a ground-rent of £35. There is some hope that the congregation at Dunfermline may be gathered once more in re-union with the Universalist congregation, through the services of Mrs. Soule, who is now in this country as the representative of the American Universalist Society. The congregation at Perth, under the Rev. A. Webster, to which you have given large support, has kept fairly together; but the liberal movement in Scotland, though it tends in the direction of Unitarian principles, does not apparently incline to their avowal and support in Unitarian organisations. Mr. Webster has lectured, with help from your Association, at Kirkcaldy, Forfar, and Crieff. The Belfast Unitarian Missionary Association is of recent origin. It supports with your aid a missionary whose work is divided between the Hopeton-street Mission in Belfast, and the congregation at Carrickfergus. A grant has also been made through this society to the congregation at Ballymena. To the Mountpottinger congregation your grant has been continued only at the lower rate of the second half of last year; not from diminished interest in their prosperity, but, as in some other cases, from the strong impression of your committee that your grants should lead to increasing self-help, and not be continued to the same amount from year to year without special reasons. The South Wales Unitarian Society is understood to be chiefly occupied in the circulation of Welsh tracts; it has not sought aid for any missionary work. The Association has, however, given some help for services at Onenawr, at Penrhiw and Panteg, and at Carmarthen. At Llwynrhydown, during the absence of the Rev. W. Thomas, whose health had been seriously affected by the strains and excitement of the eviction of his congregation from their old place of meeting, the services were maintained by aid from your Association. The committee learn with regret that Mr. Thomas, from continued weakness, has been compelled to give up an important part of his resources in order to carry on the laborious services in which he is engaged. His people are united and earnest, but few amongst the Welsh congregations are in possession of large means, and they have to struggle against great difficulties. The new church building at Llwynrhydown is now begun, and it would be a great encouragement to them if the whole sum which it will cost could be subscribed for before the church is opened.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

With the Liberal Societies and churches abroad your committee maintain friendly correspondence, but they have not been in a position to send representatives to their annual meetings. From France they welcome an honoured visitor, one of the ministers of the "Reformed Church," M. Auguste Dide. They trust that his presence in England may facilitate the arrangement of services in English during the summer in Paris, for which the use of the Salle Saint-Andre has been kindly offered to the British and the American Associations.

Holland and Germany.—In reply to requests addressed to the Protestant Unions of Holland and Germany to send representatives to this meeting, the committee have received most cordial letters, though circumstances do not favour their acceptance of the invitations. Your committee had the pleasure of sending a message of fraternal encouragement to the recent meeting of liberal Protestants at Basle.

Hungary.—The communications received from Bishop Frenez give assurance of the grateful sense which is entertained in Hungary of your liberality in enabling the young minister who has been sent to England by the Consistory to enjoy the advantages of study allowed him by the committee of the Manchester New College. Mr. Baros is no longer a stranger to the Unitarians of London, but our esteemed and welcome guest and friend.

Milan.—The committee refer with sincere respect to the persevering work of Signor Bracciforti, who continues his Sunday services at Milan, though under great discouragements.

Iceland.—The committee acknowledge also the services of the Rev. M. Jochumsson at Reykjavik, which your Association has liberally supported for the last two years.

Neither in Milan nor in Reykjavik does there appear the least disposition in the hearers who come together to form a regular congregation, or to contribute towards the support of the worship; and your committee, while very desirous to favour any private help that may be given to the respected gentlemen who are labouring in these places, have not felt that the Association could properly be asked to make large permanent grants for their support, with so little hope in either case of the ultimate building up of Unitarian congregations.

America.—The committee congratulate the American Unitarian Association on the happy accomplishment of their purpose to erect a church in Washington by means of contributions gathered from all parts of the United States. The building, which seats 800 persons and cost £13,000, was opened for worship on the 29th January, entirely free from debt. Little occasion has arisen during the past year for more than the usual friendly correspondence and interchange of publications with our American brethren. The committee have been pleased to add to your catalogue a number of valuable works which have been received from America during the past year. The expected visit of the Rev. Robert Collyer to this country will be cordially welcomed.

Australia.—Unitarian services at Sydney are about to be resumed after a suspension of several years. The efforts that were commenced some time since to gather the scattered congregations for united worship have been so far successful that an earnest request was made in the beginning of the year for a minister to be sent from England. The Rev. J. H. Smith, late of Dewsbury, has undertaken this responsible duty, and leaves for Sydney in a few days, with the best wishes of his many friends in this country for the success of his arduous work. The congregation at Adelaide continues happily prosperous under the ministry of the Rev. J. G. Woods. The Association will gladly welcome a representative of this congregation in Mr. William Kay, recently a member of the Legislature of South Australia, who has been for many years one of its most faithful and active supporters.

Madras.—The Rev. William Roberts continues his services with some help from your Association. Some useful work appears to be done by him amongst the lower class of natives, though the congregation in the little chapel at Madras is small. The committee note with pleasure that during the famine of last year Mr. Roberts received valuable assistance from benevolent friends in this country.

BOOK AND TRACT DEPARTMENT.

Considering the pecuniary position of the Association and the importance of maintaining unimpaired as far as possible its missionary agencies, the committee have felt that the room left for publishing enterprise during the past year was limited. In fulfilment, however, of prior engagements, they ordered to be printed "Conscience and Faith," five discourses by the late Athanase Coquerel, translated by Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A.; and

Dr. Reville's "History of the Dogma of the Deity of Christ," translated anew by Miss Swaine, from the revised and enlarged edition of 1876. Both these works are alike valuable and interesting. The former is now on sale, the latter will be issued very shortly. To complete the series of publications which was authorised by the Council of the previous year, it was intended to print an English edition of Mr. Alger's work on the "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," a revision of which had been promised for that purpose by the author. But the new edition of the work having recently appeared in America, it was resolved at the late meeting of the Council to communicate with the publishers, with the author's consent, in order to obtain copies in sufficient number to enable the work to be sold here at as cheap a rate as possible. A letter has since been received from the author making a similar suggestion, so that the work will probably be ere long within easier reach of English readers. The work by the Rev. Edward Higginson on "Christ Imitable, or the Religious Value of his Simple Humanity," being still in demand, it has been reprinted, the author having kindly revised it for the purpose, and it is now on sale in the rooms. The committee note with satisfaction the immense variety of publications in which the orthodox dogmas are ignored, or directly opposed and set aside. In journals and periodicals, as well as in more elaborate books, the work is being effectually done which was formerly confined within the range of Unitarian literature. There is the less need, therefore, for great regret at the limitation of our means for publishing professedly Unitarian works, which could not in any case reach the large and varied circles of readers that are now becoming increasingly familiar with liberal religious thought. Grants of books have been made to nine ministers in aid of their studies, as well as to a few other applicants. The total number so given was 134. Tracts have been sent free of expense during the past year, chiefly for distribution at the delivery of lectures, wherever they have been applied for, those who desired them generally indicating the particular tracts needed. The total number thus granted has been more than 22,000.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

In their report of last year the committee referred to the state of the Burial Laws as injuriously affecting the rights of many Unitarian Dissenters throughout the country; and a resolution was passed at the annual meeting authorising the executive to take such action upon the subject of the Government Bill then before the Legislature as should appear desirable. A petition was accordingly presented to the House of Commons on the 29th of May by Mr. Osborne Morgan, signed by the president in the name of the Association, which stated the various grounds of objection to the proposed measure of the Government. The measure was withdrawn in consequence of the vote in the House of Lords in favour of Lord Harrowby's amendment, admitting the free right of interment in the parochial churchyards to which the Dissenters lay claim. No further step towards legislation upon the subject has been taken in the present session of Parliament, but a resolution proposed by Mr. Osborne Morgan in the House of Commons was defeated by so small a majority that the hope was further strengthened that an equitable adjustment of the question could not be long delayed. In commemoration of the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, oppressive enactments which for more than a century and a half had excluded conscientious Dissenters from the enjoyment of important civil rights in connection with the discharge of their duties as citizens, and which were removed from the statute-book on the 8th of May, 1828, your committee cordially united with the body of Dissenting Deputies in presenting an address to the late Earl Russell, through whose exertions in a great degree the repeal was effected. The commemoration will be continued by a public assembly on the 18th of June, the fiftieth anniversary of the day on which a similar gathering was held immediately after the passing of the bill.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The report then referred to the great meeting in the Free-trade Hall, Manchester, and then continued, the committee have had the pleasure of acknowledging the gift of books, photographs, and portraits for the rooms, from the Rev. R. R. Shippen, secretary of the American Association, and others. The proceeds of the Bicentenary Fund, amounting to £35. 10s., were given last year to five ministers. Of the total amount of the Jubilee Fund promised for the next two years, there will be a balance of about £600 still to be expended. The following legacies have been received during the year: from the executors of the late Mr. J. H. Nelson, of Slough, £524. 1s. 1d.; Miss Widdowson, of York, £180; Miss Tingcombe, of Bath, £200; and further payments on account of the Samuel Taylor Legacy, amounting to £899. 7s. 2d.; making a total of £1,803. 8s. 3d.

Special donations also have been made to the Association as follows:—Mr. S. W. Browne, £20; Mr. Joshua Buckton, £29; Mr. T. Colfox, £20; Mr. J. Troup, £25; Mr. R. N. Phillips, M.P., £25; Mr. T. Wrigley, £25; Mr. Joseph Lupton, £50; and Mr. C. Cochrane, £50. The committee closed their report by recording with regret the decease of old and attached friends of the Association, and by expressing a hope that the loss the Association had thereby sustained might, by the devotion and zeal of their survivors, be repaired.

The CHAIRMAN then moved, "That the report of the committee and treasurer be received and adopted, and printed for circulation." It was well, he thought, that the annual report should close with a tribute to the memory of those who had been taken from their midst. There were few among them who could not but feel that the obituary portion of the report was the most impressive part of the committee's remarks. Among the names mentioned there were many dear to himself, and he would advise those who felt with him to take encouragement from the exhortation with which the report closed—that each and every member of the Association should endeavour to carry on the work entrusted to their hands with renewed heart and increased activity so as to supply if possible the losses the Association had sustained. (Hear, hear.) The report now presented was an extremely interesting one, and would bear comparison with any previous account of the Association's work. It was replete with valuable and important information concerning their affairs; in fact it was an epitomised record of a great ideal of actual practical work. The contrast it presented between the position of the Association at the present time and former years was very great indeed. The annual subscriptions 20 years since did not amount to £100, while the subscriptions and donations together now stood at £1,640 for the past year. Not the least important feature of the report was the account it gave of the position the Association was now taking in the provinces. The Manchester meeting was an illustration of the manner in which the Association was regarded by those who worked with and for it in the more distant parts of the country. This, the largest meeting of Unitarians ever held in Manchester, or, he believed elsewhere, had been solely arranged through the activity of local associations. The great Free-trade Hall had been filled with a most attentive and interested audience, and they who had had the honour of representing the Association at that gathering had felt exceedingly encouraged by what they had seen and heard, to attempt similar movements in other towns. (Applause.)

The Rev. A. PAYNE seconded the resolution, with a deep sense of gratitude for the constant and very valuable help which the Association had rendered to the mission work of the country.

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

Mr. HOPGOOD moved that Mr. Henry S. Bicknell be requested to accept the office of president for the ensuing year, and in doing so testified to the high qualities of that gentleman. If he were elected he would be pre-eminently the right man in the right place.

Mr. R. PINNOCK, in seconding the motion, referred to Mr. Bicknell's long connection with the Association.

The resolution was carried with acclamation.

Mr. BICKNELL briefly acknowledged the compliment.

The officers of the Association were then appointed, after which

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG moved "That this meeting observes with satisfaction that a considerable addition has been made during the past year to the regular income of the Association, and expresses the hope that the continued efforts of the committee to augment the resources of the Association will be cordially seconded in the towns and districts in which the canvass has been for a time deferred," and said he trusted that the success which had attended the meeting held in Manchester would induce the committee to attempt the formation of a similar scheme in other towns. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MATHERS, in seconding the resolution, suggested that grants of books should be made by the committee to the different free libraries situated in different parts of the kingdom.

The resolution was carried, as were other formal resolutions, after which the meeting closed at a late hour.

THE CONFERENCE, held on Thursday morning, commenced with a small attendance compared with that of the preceding day, but as the morning progressed the numbers increased. Among those present were Mr. Herbert New, in the chair; Revs. H. Ierson, P. M. Higginson, P. H. Wicksteed, A. Payne, T. B. Broadrick, M. C. Gascoigne, T. W. B. Briggs, J. Marten, R. A. Armstrong, A. Webster, J. B. Lloyd, T. W. Freckleton, T. L. Marshall, R.

Spears, &c. The conference opened with the singing of a hymn by Faber, after which prayer was offered by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and the president then called upon Mr. F. Taylor to read his paper on CHURCH FINANCE: A PAPER BY MR. FRANK TAYLOR, OF BOLTON.

The question I have undertaken to introduce for your consideration to-day may, in the minds of many, be open to the charge of being uninteresting and prosaic. No one, however, can deny its utility and importance. It is essentially a lay question, vital to the truest interests and prosperity of our free churches. In its treatment I am thankful my path will be in other directions than those of theological definitions and metaphysical subtleties, or the vexed questions of philosophy, materialistic or intuitive, which would indeed be burning questions for an ordinary layman to touch before such an assembly as the present.

Church finance is too often one of the most neglected branches of our church life. Each year brings it more prominently to the front as one of the questions which will have to be taken in hand and seriously grappled with by our intelligent laity. Almost each ecclesiastical organisation has its committee specially deputed for its consideration. The Established Church has its diocesan boards of finance. The Congregationalists have their county boards; and if we, from our love of individualism and fear of infringing upon our liberties, are unable to follow suit, we can at least discuss the question of church finance with profit to ourselves as well as our churches at large in such a representative gathering as the British and Foreign Unitarian Association ever commands.

If we could have an authentic history of the financial management and condition of our congregations, many revelations would be brought to light very strange and interesting, and not a little saddening. Instances would be forthcoming where almost the entire income is derived from legacies handed down from the past, beneath the paralysing influence of which the energies of the congregation have lain dormant, the chief desire of the members thereof being to so manage the trust as to minimise the demands upon their own resources, and escape the reprimand of the much-feared Charity Commissioners. Instances, too, there would be of gross mismanagement, of carelessness, of attempted misappropriation, while not a few would be found where the congregation seem to have little knowledge of, or interest in, financial matters, and the poor minister is expected not only to satisfy their spiritual wants, but have the chief anxiety in the management of the funds.

A CONGREGATION AND ITS MINISTER.

Take, for example, a rural congregation, possessing an ancient chapel, venerable with traditions of a Presbyterian ancestry. Connected therewith has been a family of distinction or wealth, some member of which has left an endowment, it may be in money, but more often in land, for its maintenance. Probably the family is now extinct, or, as is too often the case, the descendants have forsaken the humble meeting-house for some more popular church. The management of the trust has devolved upon men little accustomed to such responsibilities. Owing to the enhanced value of land the endowment has improved, but too often the minister is not expected to participate in this. The same stipend is paid now as of old, in spite of the increased cost of the necessities and comforts of life. The members of the congregation may be connected with some agricultural or trades union, and thus share in the increased remuneration of labour; but to the stipend of the minister the adage is applied—"As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be." He is expected to live comfortably and respectably, to make a good appearance, to move in good society, to have a well-stocked library, to be generous and given to hospitality, upon an annual income little in excess of what is paid to an ordinary artificer. And should he have any anxiety as to the future, or ask for an increase of stipend, or accept a call to a more prosperous church, he is regarded as being actuated by unworthy and sordid motives.

TRUSTEES AND FUNDS.

Church finance, then, is a question of growing importance, and to-day I plead with my brother laymen for a deeper sense of our responsibilities, a more healthful tone of thought and feeling. Granted that for the maintenance of public worship funds are requisite for the due repairs of the sanctuary, for the support in a becoming and dignified manner of the ministry, for the provision of musical accompaniments, for the making of the common worship healthful and inspiring by the presence of anything which touches the soul, quickens thought, develops the sense of the holy and beautiful, begets reverence, kindles aspiration and draws the heart heavenwards, the questions arise—How can these funds be most equitably raised? and by whom most efficiently administered?

A few words, first, as to the organisation. In many of our older congregations the trustees have not only charge of the property connected therewith, but constitute themselves the committee of management for the congregation. This I regard as a mistake. Owing to deaths and removals the trustees are a constantly decreasing body, the number of which can only be occasionally recruited by the appointment of new members and the creation of a supplementary deed. At the time these may be selected from the most valuable and reliable members of the congregation, but it does not follow of necessity that they will remain such. Being a life appointment it prevents the removal from the trust of any who may change their religious convictions, and thus lose their interest in the successful management of the trust. Thus it naturally falls into the hands of a limited number, possibly the most willing but not always the most efficient. To remedy this the duties of the trustees ought to be confined to their legal function—that of holding the property in trust and being responsible for it, while the organisation and financial arrangements of the congregation should be entrusted to a committee. This might consist one half of trustees, the remaining half to be selected at the annual congregational meeting, a certain stipulated number to retire each year. This secures a constant infusion of fresh blood by the yearly appointment of those who, from their energy, ability, or interest, enjoy the confidence of their co-worshippers. Ladies might with advantage be placed on such a committee, for, in addition to an interest in the work, they would bring a grace and quiet dignity and refinement which are among the innumerable charms of the sex. The accounts ought to be audited annually, and printed for circulation amongst the congregation, along with a brief report of the various activities at work connected therewith. Discretion should be exercised in the selection of a secretary and treasurer. Their duties at all times require judgment, tact, and delicacy. How often the susceptibilities of a minister are deeply pained by the brusque way in which these important congregational officials perform their duties.

MEANS OF RAISING FUNDS—THE PEW SYSTEM.

And now let me ask, which is the most efficient means of raising the funds, and in such a way as to inspire the interest of the greatest number?

The oldest and most generally adopted plan is the proprietary system, the pew rents by a graduated scale producing the requisite amount. To this method there are many objections. Our churches, as a rule, are comparatively small, so that the average amount to be raised per sitting is large. Due regard being paid to those with limited means, to counterbalance those seats assessed at a low rental a certain proportion have to be assessed very high. By this system the accommodation is parcelled out into reserved, second, or third seats according to assessment. This tends to introduce those invidious distinctions of wealth and position (so powerful in the world) within the church, whose aim ought to be to soften the inequalities and asperities of life, to draw men nearer to each other in remembrance of their common sonship before the Great Father. The occasional worshipper, and stranger, too, are often precluded from joining in worship by the feeling that there is no space set apart for them except the poor's seat, and that they must depend for accommodation upon the courtesy of those who may regard them as intruders. If it is sought to raise the whole income by a uniform pew rental, then does it visit with too great force the poorer members, and tend to drive them away. Thus the poor are disregarded. No seats are set apart for them; or, if so, very few, and these the most uncomfortable and inconvenient, if not most conspicuous. The humbler member, too, with large family, and requiring a larger pew, will have to subscribe more largely in proportion to his means than the rich bachelor or spinster whose requirements are small.

Another plan is to adopt a uniform pew rental of moderate amount throughout, so as to be within the compass of all, and supplement it by a voluntary subscription list. This gives an opportunity to those who are able and willing to subscribe out of their abundance. It has, however, one grave objection. If any guaranteed amount has to be thus raised, owing to deaths and removals it falls heavily upon the surviving guarantors, while the pretext of paying a pew rent, though admittedly a low one, is seized by the ungenerous wealthy as an argument for not subscribing further.

The pew rental system in all its forms has one common objection. It encourages a spirit of exclusiveness and landlordism which clings with tenacious power to its property and rights. How often do pews remain in the possession of families who seldom utilise them, but who, from old association, are unwilling to part with them, because the memories of the sainted dead who have sat there seem to haunt them. Meanwhile, other families are excluded who would take a deeper and more practical interest in the regular services by their attendance and sympathy.

THE OFFERTORY.

Only one important method now remains to be noticed, that generally known as the free and open system; and which, through the self sacrifice and trustful spirit of its founder in our ranks, will ever be associated with the name of the Rev. Brooke Herford. The seats are entirely free and unappropriated, and the maintenance of worship depends upon the free will offerings of the people at each service. This appears to me the most equitable and efficient way of raising the needful funds, while in spirit it approaches most nearly the ideal Christian church. It does not parcel out the sanctuary into separate enclosures, and put a monetary value on each. It does not arrange the worshippers according to the length of their purse. The rich have the opportunity of giving from their abundance, while the offerings of the poor are as willingly given as they are received. It is, in fact, the best way of getting at the poor. We too often forget the power of small subscriptions, and might with advantage remember the advice of the blind mendicant, who entreated passers-by not to be ashamed to place coppers in his receptacle if they could not afford more, as he could not see what they gave him. The offertory gathers more successfully than any other plan the gifts of the poor, while it is an almost universal experience that more is raised by small and frequent subscriptions than by large and occasional ones.

But I plead for this system on higher than pecuniary grounds. This system creates or perpetuates no class distinctions in the church. All meet together on common ground as children of the Great Heaven-Father. All feel welcome and at home if only they take their seats with meekness and reverence, with hearts softened by the memories which are awakened and the hopes which are kindled, and souls awed by the grandeur of the thoughts which are inspired. The stranger, too, takes his place without feeling he is an intruder, or the observed of all. A heartiness pervades the service, and an increased interest is thus induced.

MEMBERSHIP.

It is well to have a record of membership, entrance to which shall be by a small subscription. This would be a voluntary association of those in sympathy with the spirit of the worship and the work, and who express a willingness to extend their influence. It would unite still more closely those who worship together in the bonds of spiritual sympathy and mutual helpfulness.

THE MINISTRY AND THE OFFERTORY.

It may be urged that it is unfair to the ministry to make them dependent upon the fickle offerings of the people, and that it would tend to make them pander to the popular wishes and prejudices. I feel confident our ministers have a truer conception of the greatness of their life-work, and the solemn issues at stake, and do not, therefore, believe such would be the case.

In adopting this system it would be well for the congregation to determine that the minister shall not receive less than a stipulated stipend, and that the accumulated offerings for the year shall not produce less than a fixed amount. If, towards the expiration of the financial year, it be found that the receipts will fall short, then will it be within the power of those interested in the success of the scheme to so increase their offerings as to produce the ideal amount. I rejoice to think this system has been introduced with success into some of our churches, and that in connection with the orthodox churches it is meeting with growing acceptance, more particularly with the Established Church and the Congregationalists.

Suffer me, in conclusion, to add that, while the free and unappropriated system develops more fully the latent resources of the congregation, brings home more powerfully to its members their duties and responsibilities, it harmonises more completely with the spirit and principles of our free churches. Unfettered by doctrinal trust deeds, or by subscription to written articles and creeds, believing not in the State patronage and control of religion, we declare that we have faith in its inherent power and vitality to win its way to the hearts and consciences of men without the assistance of the law or the support of the civil Government. If we believe that Christianity is not a ritual, or congeries of mysterious doctrines to be enforced from without, but a spirit of life, and love, and duty, coming down through the ages from its Great Founder, lighting up the pathway, moving the heart, and guiding the destinies of men, then does it behoove us, of all religionists, to make fitting provision for its continued existence, thus showing that it is the willing external manifestation of an irrepressible inward impulse and conviction. Thus do I believe that if the members of our churches are thoroughly leavened by the spirit of life which was in Jesus Christ of old, it will be to them no less a pleasure than a duty to support in a dignified manner the ministrations of religion. The sanctuary will then become the storehouse of earnest vows and living and loving sacrifice, where for a time the pressure of earthly toil and care is uplifted, the weary and heavy laden are comforted with visions of a richer and fuller life, the common pathway of duty seems filled with diviner hopes and irradiated with holier tints, and to the true and earnest worshipper is vouchsafed some message of divine peace and joy, some assurance of divine strength and guidance.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—At a meeting of the members of the congregation at Stockton-on-Tees, held in the schoolroom on the 3rd inst., Mr. W. Stoddart, B.A., of Cambridge, was unanimously elected the minister, and will shortly enter upon his duties. Mr. English Crooks, retiring student of the Home Missionary Board, has received and accepted a unanimous call from the Second Unitarian Congregation, Ballyclare (Northern Presbytery of Antrim), and will enter on his duties about the middle of July.

BURY.—On Whit-Sunday, the annual gathering of the Bury District Sunday School Association took place in Bank-street Chapel, Bury, and notwithstanding the almost continuous downpour during the day, the chapel was filled in every part. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. W. C. Squier, of Stand, and the Rev. J. Fox, of Heywood, gave an appropriate address based on the story of the temptation of Christ. The hymns for the occasion were taken from the fourth series of hymns and choral songs, issued by the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and were rendered with very good effect.

GORTON: BROOKFIELD CHURCH.—On Whit-Sunday afternoon a musical service was held, more especially adapted to the young people of the Sunday school. The beautiful interior of the church was made more attractive, if possible, by the tasteful arrangement of choice plants, ferns, and flowers in the cross aisle and chancel. The choir of the church, one of the finest in the neighbourhood of Manchester, rendered efficient aid in both hymns and anthems, whilst the verses sung by the children alone were very touching and pleasing from the contrast to the fulness of sound when all sang together. The tunes included "Iona," from Costa's "Eli," H. Smart's "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," Dr. Dykes's "Sanctuary," Ellacombe, &c. The first anthem, "Praise the Lord," Elvey, was sung by the choir and a singing-class belonging to the school of thirty voices, which the organist, Mr. C. H. Wrigley, has taught during the preceding winter months. The second anthem, Dona Nobis, "Praise the Lord, ye nations all," from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, was splendidly given by the choir of the church alone. Every available seat in the church was occupied, as also a number of chairs that were ranged in the side aisles. The Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., delivered a most appropriate address, and the whole service concluded with Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." It is hoped the committee may be induced to make the festival an annual one.

LEICESTER.—On Sunday last the Rev. John Page Hopps preached a sermon on the late Earl Russell, which is fully reported in the local papers. "Civil and religious liberty," he says, "are the words that best describe the whole spirit and policy of Lord Russell's life." And he adds: "There still exists an ecclesiastical corporation which still asserts its right to an enormous exceptional representation in the House of Lords, the highest court of Parliament and appeal, and which dares to create discord and confusion by the very graves of the dead. There still exists a creed which insults and curses some of the best men and women in the nation—a creed which, several times a year, is read in every State church in the nation's name and by Parliamentary order—damning to perdition, in the savage manner and in the savage spirit of centuries ago, all who do not accept its theological enigmas—a creed which in the name of the State will be read next Sunday in the State churches of this town; and I say that Earl Russell's work will not be consummated till all this comes to an end."

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET.—On Tuesday afternoon, June 11th, a tea party was held for the purpose of bringing to a close for the present season our mother's meetings, which have been regularly held each week since October 2nd, 1877, and during which time very gratifying attendances have always been maintained. Much interest has been manifested, and we believe that one and all of the members are looking forward to the time of re-opening. The party was of a social character, and various objects of interest were on view. Among those present were Mrs. Biggs and Mrs. Summers (who have conducted the mother's meeting), the Rev. F. Summers, and Mr. R. Robinson.

LIVERPOOL: SUNDAY SCHOOL FESTIVAL.—On Sunday afternoon, the annual Whit-Sunday festival of the schools in connection with our Liverpool congregations was held, as usual, in the Hope-street church, and in every respect it was a very interesting gathering. The weather was exceedingly unfavourable, but, notwithstanding this drawback, there were present 570 scholars, eighty teachers, and parents and friends brought the number up to over 700. The service throughout was thoroughly attractive. The hymns selected for the occasion were sung with spirit, the responses were readily taken up, and the address, given by the Rev. H. Hawkes, who conducted the service, was very appropriate, and kept the attention of the children. Altogether, the festival was all of a pleasing and memorable character.

LONDON: KENTISH TOWN.—On Saturday evening, June 1st, a dramatic performance, under distinguished patronage, took place at St. George's Hall, Langham Place. Messrs. Percy Lawford, J. Cogan Conway, R. R. Oram, T. Alfred Carpenter, Godfrey Shaen, and a number of ladies took part in the performance; and between the acts, Mr. E. A. Wurtzburg sang two or three songs. The object was to realise a sum of money in aid of the Sunday school fund, for which, including donations, £125 was obtained.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE: CHURCH OF DIVINE UNITY. On Whit-Monday, the teachers and friends of the Sunday schools had their annual trip to Mitford. A party of upwards of seventy were conveyed in three large brakes to the grounds of the old castle. The drive of fifteen miles, through one of the most delightful spots of Northumberland, was greatly enjoyed. Tea was provided in the grounds, after which the usual old English games were indulged in. The ruins of the old castle, the venerable old church, rich in effigies and pious inscriptions, were also objects of great interest, while the shady walks by the river Wansbeck added to the charms of a most interesting and delightful spot. The presence and efforts of the Messrs. Elliss, Watson, Johnston, and Robinson, members of the church committee, together with Mr. E. F. Slater, the superintendent, made the trip one of the most successful and delightful the teachers have had.

TAVISTOCK.—On Sunday evening last, special reference was made in the Abbey Chapel, by the Rev. Lindsey T. Badcock, to the sterling character of the late Earl Russell, and the great services he rendered to the cause of freedom. The flagrant injustice he removed by obtaining the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts was dwelt upon, the aim of the late statesman being to remove all disabilities imposed for religious opinion. To him, the preacher said, the rights of conscience were sacred, and his life was dedicated to liberty.

WHITCHURCH, SALOP.—On Wednesday, the annual treat in connection with the Free Christian Church Sunday School was held at Mr. John Gresty's, the Woodhouses. The children were taken in conveyances, and carried flags and banners. On the way an halt was made at Brook Cottage, Broughall, the residence of Mr. R. J. Fletcher, by whose kindness the children were regaled with oranges. Arriving at the Woodhouses, a sumptuous tea was provided for both children and adults. Before leaving, each child was presented with a toy. After the singing of the hymn, "Now the day is over," the company started homewards, much delighted with the day's enjoyment. In all there were about 260 present, including 100 of the scholars of the Free Christian Church.

DOING AND SAYING.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has referred to John Henry Newman as "the best and noblest son of Oxford."

The London University has elected Mr. R. W. Dale, M.A., as its representative on the board of the Free Grammar School, Birmingham.

Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., says that one of the greatest dangers of the present time is the tendency to self-indulgence, which finds its outcome in undue expenditure that is working ruin in thousands of families.

The Bishop of Manchester, speaking on the Lancashire strike and lock-out, remarked that the land could never again prosper unless the English people become more sober and industrious. Drunkenness seemed to be creeping everywhere, like leprosy.

The Belfast Northern Whig congratulates its Irish Presbyterian friends of Ulster on the progress made during the past year, and the Presbyterian Assembly on the "fine spirit and kindly conciliation displayed in all their debates" at their recent meetings.

Mr. Mackonochie has addressed a local meeting of the English Church Union in terms forbidding all hope of compromise. He has appealed to the Common Law Courts for protection against the sentence of the judge of the Court of Arches. He contends that the proper punishment for contempt of court is fine or imprisonment, and not what he says is in effect deprivation of the freehold.

M. Henri Martin, the historian, and M. Renan, the author of The Life of Jesus, have been elected members of the French Assembly, M. Taine, who was one of the competitors, being defeated. It was thought that M. Taine, a more accomplished writer than M. Martin, would have been chosen. The return of M. Henri Martin is a great tribute to the honesty of his History of France—perhaps the most solid and careful book which deals with the past of France.

Bishop Ellicott writes that "the very existence of our National Church is now menaced by Ritualistic doctrines and practices." He expresses a wish that it should be made perfectly plain "to these disturbers of our peace" that the choice must now promptly be made between loyal obedience to the law, or withdrawal from the position and privileges which the preference of the nation has assigned to the National Church." This idea of "the preference of the nation" is rather a good joke, as though the present generation of Englishmen had been in any way consulted in the matter. But this by the way. What is important to remember is that the Bishops of Gloucester and the warden of St. Raphael, Bristol, are much in the same position as the lion and the bear in Punch's recent cartoon, which cannot pass each other in a narrow causeway. Which will give way?

The St. Petersburg papers relate that the Jewish inhabitants of Berdichev have issued a manifesto to all Europe, as simple as it is forcible: "We Israelites of Russia, freely confess before the entire Russian people that we have positively no connection whatever with the Prime Minister of England, the Lord Disraeli-Beaconsfield, and that we have no desire to make common cause with him." In reply to this curious declaration, the Journal de St. Petersburg contains the following sarcastic remarks: "Berditschew shall therefore not be connected with Besika Bay by a subterranean canal, and the news must be false that a corps d'armée, to be formed from the men of Berditschew, under command of Hersch Berko Perlmutter, is to attack the flank of the Russian army and to cut off its retreat across the Pruth. Benjamin Disraeli-Beaconsfield is now baffled, England's isolation is complete; Berditschew has given peace to the world!" Berditschew is a Russian town with a population of from 20,000 to 30,000 souls, nearly all of whom are Jews.

It is stated that the Church Association will shortly apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the Bishop of Oxford to show cause why proceedings should not be taken against the Rev. Canon Carter, of Clewer, near Windsor, for Romanistic practices. Under these circumstances the Times has recently published a long article descriptive of the institutions carried on by Canon Carter in this village. Among them is a convent, the books used in which are well-known Romish works. One of them is entitled The Treasury. In this, says the Times, "several methods of self-examination before confession are prescribed. One of these is by means of the Commandments, and the examination is so framed that every offence is made an offence against the clergy and the Church. This choice volume deserves to take its place besides that abominable work, The Priest in Absolution. Whatever good may be done at the Clewer institutions, we do not hesitate to say that the practices carried on there are a scandal and a disgrace to a Church which is professedly a Protestant establishment." The Bishop of Oxford is the visitor of the convent, and Mr. Gladstone is, or was until recently, not only a trustee, but also a member of the committee.

AMERICAN NOTES.

MR BEECHER ON SCEPTICISM AND INFIDELITY.

MR. HENRY WARD BEECHER recently preached a remarkable sermon on "Scepticism and Infidelity." He made public admission of facts which most intelligent people believe, but which few, however slightly connected with an orthodox church, would have the courage to proclaim. After dwelling on the rapid spread of scepticism, he said: "It is more widely diffused among the laity than is generally supposed. Thousands of men sit in church and hear a sound, orthodox sermon every Sunday for twenty years, and don't believe a word of it. They go to church from different motives; some because they have been brought up to do so; others because they like the moral teaching; others again because they want their children, while young, to get in the way of it for the sake of its moral influences; and others again because it is respectable and profitable and fashionable. But the church is filled with men whose opinions are constantly fluctuating, never firmly established. Multitudes more than of old think they can settle the question for themselves. The churches are slimly attended, and if one should be always crowded, it is attributed to the claptrap attitudinizing of the minister. It is taken for granted that people don't want to go to church. The pulpit is no longer the chief instructor." Mr. Beecher closed hopefully. He said that the new theology will be broader and better than the old. To satisfy the needs of man it must contain the revelations of the present as well as those of the past.

THE REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND THE THEATRE.

THE General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church of America, has denounced the theatre as "tending to lower the tone of Christian purity, hinder the growth of personal piety, and weaken the influence of the church in the community." Rev. Dr. Sabine heartily endorsed these resolutions. He is the clergyman who, some years ago, made himself rather unpleasantly conspicuous by refusing to perform the funeral rites over the remains of amiable and gentle-hearted old George Holland. This kind of phariseism finds a significant commentary in the life of Charlotte Cushman, written by Miss Emma Stebbins, her devoted, life-long friend, and just issued from the press of Houghton, Osgood & Co. Miss Cushman warmly testifies to the excellent traits of character manifested by the laborious, humble members of her own beloved profession. Such lives as Charlotte Cushman, Macready, and many other actors and actresses, have lived, ought to exempt the profession from the sweeping denunciations of fanatical self-righteousness.

Rev. Dr. Newman, ex-President Grant's pastor, has been delivering in New York a series of ten sermons on the "Seven Great Religions of the World." He advanced the theory that German rationalism was borrowed from Buddhism; that the Chinese are the descendants of Noah; that they originally worshipped the monotheistic God of the patriarchs, and ought to be brought back to their ancient faith.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE forty-fourth annual breakfast, business meeting, and conference of teachers, was held on Friday morning, the 14th inst., at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, London.

In the absence through illness of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, who had been announced as chairman, Councillor MATHERS, of Leeds, presided. The attendance was large and full of an influential character. Among those present were:—The Revs. W. Binns, Birkenhead; J. B. Lloyd, Knutsford; J. Taylor, London; John Bevan, Pudsey; T. Rix, Stratford; R. A. Armstrong, B.A. Nottingham; P. M. Higginson, M.A., Dean Row; A. Chalmers, Cambridge; A. Payne, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; J. D. Hirst Smyth, London; P. W. Clayden, T. B. W. Briggs, J. Ellis, and T. Dunkerley, B.A.; and the following students of Manchester New College: Mr. C. J. Perry, B.A., minister elect of Hope-street, Liverpool; Messrs. V. D. Davis, B.A.; C. J. Street, B.A.; G. Evans, M.A., F. W. Stanley, C. H. Waid, and G. Boros, and also Messrs. R. Bartram, S. S. Taylor, H. New, F. Nettlefold, Jos. Lupton, F. Allen, &c.

Mr. WADE introduced Mr. Councillor Mathers, and asked for him a more than ordinary hearty welcome in taking the chair under the circumstance they all, he was sure, so deeply regretted. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD, in submitting his financial statement of the Association's affairs, explained that the increase in the amount due to treasurer at the present moment, compared with last year, was not a cause for such despondency as might be at first imagined, the increase being attributable to the publication of several new works. The receipts had been £1,672. 6s. 11d.; balance due to treasurer, £427. 1s. 10d.; total, £2,099. 8s. 9d. Payments, £1,729. 3s. 8d.; balance due to treasurer, £370. 5s. 1d.; total, £2,099. 8s. 9d.

Mr. WADE, the secretary, then read the COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

After a few introductory remarks, referring to the claims of the Sunday school upon the church, and the duties of the Association and its claims upon the schools, the report noticed the publication of the Rev. Brooke Herford's Story of Religion in England, which has on all hands been well received, the press having spoken of it in the highest terms, and in the schools where it has been introduced great interest having been enlisted, some of the scholars having purchased it for themselves. Young Days has entered on its third year, promises to retain the great interest which its appearance first secured, and still shows signs of vigorous youth. The sales of the society's publications had last year reached the sum of £1,094. 5s. 9d. The special appeal for further subscriptions had been well responded to, but the very heavy expenses incurred in printing and binding, and in carrying on the general business of the Association, had been so much greater than the income, that the balance due to the treasurer had been increased. The committee have in contemplation the publication of a small volume of prayers suitable for the opening and closing of the schools, and a few short liturgical services for the children. A fresh supply of illustrated reward cards has been obtained, the task of selection having been kindly performed by Lady Wilson. To obtain full statistical returns, forms had been sent to every congregation in the United Kingdom appearing in the Unitarian Almanac, and one hundred and ninety had been received from England, Scotland, and Wales, but only nine from Ireland. These returns are in excess of former years; they show the total number of scholars to be 23,441, with an average morning attendance of 10,323, and an afternoon ditto of 14,581. The number of teachers is 3,145, whilst 4,562 children are over sixteen years of age.

MR. COUNCILLOR MATHERS ON SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

THE CHAIRMAN, after some introductory remarks, said: I suppose that all of us who are engaged in Sunday-school work can give vent to at least some ideas in connection with our theories and our experiences. The future of Sunday-school work is now stirring the anxiety of all earnest teachers, at least throughout our own body. This, to a large extent, is being brought about by the national system of education, which, I venture to say, is in our schools as well as in those of every other denomination already making its influence felt. This brings me to say that I do not at all agree with those who affirm that our work has just begun, while I equally disagree with those who allege that our work is now finished. Sunday schools, like all other institutions, must vary according to the circumstances of the society and time in which we live, and unless they alter and adapt themselves to those circumstances, we may depend upon it that to some extent they will decline. How we are to alter our Sunday-school teaching in order to meet the special interests and requirements of the day is not, at least to my mind, at present very clear. I think that no definite plan can be laid down to guide all the various schools connected at least with our denomination. Each school must, according to its own circumstances, find out the plan which is best adapted to give it life and vitality in the world. (Hear, hear.) It appears to me that the smaller towns in the country may, to a larger extent than those centrally situated, devote themselves to a systematic scheme of teaching and training, because they have not those continual political and social excitements and distractions which occur in large towns. You are well aware that we who live in industrial centres, full of bustle and activity, have many claims upon our time and attention in connection with the political and social problems of our day, which prevent us giving that undivided attention we would wish to devote to Sunday-school work. Such teachers as we would have in our schools can only be trained and brought into work by degrees for this reason—and I suppose your schools in the country are very much like the one to which it has been my pleasure to be attached for over thirty years—that the bulk of our teachers are drawn from the working classes, and as they have their own interest in social and political problems they can devote but a limited time to prepare themselves for the work of the Sunday school; but, my friends, I am speaking amongst those who do believe that, after all, such teachers can and will be found. (Hear, hear.)

Now, if the various schools connected with our Union vary in their requirements, I know of no better association or institution than the central one to supply our various demands, because it would be utterly impossible for any of our local unions to go to the expense requisite for furnishing the necessary materials for carrying on the work in a Sunday school; but there may be half a dozen or more schools whose requirements are very similar in their nature, and thus I take it that this is the best institution that could be in existence to meet our particular demands. (Hear, hear.) And with the co-operation of the minister, who, after all, even amongst his numerous calls and duties, ought to be and really is the natural head and guide and instructor of Sunday schools, we may hope that year by year we shall get a higher class of trained teachers to take their position in our Sunday schools.

Publications of the Association.

My friends, this Association has indeed done a great deal during the past three or four or five years in connection with the publications it has issued. I believe we have now almost all the publications of this Association in our own school, and let me just remind you that the influence of our books ought not and need not stop within the limits of our own schools. I have made it my duty to give a copy of almost all our works to several of my orthodox friends connected with other denominational schools, and although our books have not yet been adopted as class books, yet I know that the Bible is being interpreted by means of some of our publications, and that they have secured a position such as I could never have anticipated. Now, we can all do something in this direction, and I would urge your attention to the point, because I am convinced the most beneficial results will flow from the wider circulation of our literature. (Hear, hear.)

Amusements and Entertainments.

My experience in Sunday-school work, though extending over a period of thirty years, is in a sense limited, because with the exception of some two or three years when I was connected with a large undenominational and unsectarian school, which has produced some of the finest congregations in our town, I have been connected with only one school all my life. Therefore I cannot be said to have had an extended experience. But my theory and my practice have led me to this conclusion, that the Sunday school ought to be made the second home of the child. We have been far too long too apt to leave our scholars at the very moment when we ought to be nearest to them—that is, when they are seeking their pleasure, and when they are trying to adapt themselves to the coming struggles of life. Man is a social being, and unless we bestir ourselves, and in connection with our Sunday schools provide them with innocent recreation and amusement, you may depend upon it, do what you will, give as many systematic lessons as you will, be as well prepared as you will, your work will fail to realise the full benefits you desire to secure. With us—and my friend Mr. Lupton will bear me out when I say this—we have made it a point in the government of our Sunday schools to provide entertainments throughout the whole year. In the summer we have upon Saturday afternoons short excursions into the country, and some of us make it our duty to prepare some short notice of the district into which we are going—(hear, hear)—and in winter we give dramatic entertainments. We have a perfect stage, and apparatus for the purpose. Now, let me tell you that though this alone has shocked the sensitive feelings of many of our orthodox friends they have felt the necessity of following our example, because the children of their own denominations are seeking two sources of pleasure—they are either going into the town or coming down to us. And in order to rival the attractions we hold out, they are introducing a class of entertainments which I should trust Unitarians will ever be ashamed of encouraging. Now, in connection with our schools we have a library and reading-room, and also a room in which various games, such as draughts and chess, are played. Then we have our old scholars' society, which four or five times a year gathers the old scholars and teachers together. We have also our parents' gatherings, which are very delightful occasions indeed; our temperance association, and several other methods in practice for promoting and strengthening the bonds of union among us. (Hear.)

Systematic Teaching: Personal Intercourse

Now, I will just for a moment touch upon a delicate point in connection with our Sunday-school work—I mean the subject of systematic teaching. In its way it is very good, but you may carry your systematic teaching too far. I find that not only old boys and girls, but young boys and girls like a change, and however good your systematic teaching may be, if you carry it too far you will defeat the very object you have in view. Then, in addition to the organisations I have mentioned, we have a Sunday morning class in which our young men and women join together, and to which our parson undertakes to explain the views that are held by our own body in contradistinction to those held by other denominations. In the afternoon we have papers read and discussions held upon political, social, and theological subjects—subjects which assist them in their daily work. By such means we find that we can keep our old scholars together better than in any other way. But, my friends, it is not by the papers which I have read, it is not by the lessons which I have gone through in my class that I have secured my greatest influence in our Sunday school—it has been by personal contact—(hear, hear)—by being in the society of my scholars and fellow-teachers as much as my other public duties during the week would allow me. (Renewed applause.) My experience teaches me that our interest must not be confined merely to our association with them on a Sunday; but we must visit them, and succour them in sickness; we must advise with them in their hours of trial and adversity, and if a young lad or young lass come to us seeking our help to advance them in the world, we must strive to do all in our power to obtain them employment. (Hear, hear.) If any one of your scholars has fallen, be not the first to throw the stone. (Applause.) Shield them with your pitying love, no matter how dark the deed has been. You had far better keep them within the shadow of your schools than let them come within the shadow of the prison wall. (Hear, hear.) Seize all the occasions you can, my friends, by bringing them within the influences of your own fireside to soften and humanise their natures. Remember that many of them have not the firesides that you enjoy. Some people talk of the blessings of the domestic circle. Why, in the case of some it is a perfect godsend to take them away from their domestic circle, and to gather them round your own hearth. (Hear, hear.) I think it is necessary that we should have systematic teaching and periodical examinations, but we may carry them too far; and, depend upon it, it is by our daily, hourly, and personal contact with the children, sitting with them, advising with them, talking with them, and walking with them, that you will be able to instil those principles which are calculated to guide their course aright in their future life. (Hearty and continued applause.)

PROFESSOR DRUMMOND ON THE INFLUENCE OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS ON CULTURE AND SOCIAL LIFE.

The Rev. Professor DRUMMOND, in seconding the resolution moved by the chairman for the adoption of the report, spoke in eulogistic terms of Sunday-school teachers, and then proceeded: Now, sir, I desire to offer a few remarks upon the possible necessity of adapting our Sunday schools, by certain modifications, to the altered requirements of our time. The influence of day schools must necessitate some change in our Sunday schools, and this change must be in the direction of improvement, inasmuch as it will release the teachers from giving instruction they ought not to be expected to impart; while it will also place in their hands a more enlightened class of scholars. (Hear, hear.) But, notwithstanding all the secular education, the need of Sunday schools is never likely to be superseded. It surely is an important part of education that people should know something about the religious mysteries of the world; that they should have some familiarity with religious ideas, and some clear conceptions of their own about the great matters of faith. And I say that it is quite impossible that any adequate instruction upon these points can be given in the homes of the great mass of our people. Now, the question we have to consider is whether it is desirable that the attempt to exercise religious influence upon one another should be confined to the formal services of our churches, and that the minister, as such, is the only one to speak to his fellow-creatures upon the most vital and important topics that can engage our attention. It is one of the misfortunes of the Christian church that its spiritual influence should be so much confined to a particular class; and instead of wishing to limit the means and opportunities for the interchange, between all the members of a community, of mutual comfort, guidance, and encouragement, I desire rather to increase them, and to enable those among us, who possess the power, to bring their own elevated thoughts and noble feelings to bear upon the elevation of their fellows. (Hear, hear.) Then, in addition to the more direct influences of the Sunday school, there are certain collateral effects which seem to me to be of the very highest importance. One is the establishment of good relations between class and class. And, surely, when we think of what is going on at the present moment in my own favourite Lancashire, it is impossible to under-value this great agency for good. During a previous period, when the civil war was raging in America, I have seen these same Lancashire men and women, their faces growing daily paler and thinner under the influence of starvation, and yet never a murmur was raised, nor were any of the higher classes molested. And it is a source of deep regret that now, under a far less severe pressure of distress than fourteen years since, there has been in some quarters a display of brute force, and an antagonism and violence manifested towards the higher classes, which I know the great mass of the labouring population deplore as much as we do ourselves. (Applause.) If these employers and artisans had met one another as teachers and taught, and grown up with feelings of mutual sympathy, esteem, and respect, we should not have to deplore these sad scenes of outrage. Therefore, although this is only a collateral effect of our Sunday schools, it is one that we should not undervalue, for its power for good is incalculable, tending as it does to raise the standard of culture and social intercourse in all the grades of our population. (Hear, hear.) There is another influence, one of which our chairman gave a very interesting description in connection with the Sunday school work at Leeds. Every efficient Sunday school has a variety of connected agencies, and through them a very wide and beneficial influence is exercised upon the people at large. I may just refer to the library and reading room, to the bands of hope and other aids to temperance, by which the most gigantic and terrible evil from which our country suffers may be attacked at the very root—(hear, hear)—and to the mutual improvement societies; while, lastly, there is one other influence to which, as a minister, I may allude. The Sunday school provides for the minister, by an easy and natural process, a great parish of the poor, in which he may devote as much of his time as he can spare. Our ministers are not clergymen who have a kind of official right to visit the people of their parish, and it seems to me a matter of very considerable importance that there is this field naturally opened to them in which they can bring to bear whatever influence they possess upon the social surroundings of the people. (Hear, hear.) For reasons such as these it seems to me that the need for Sunday schools is not likely, at least in our time, at all to cease or to grow less, and instead of trying to depress the energies of our teachers by finding fault with their poor accomplishments and insufficient training, and charging them with dilettante philanthropy, surely it is our duty to stimulate their enthusiasm, to provide means for enlarging their culture, and to endeavour to save them from the chill that is apt to fall upon us from, I am afraid, the growing self-indulgence of our time, or from the kind of spurious liberalism in thought so fashionable in the present day—a liberalism which only enfeebles our energies and prevents us taking up the cross—the only symbol of true salvation; of large, wide, and universal love; of self-denying charity towards all men—the symbol of high and noble life which begins on earth and reaches into eternity. (Applause.)

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN next moved "That the following ladies and gentlemen be the officers for the ensuing year: Treasurer, Fredk. Nettlefold, Esq.; Hon. Sec., I. M. Wade, Esq.; Assistant-Secretary, Rev. J. Taylor; Committee, Miss Preston, Miss Teschemacher, Messrs. R. Bartram, H. Jeffery, L. Scott, F. W. Stanley, C. J. Street, S. S. Tayler, and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., with the aid of the Principal and professors of Manchester New College when scholarly reference is required on the subject of books; Auditors, Messrs. J. T. Preston and W. Titford."

Mr. HERBERT NEW seconded the resolution. In the course of his address he referred to the books published by the Association, and selected for special praise Brooke Herford's History of Religion in England, and expressed the indebtedness of the whole Unitarian body to the writer for so valuable a contribution to their literature.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL VIEWS OF THE REV. JOHN PAGE HOPPS.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, of Leicester, then read a paper entitled "Feed my Lambs," from which we make a few extracts:—

The Teaching of Religious Beliefs.

The injunction "Feed my lambs," when freely translated into "Teach religion to the young," suggests a right and a duty. The "right" brings us face to face with the old vexed question whether it is proper to teach definite religious "views" to children. To that question, I have only to answer: It must be right for us to teach the children who are naturally in our care or who are put in our care, anything that seems to us to be good for them; and for this reason—that being in our care means being in our hands to be helped to live a useful, good, and happy life. But how can we doubt our right, when the eager receptivity of the child, or the very restlessness of the child, is in itself the cry, "Give me this day my daily bread?"

But it is not only our "right;" it is also our duty to feed them. For anyhow, food of some kind will reach them; and if we do not provide what we believe to be good, they will assuredly "go further and fare worse." If I am quiescent, the Catholics are not inactive: if I hesitate to prepossess the child's mind, the revivalists will not be so particular: if I leave the child alone, to choose ultimately for itself, there is a little army of explorers who will be eager to occupy the vacant ground. It may be that in a few years they may have to learn to unlearn what I teach them, and that they may find my poor pasture narrow or bare, and my little stream dry; but what of that? In after years they may also choose to adore Tory politics, and cherish the memory of Earl Beaconsfield as the saviour of his country; but none the less it is my duty to give them the faith as well as the meat and drink I now deem good for them—none the less ought I to attempt to lead them in the way of religious as well as political righteousness, while I can. Let us not suffer our love of freedom, then, to shut our mouths; or permit our distaste for proselytism to build a barrier between a child's soul and our own. For my own part, I give fair notice to all who put children in my care, for religious influences—that, please God, I will tell them all I know, in so far as what I know seems to be good for them. For surely, if I try to influence them with regard to the politics of earth, none the less ought I to try to influence them with regard to the claims of heaven; and if I take pains to provide for them the bread that perisheth, surely I ought none the less to point to them the bread that endureth unto everlasting life.

The Convenient Food.

"Feed me with food convenient for me," said a devout man once; and this would children say if they were wise; but if they are not wise, then their unwisdom says it for them. Postpone, therefore, for awhile the problems connected with the Pentateuch, and the entanglements of the history of the Jews; and do not care to hear "that blessed word Mesopotamia;" and try to put these English boys and girls into the way of becoming sound-hearted, right-minded English men and women, with a pure love for all manly and womanly things, and a taste for natural beauty, and a keen sense of honour, and a real dislike for base language, and a loathing for lying lips, and a sweet and cheery loyalty to the God of the heavens and the earth—the God of the vivid human mind, the sensitive conscience, and the loving heart. And so "feed" the lambs.

That is a charming saying of the old Hebrew poet concerning the Great Shepherd—"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside the still waters." I think our grown sheep want more of that from us—more of the green pastures of religion, and less of the stubble of mere theology—more of the still waters of quiet trust in God, and less of the rushing and sometimes unpellucid torrent of modern criticism. But if the sheep want more of these, what of the lambs? How can they do with the stubble and the torrent? Time enough for their young feet to rough it over the prickly fields, and for their young heads to risk the noise of many waters. For the present, let the sweet old-fashioned green pastures of simple goodness suffice, with the still waters of childlike love and trust in God.

From this it will be gathered, and it is right to gather, that I regard the work of the Sunday school as a purely religious one. At the same time, it is clear that the great end can be reached in many ways. Religious teaching is not necessarily Bible teaching or theological teaching. A shrewd man once said that "too much time is spent in the Sunday school upon theological matters;" and he went on to say that the question, "How old was Methuselah?" might very profitably be exchanged for the more pertinent question, "How old ought a boy to be before he is ashamed of lying?" and that though it may be good for him to know how far it is from Joppa to Jerusalem, it is better for him to know the distance between the feebleness of anger and the manly strength of self-control. But that would be splendid religious teaching; and if reading a tale or writing out a copy can help in that direction, no one need object, only it should never be forgotten that the one permanent object of the Sunday school is to lift up the young people to the light, and to the purer atmosphere of the world, where God and goodness and the beauty of holiness are supreme.

Experiences at Dukinfield, Glasgow, and Leicester.

Human beings, as well as sheep, are gregarious, and like to go in flocks. One of our richest fields, therefore, is unused till we learn the value of common worship, thought, and prayer. And now forgive me if I here become a little personal, and talk somewhat of my own experiences; though, as this is a kind of conference of friends and fellow-workers, this will not be really out of place. About ten years ago these things became plain to me, and ever since I have rejoiced in the discovery that the very brightest and most useful part of our work was that connected with what I have called "common worship, thought, and prayer." At Dukinfield, more than nine years ago, our monthly services, in the dear "Old Chapel" there, were meetings never to be forgotten—at least by me. The spiritual aroma of those delightful afternoons lingers about me still, and I think they were very dear to the young people, for I remember hearing of children who begged to go on that day, in spite of wind and weather—or even, O wonderful! without dinner. There we met together, teachers, and lads and lasses of all ages from nine to nineteen, for a simple religious service, free from all sensational and artificial attractions, and depending only on the old-fashioned delights of praise and prayer, and homely speech, but everything kept as bright and as human as possible. And out of that and kindred movements there came an exodus of over eighty young people into the regular congregation, who from that time formed the most reliable element in a fluctuating evening congregation. In Glasgow, for seven years, I conducted the worship of a "Children's Church" which met every Sunday afternoon. And now I want to tell you the latest experiment in this direction. In addition to reviving, at Leicester, the monthly afternoon service for the scholars, we have tried the experiment of turning the regular morning service, once a quarter, into a service for young people generally. The special charm of this is that the congregation are invited to bring their own children, or to give hospitality in their pews to the young people we can send; and so the old and the young meet together, and I know that as many sheep as lambs feel it good to be there. For myself, I can truly say that no congregation I ever had has seemed to me so truly real, and natural, and comprehensive, as that we get on the young people's day. At these services I have felt as never before how true are the words of Coleridge:—

"He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

On that day too, above all others, we find it indeed good "To walk together to the Kirk,

And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay."

But do not imagine that all our young people on these occasions have belonged to the "elect." On the last occasion we sent in with the rest a few of the worst boys on the face of the earth, and these we scattered up and down the chapel among the good people, who, for that blessed morning, adopted them as their own. And very beautiful it was to see these wild lambs with the tame sheep—in plain words, to see boys, some of whom, a year ago, laughed in my face when I tried to offer prayer, now looking upon everything with respectful interest, and listening to everything with unbroken attention.

Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD moved a cordial welcome to the Rev. P. M. Higginson and Mr. John Reynolds as representing the Manchester District Association; to Mr. H. S. Marriott as representing the North Midland Association; to Mr. Jos. Lupton as representing the West Riding Association; to the Rev. T. Broadrick as representing the Midland Christian Union; to the Revs. J. C. Street and Alexander Gordon as representing the Irish schools, and to any other representatives of Sunday schools from any part of the world. He desired to express on behalf of the Association its deep sense of obligation to kindred societies for the assistance they had rendered during the past year. In the course of the twelve-month many cordial invitations had been received to attend meetings in various parts of the country, and wherever possible deputations had been sent by the Association, which had in every instance been cordially welcomed. As treasurer to the Association, finance was the subject most prominent in his thoughts. He was not going to ask the meeting for subscriptions, the Association stood in no need of pecuniary help. They had plenty of stock to pay off outstanding liabilities; all they wanted was an increased demand for their publications. Now it was sometimes said that the Association, in order to secure a good profit, asked too high a price for its publications. He might assure them such a notion was wholly erroneous, for every book was published at a loss more or less owing to the limited sale. Now, with the view of testing whether there was any truth in the assertion that the demand would be greater if the price were less, he desired to take this opportunity of offering to supply—quite independently of the committee, acting solely on his own account—a substantial order, say for fifty of the Association's publications, at half the published price. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. Professor UPTON heartily seconded the resolution, commending in terms of high eulogism the great and noble work effected by the Association, which he regarded as the herald of that better time when all sectarian differences would be merged into one grand Christian liberal spirit, when they would be glad to come together from all parts of the world calling themselves non-subscribing followers of the son of Mary of Nazareth, and so diffusing abroad that spirit of love and truth with which they were all inspired, and which was the true link between them and the spiritual world.

The greeting was acknowledged by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, Mr. H. S. Marriott, the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and the Rev. C. D. Badland, and their brief addresses were followed by a few words from the Rev. J. Wright, of Birmingham, and the Rev. A. Chalmers, of Cambridge.

PROFESSOR CARPENTER ON THE DISTANCE FROM JOPPA TO JERUSALEM.

The Rev. Professor J. E. CARPENTER, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Hopps for his paper, said he should like to say something of the value of the knowledge of the distance from Joppa to Jerusalem. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) If it were necessary to put knowledge of that kind into competition with that high feeling of morality, that earnest trust in God which Mr. Hopps assured us it was the object of the Sunday school to cultivate, I need not say that there could be no doubt whatever in which direction our efforts must be made. But I think there is still something to be said for the distance between Joppa and Jerusalem. (Laughter.) I remember in a very interesting book, written a few years ago by Baron S—, describing his journey up the Nile and subsequent trip through Palestine, an anecdote somewhat to the point. After his return, the author had a little talk one morning with his gardener as to where he had been, and in the course of his remarks he said, "Well, John, I then went to Jerusalem." "Indeed, sir," said the man, "I thought Jerusalem was only a Bible word." Now, if you can once get into children's heads the distance between Joppa and Jerusalem, you will relieve them from the erroneous impression that the names in the Bible belong to some country which has no reality at all, and no relation to the facts and experiences of their daily life. (Hear, hear.) And it is because even from Jewish antiquities some vividness may be brought to make the Bible a real record of living personal experience that I would still say the place may be found in the Sunday school even for descriptions which may sometimes appear in Teachers' Notes in a somewhat dry and unattractive form, but which nevertheless in the hands of a skilful, trained teacher may be made to clothe the pages of that book in new and brilliant colours. And, believe me, the Bible is a book which must ever be for us the highest record of religious experience, combined with a freshness and an actuality of application which will make it the most effective instrument of that very moral and intellectual teaching for which Mr. Hopps so eloquently pleaded. (Applause.)

The Rev. ELI FAY, of Sheffield, seconded the resolution in a forcible and humorous speech.

The CHAIRMAN said there were many points in the paper with which he thoroughly agreed, and which touched him most deeply. One portion, in particular, he would not readily forget—that in which the speaker had alluded to the incorrigibles, and the way in which we ought to treat them. In connection with their own schools at Leeds they had had three or four of the roughest lads imaginable. At length their conduct had become so bad that their expulsion from school was in contemplation—a system to which he never had and never would consent. If they could not control lads within the walls of the school or home, they would not be able to control them in the outer world. (Hear, hear.) Holding these views very strongly, it had come about that the expulsion of the lads would have been followed by his separation from the school also. The boys had learned the course he intended to take, and when one Sunday afternoon he went up to the school for the purpose of delivering a lecture the lads met him at the door, and took some photographs he was carrying away from him, and taking them into the chapel hung them up for him. This, he knew, was their apology for their conduct. No words passed; no words could pass, the lads themselves would have broken down in the attempt, but he had seen the motive and that sufficed. (Hear, hear.) In eloquent words, Mr. Mathers urged the necessity of forbearance and tenderness towards unruly scholars, who, if properly treated, as a rule turned out the best men and women.

The resolution was then put, and carried with acclamation.

The Rev. J. P. HOPPS, in acknowledging the compliment, observed that if the few suggestions he had thrown out proved of any help to those whom he addressed in their future work, or of benefit to the poor children whom they were all anxious to raise and elevate, he would be abundantly rewarded.

Mr. R. PINNOCK, J.P., Isle of Wight, had much pleasure in proposing a vote of thanks to the Chairman for so kindly presiding over the meeting at such short notice.

Mr. BLESSLEY, of Portsmouth, seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

The Chairman briefly returned thanks, and the proceedings, which had lasted upwards of three hours, and of which the foregoing account is but a summary, then terminated.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

SPIRITUAL PREPARATION FOR THE TEACHERS' WORK.

We have discovered extraordinary powers in nature, and yoked them to our purpose. Air, water, steam, electricity, are giant forces, but after all the mightiest agent is spiritual power. We have all felt it. In the company of men and women who were living so near to God as to be filled with His spirit, we feel subdued, touched with their words, humbled yet lifted into quite a high region. In listening to ministers we find many instructive and interesting, some learned and powerful; but we have heard men whose words seemed simpler than they are, yet who seized on hearts at once, and swayed us as with a Divine power: there was that indefinable something about their look and tone which told us that they had come out of "the secret place of the Most High." That is the kind of power which we as teachers need to exercise. That power can come to us, but can come only out of spiritual preparation.

Perhaps you say, "What can be meant by that?" Is it not enough if I have well studied the lesson, and am prepared to interest, explain, and illustrate it? No, that is not enough if you really wish to be an inspirer of souls. Head may be ready, but you will need to have heart ready also. What you have to say needs to be baptised in a fire of holy feeling, entering into the soul of the children as it comes forth from you warm and glowing. Christ's words seemed such as none other ever spoke, because they welled up from such a fount of holy feeling.

Suppose then that we have this matter of spiritual preparation in serious thought, how shall we best prepare our heart?

It might have been urged upon us that it would come naturally if we laid our life every day in the joy of a near fellowship with God as Jesus Christ himself did: face, voice, and tone would then insensibly catch the likeness and power of Christ. Be all Christians indeed, and the holy force would course through everything we did or said. But soul-culture has several modes. Silent thought aids it. Meditation on the words of prophets, evangelists, and apostles is an important agency. Prayer for our class, remembering each one, and trying to understand each one, as we put them into the light of eternity; prayer with those we desire to bless: these bear on spiritual preparations. Our fathers were mightier than we because they could meditate as well as read; and because they believed in and made a life-business of prayer. Let but our souls be on fire with the constraining love of God, how mightily it would tell on our work, its motives, its patience, its earnestness, and its spiritual tone.

LIGHT AND AIR v. DRUGS.

DR. R. T. TRALL.

Mrs. Rogers lay in her bed,
Bandaged and blistered from foot to head.
Blistered and bandaged from head to toe;
Mrs. Rogers was very low.
Bottle and saucer, spoon and cup,
On the table stood bravely up;
Physics of high and low degree—
Calomel, catnip, boneset tea;
Everything a body could bear,
Excepting light and water and air.
I opened the blinds; the day was bright,
And God gave Mrs. Rogers some light.
I opened the window; the day was fair,
And God gave Mrs. Rogers some air.
Bottles and blisters, powders and pills,
Catnip, boneset, syrups and squills;
Drugs and medicines, high and low,
I threw them as far as I could throw.
"What are you doing?" my patient cried.
"Frightening death," I coolly replied.
"You are crazy?" a visitor said;
I flung a bottle at his head.
Deacon Rogers he came to me
"Wife is a getting her health," said he,
"I really think she will worry through;
She scolds me just as she used to do.
All the people have poohed and slurred;
All the neighbours have had their word;
'Twere better to perish, some of 'em say,
Than be cured in such an irregular way."

HARD TO CONVERT A MOHAMMEDAN.

THE Tartars cannot unconsciously imbibe Christianity as the Finns have done. Their religion is not a rude, simple paganism, without theology in the scholastic sense of the term; but a monotheism as exclusive as Christianity itself. Enter into conversation with an intelligent man (a Finn) who has no higher religious belief than a rude sort of paganism, and you may, if you know him well and make a judicious use of your knowledge, easily interest him in the touching story of Christ's life and teaching. And in these unsophisticated natures there is but one step from interest and sympathy to conversion. Try the same method with a Mussulman, and you will soon find that all your efforts are fruitless. He has already a theology and a prophet of his own, and sees no reason why he should exchange them for those which you have to offer. Perhaps he will show you more or less openly that he pities your ignorance, and wonders that you have not been able to advance from Christianity to Mohammedanism. In his opinion—I am supposing that he is a man of education,—Moses and Christ were great prophets in their day, and consequently he is accustomed to respect their memory; but he is profoundly convinced that, however appropriate they were for their own times, they have been entirely superseded by Mohammed, precisely as we believe that Judaism was superseded by Christianity. Proud of his superior knowledge, he regards you as a benighted polytheist, and may perhaps tell you that the orthodox Christians with whom he comes in contact have three Gods, and a host of lesser deities, called saints; that they pray to idols called Icons; and that they keep their holy days by getting drunk. In vain you endeavour to explain to him that saints and Icons are not essential parts of Christianity, and that habits of intoxication have no religious significance. On these points he may make concessions to you; but the doctrine of the Trinity remains for him a fatal stumbling-block. "You Christians had a great prophet," he will say; "but you deified him, and now you declare that he is the equal of Allah. Far from us be such blasphemy! There is but one God, and Mohammed is his prophet."—Wallace's Russia.

THE LITTLE LOAF.

ONCE when there was a famine throughout the land, a rich man sent for the twenty poorest children in the town to come to his house, and said to them, "In the basket there is a little loaf for each of you. Take it and come back to me every day at the same hour till the good God sends us better times."

Eagerly did the hungry children fall upon the basket, and quarrelled and struggled for the bread, because each wished to have the best and largest; at last they went away without having even thanked the good old gentleman. But Gretchen, a poorly but neatly-dressed little maiden, remained standing modestly in the distance; then she took the smallest loaf, which alone was left in the basket, gratefully she kissed the rich gentleman's hand, and went quickly home.

Next day the children were just as ill-behaved, and the poor timid Gretchen received this time a loaf which was scarcely half the size of the other. But when she came home, and her sick mother cut the loaf open, many new silver pieces of money fell rattling and shining out of it.

The mother was not a little alarmed, and said, "Take the money at once back to the good gentleman, for it certainly got in the dough by accident. Be quick, Gretchen! be quick!"

But when the little girl came to the rich man, and gave him her mother's message, he said kindly, "No, no, my child, it was no mistake; I had the silver pieces put into the smallest loaf to reward you. Remain always as contented, peaceable, self-denying, and grateful. She who would rather take the smallest loaf than quarrel for the larger ones will obtain far richer blessings than even if money were baked into the loaf. Go home now, and greet your good mother very kindly from me."—S. S. Times.

CURIOSITIES.

An Irishman accosted an acquaintance thus: "When first I saw you, I thought it was you; but now I see it's your brother."

A petition was addressed to a lady in Ireland whom Miss Edgeworth knew, which began, "That your poor petitioner is now lying dead in a ditch."

A tipsy fellow struck his nose against a low-placed barber's pole. On looking at it he asked, "what'n thunder 'zat women wi' striped stockings on got agin me?"

Here is a bull which Miss Edgeworth tells us was particularly admired by Lord Oxford: "I hate that woman," said a gentleman looking at one who had been his nurse; "I hate that woman, for she changed me at nurse."

"No, George," she said, in response to his question, "it is not true that a string of new belt-buckles in a shop-window would make any woman lose a train; but," she added, musingly, "sometimes she might have to run a little."

Not long ago the Duke of Argyll heard a young Scotch lady of his acquaintance, in answer to the question, "Do you remember Donald Ferguson?" make the following discriminating reply: "No; I recollect his face, but I don't recollect him by name."

PRESTON AND LANCASTER.—On Whit-Tuesday, the members of the Lancaster Unitarian Sunday School paid their annual visit to the Percy-street congregation, Preston. The day was spent in visiting the Parks and places of interest in the town, such as the Guild Hall and the Reform Club. After tea, a meeting under the presidency of the Rev. Gwenogfryn Evans was held in the chapel. The programme commenced with singing "God of all power and might," by the Percy-street Glee Party. Then Mr. Williamson extended a cordial welcome to the visitors, which was replied to by the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth in a very appropriate speech. Messrs. G. and F. Williamsons gave readings and Messrs. Dutton and Elliott recitations. The Lancaster and Preston Glee Parties rendered several anthems and glees with much taste. Thus a meeting of over two hours was pleasantly passed. A vote of thanks to the Lancaster friends, proposed by Mr. Richardson, and seconded by Mr. Mayor, was carried by acclamation. Mr. Molyneux responded in choice and fitting words, and the evening's proceedings terminated with singing "Sleep, gentle lady."

PATIENCE.

REV. SAMUEL W. DUFFIELD.

With patience sour grapes become sweetmeats, and mulberry leaves turn to satin.—Oriental Proverb.

Calm daughter of the might of God
Large-handed, firm, not prone to speak,
Delighting to make strong the weak,
To lift with those who bear the load.

I long for that I do not find;
It rests above, high out of reach.
Then comest thou, with skill to teach
The better habits of the mind.

I wait uneasily and strive,
Resentful at the motion slow
Of leaves which spread and worms which grow,
And, unproducing, seem to thrive.

But, after all, the grape will round,
Ruddy and ripe, with perfect juice;
And, after all, the worm hath use,
When its cocoon is fully wound.

And then I drink, at length, the wine
Of long-enduring sun and rain,
And wear the rope which I was fain
In other days to seek for mine.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

EXPLORATIONS IN MIDIAN.

THE land of Midian now adds to the store of wonders, and speaks to us with a silent but very distinct voice from a more than traditionary past. Captain BURTON, whose exploits have often aroused astonishment, has returned from an expedition, carried out under the authority of the KHEDEIVE of Egypt, with a view to verify some hints and surmises derived on a previous visit. The discovery of some old worked mines excited inquiry, and it was thought a fuller acquaintance with the land where they were found might have useful and profitable results. From what has been reported this seems likely to be the case, and though it can hardly be expected, as in the cases of California and Australia, that multitudes would rush to a country where a fierce and deceitful people dwell, to attempt what only permission and scientific means can achieve, yet doubtless many imaginations may be excited, and not a little bold enterprise developed. Captain BURTON has thus confirmed the existence of mines of silver, copper, turquoise, besides sulphur beds, salt lakes, and chalcidony. Especially in the south he has come upon considerable traces of gold mining, and has carried to Cairo specimens of the quartz, seamed and filmed with the precious metal for which so many toil and in pursuit of which so many lives have been lost. The discovery comes at an opportune time for the lavish but needy VICEROY of Egypt, and is decidedly appetising in its character. Who knows what further exploration may reveal? The Romans did not exhaust the mines they worked in England. Lead from the Mendips, tin from Cornwall, and copper from Wales, are still in plenty to be obtained. Is it likely then that the former inhabitants of Midian went far into the riches of their rocks? The snowy quartz doubtless holds still large treasure to be crushed out of it; and how far, wide, and deep the possibility of yield may be, none can tell but many may wonder. The question is started: Was Ophir here? Were these mines the fountal sources of that marvellous wealth, in amount nearly as large as our National Debt, that was expended on the Temple? Are we at the places where Solomon drew his treasure to make it so plentiful in Jerusalem?

LIBERAL TRIUMPH IN BELGIUM.

AN event of great importance has occurred in Belgium. There has lately been a revision of of the representative system in that little State, with a view of bringing it into harmony with the changes of the population. Of course, the Government strenuously resisted a reform which was almost certain to be fatal to themselves and their Ultramontane allies, but were at length obliged to concede it. The election under the new laws took place last week. The Liberals gained a victory in Antwerp and Ghent, cities which the Papal party have hitherto held in spite of their unpopularity. The entire result of the appeal to the constituencies is the triumph of the Liberals. In the Chamber of Representatives they will have a majority of ten, and in the senate of three. The elections have been followed by the resignation of the Catholic ministry, which allowed Belgium to be governed on the principles of the Syllabus, and the Romish bishops to take their own course in reference to ecclesiastical and educational matters without let or hindrance. M. FRERE ORBAN has formed a Liberal Cabinet. The defeat of the Church has made a great impression in the Vatican, and the POPE has held long consultations with Cardinal FRANCHI respecting the conduct to be adopted in Belgium.

MEMOIRS OF A DISCIPLE OF THE LORD.

It has frequently been attempted, in late years, to call back in imagination the actual life of the Master; to bring up to our eyes the scenery which he beheld, the people with whom he conversed, the interests and passions of that bygone age, which, through him, has so deeply affected all the ages after it. The most effective of these was undoubtedly the work of Ernest Renan. That biography of the Prophet of Nazareth was, however, to our English taste, at the same time too fanciful and too rational. It did not seem to show an adequate feeling for the profound personality of the Founder of Christianity. Instead of that Nature-deep Spirituality we found there only what the French call esprit. The life of Jesus was made an Idyl to begin with in the Galilee years, and then a matter of the law-courts with a martyrdom disguised under the popular excitement over a supposed criminal. It was certainly a work of much power, and the first of a series which greatly improves in the later volumes, showing the rise of Christianity from the simple lessons of Jesus to the complicated doctrine of the Church.

To pass from Renan's Life of Jesus to the work before us, is like a change from the lively atmosphere of cities to the impressiveness of mountains, deep-set lakes, and agitated rivers. Here there is everything to call forth the sacredest feelings; to awaken and gratify both the imagination and the Spirit.

The work is entitled "Philochristus: Memoirs of a Disciple of the Lord." Philochristus is represented as having been with Jesus during the most momentous events of the public life, and in his old age as coming to Britain, then a Roman province, and writing for the sake of the Christians, who already formed a small community in this island of ours.*

The dedication of the book is in Apostolic terms: "Philochristus, the Elder to the Saints of the Church in Londinium, Grace, mercy, and peace from the Lord Jesus Christ: Forasmuch as almost all those disciples who with me saw the Lord Jesus in the flesh are now fallen asleep, and I myself am well stricken in years and daily expect the summons of the Lord; it hath therefore seemed good to me to bequeath unto you some memorial of Christ in writing; which, instead of my voice, shall testify to you of him for ever."

The style, it will be seen from this, is that of our English New Testament, and the account given of the words of Jesus is very closely taken from the Gospels. Indeed, except one or two phrases gathered from tradition, such as "Verily for the sorrowful I am sorrowful, and for the sick I am sick," no word is put into the mouth of Jesus himself which is not found in one or other of the synoptist Evangelists—Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Some persons are introduced, like Philochristus himself, whose names do not appear in the Gospels. Others, again, who are named in the Gospels, but with little prominence, are represented as characters living, moving and speaking in the foreground of that society which Philochristus knew.

The name "Lover of Christ" was, of course, assumed in later days. His former name was Joseph. He was son of one Simeon, and was born in Sepphoris, the capital city of Galilee, about four years before the death of King Herod. He is thus represented as being nearly a contemporary of Jesus. The mention of Sepphoris as the capital of Galilee at once reminds us how differently things appeared to different eyes in those days. There were two worlds within the little outline of Palestine: the one the native world—what the Jews saw in it and cared for in it; and—more interesting still for us—what those of the Jews who became Christians saw and cared for. Outside of that there was the view taken by the citizens of the Great Empire, whose castles, and palaces, and theatres were planted down on the Holy Soil for the use of the conquerors. Sepphoris was a strong, well-garrisoned, Roman town. Josephus tells how the Jews in their fury rose against the Romans here, and how a great Roman army came upon them and took the city, and burnt it. Of all this the Gospel story knows nothing. The writer of this book may have introduced it here as the birthplace of his hero, to bring forcibly to our minds at the outset the fact that those two different worlds were there—the world we see in the New Testament, and the world we read of in Josephus and the Roman histories and geographies.

The Galilee of those times was full of troubles, the proud spirit of the Jews always chafing against their oppressors. Thus we read here that in the fourth year of this child Joseph "the Rabbi Matthias was burned alive by Herod for causing his scholars to cast down the golden image of an eagle which the King had set up over the gate of the temple of the Lord." Not many months afterwards the Romans marched through Sepphoris in order to bring succour to Sabinus, who was hard beset by the men of Jerusalem in the fortress called Antonia; and the men of Jerusalem fought against them, and the father of Joseph was taken captive and crucified by Varus, the governor of Syria and commander of the troops which had come from Galilee. We read also of the child's recollection of being brought back to Sepphoris after its destruction. The family had fled to the Caves of Arbela, as many of the Galileans then did, and when they came to seek their home, where Sepphoris stood there was not now one house standing: "And I saw," he says, "the bodies of many of my kinsfolk, which lay unburied and crying unto the Lord for vengeance. Yet the Lord sent no avenger."

Afterwards we hear how there stood up about this time divers to lead Israel; but they were no true leaders of the people, and the Lord had not sent them. Athronges the shepherd, a man of great stature, and Simon, one of the servants of Herod, the King, rose up in the South of Judah, but they both perished, and their followers were scattered. Again, about the time of the numbering of the people, when the decree went forth from the Emperor Augustus that all Israel should be taxed, there rose up Judas of Gamala. This was about the 33rd year of the Emperor Augustus. The people came to Judas from all sides; and he taught them that it was not lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, nor to call any man Master save God alone. At that time Joseph (or Philochristus) was some 13 years old, and he saw Judas when, with 1,000 men, he marched into Capernaum, and burned down the House of Customs there, and as he looked on his face and saw the number of his followers, he thought within his heart, "Surely the hand of the Lord is with this man, surely this is the Redeemer of Israel, even the Messiah to whom all the prophets bear witness, that he must rise and judge the land." But five Sabbaths had not passed away before Judas also had been cut off; and all the men that were with him were either scattered to their homes or slain. In such descriptions we are made witnesses of the agitation of the Jewish people, their hope of a deliverance, and their many attempts to follow some likely leader.

The coming of the Baptist John was an event which aroused much questioning in that circle to which Joseph belonged. In the 14th year of Tiberius Cæsar, he says, a rumour went forth that a new prophet had of late appeared, John by name, the son of Zachariah a priest, who was calling the whole of Israel to repent, and to be purified with baptisms, prophesying that the Lord would soon send the Deliverer that was to come. Some said that John himself was the Messiah; others denied it, but said that the Lord had sent down Elias from heaven, and that John was Elias. Many other rumours also were noised abroad, and this rumour prevailed most, that "One from the East would come forth to rule the world," which saying had spread even to Italy and Spain; and we in Galilee, says Joseph, thought that this conqueror from the East would be our Messiah. Some of the earnest spirits among them then held a conference in a little valley between Sepphoris and Nazareth (Sepphoris having been in part rebuilt), when they discussed whether the hour had not now come to rise in greater numbers than ever against the Romans. One speaker painted well the state of the times: "While we sleep," he said, "the heaven spreadeth: Greek cities cover our land: our own cities are being defiled with Gentile abominations. They are stealing from us even our language. No man may earn a living now in Galilee unless he speak Greek. With Greek theatres and amphitheatres, and baths and market-places; with Greek pictures, and images, and feasts, and games; with Greek songs, and poems, and histories, they purpose, by easy degrees, to beguile the hearts of our young men from the religion of their forefathers. Our princes (the Herods) are Edomites in the pay of Rome. Our rich men long for the fleshpots of Rome, and call themselves by the name of Herod (Herodians). Our scribes, our wise men, cry peace when there is no peace, and wink at the payment of tribute. Publicans (taxgatherers) and harlots bring down the wrath of God upon the nation, and go unpunished. All these things are as the meshes of the net wherein Rome is encompassing our city. And lo! the fowler layeth the net, and the silly bird stayeth still." That meeting broke up without any settled resolution, and some of them resolved to go to Bethany, where John baptised, and to see and hear the prophet. John is described as we know him from the Gospel story, but all is here made very vivid and affecting to the eye and mind.

The next incident in the life of Joseph, or Philochristus, is one that has a great significance for us, because it brings forward the connection between the ideas which afterwards prevailed in the Christian Church, and that system of philosophy and Bible interpretation which had arisen in Alexandria. Philochristus now went to Alexandria to pass some time with an uncle, who was one of the large community of Jewish settlers in the capital of Egypt. The Jewish scholars of Alexandria had for a long time been more or less deeply touched with the higher lessons of the Greek sages—especially Plato. And at this time there was a Jew, Philo, whose name stands out in a foremost place in the roll of the world's Great Thinkers. Philochristus was taken to visit Philo, and one of the most interesting chapters of this book records the interview, presenting a clear and beautiful summary of the doctrines of Philo. Philo explained to him that he was not one of them that rejected the law of Israel: he diligently observed it, believing that it contained all knowledge and all wisdom. He considered that Moses was the greatest and most perfect of men, and that he attained unto the very pinnacle of wisdom. As for the wisdom of the Greek, it is but a handmaid in respect of "our" wisdom, even as the slave Hagar was in respect of her mistress and Queen Sarah. Still, when Philo spoke of the Scriptures he said that there were two interpretations of every Scripture. There was first the outer meaning—which is as the body; but there was next the inner Spiritual meaning—which is, as it were, the soul (the principle which Swedenborg adopted and applied). Again, speaking of the Revelation of God, Philo explained that, just as there is in human life the Thing (the Existence or fact) and the Word that revealeth the thing, even so there is on the one hand God—the true God, that which is; and on the other hand the Word of God (logos), who revealeth God to the minds of men. We are here led to the vestibule of the Fourth (or Interpreting) Gospel, and learn whence it was that Christians were taught to speak of the Word which was God, and yet with God, and was the light that lighteth every man who cometh into the world. It was, we are made to see clearly, the Philonism of Alexandria that gave this language to the world.

All these relations and descriptions form the background of the picture into which the Coming One is to be introduced, who should draw the hearts of all men unto him. Philochristus tells us that Jesus of Nazareth was first known to him as he was healing some who were possessed. As healer Jesus came to his mother's house, after which he accompanied Jesus part of the way to Capernaum. Jesus of Nazareth, he says, did not speak many words by the way, but in all things he was different from the Rabbis and Pharisees. He looked on all things, and in all things seemed to see joy and gladness, taking note even of the smallest matters, such as the flowers of the field and the birds of the air, and also of the trees and the cornfields. But most marvellous of all was the manner of his dealing with children. For so it was "that when we were passing by a hamlet about six furlongs from Sepphoris, a little child ran out from the door of a house even under the feet of our asses, insomuch that we had much ado to prevent the asses from trampling down the child. But when I rebuked the child somewhat vehemently, Jesus chid me. And presently, after we had ridden on awhile in silence, he turned to me and bade me always have respect unto little children. 'For,' said he, 'these angels do always behold the face of my Father, which is in heaven.' Then he added words still stranger and harder for me to understand, that 'Except a man were born again and became as a little child, he could in no wise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven.'

But our space will not allow us to present our readers to-day with more from these deeply-interesting pages. We shall, however, return to them once and again. Meanwhile, as to the theological position of Philochristus we have just this indication:—if asked, Why believest thou that Jesus Christ is God? he would reply "(1) Because God is Love, and Jesus is Love; (2) Because God is might, and Jesus is might; and lastly, Because if Jesus was not indeed Divine, then must he needs have been a poor and deluded creature, unfit and unable to do any great work for the children of men. But it was surely a much more divine thing that the Word of God should come into the world as a poor man, and the child of the poor, as if to show that no estate of man is too low to be sanctified by the Divine Word; and that he should subdue all men unto himself not by force nor portents, but by love, patience, and suffering, submitting himself patiently to all the laws of the world; yea, even to the law of death, and yet trampling over them all through the force of righteousness."

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

CHURCH FINANCE.

Our account of the proceedings of the conference of the Association held in the Essex-street Chapel, London, on Thursday the 13th, closed with the report of the paper read by Mr. Frank Taylor, of Bolton, on "Church Finance." A discussion followed the reading of the paper.

Mr. N. M. TAYLER thought that special subscription was the best mode of raising the income of a congregation. No doubt the offertory was a good way of getting at the poor; but he did not think it was a good way of getting at the rich; and though the sense of shame was not the highest sense that a person could have, still he believed it to be a right thing to attack that sense of shame if necessary, and a list of subscriptions was a proper way of doing so. By doing away with special seats they would to a large extent get over the difficulty with regard to class membership. No doubt there should be a minimum rate to constitute membership, and he believed five shillings would be as good an amount as could be imagined; but one member of the church had nothing directly to do with what another member gave. The proper way of looking at it was that there was a fair proportion of a person's income which might reasonably be expected to be devoted to religious purposes.

The Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON said it seemed to him that in ordinary congregations, where the area from which the income to be raised was small in proportion to the amount required, to depend upon an offertory mainly for the income would create a very serious difficulty in the way of benevolent work. The congregation was anxiously and urgently engaged in raising the necessary funds, and they seemed to have neither time nor disposition to raise money for any benevolent work, and as a rule in those congregations where the income depended upon the offertory very little was done that cost money, except supporting the ministry and keeping the doors open. Further, he was sure that the system hindered the growth of congregational feeling. The people came and went, they gave their twopence, and they considered that that paid for the sermon, and there was an end of the whole business. In such congregations there was a lack of real home-like feeling.

The Rev. A. CHALMERS wished specially to mention the plan by which the financial system of the Free Church of Scotland was carried on. That Church was the greatest financial success in Christendom. It was composed of nine hundred congregations, and raised upwards of half a million of money every year, and this could only be done by an admirably worked system of finance. Indeed it was done, as many of its enemies said, by "begging." The plan of the Free Church was that a body of deacons was appointed, each of whom had charge of a small district. In the case of Unitarians he would not use the title of deacon, but would suggest that these districts should be under a member of the Committee. The deacon of the Free Church of Scotland collected the subscriptions of the Sustentation Fund once a month, and very frequently his wife and daughters did this for him. All these sums were handed in monthly to the central office in Edinburgh, and if the usual amount was not forthcoming, a letter of remonstrance was sent from head-quarters, which had the desired effect of keeping up the subscriptions. Of course, the Unitarian body could not carry out any such process of centralisation as that; but he thought the system of dividing the congregations into a number of districts or groups of families might be admirably worked. A large amount of money in the churches of Scotland was collected by means of the plate at the door; and he thought this plan might be introduced into their own churches with great advantage. There was no feeling of disagreeableness about it. The people dropped in their coppers, and sometimes their sixpences and shillings; and one advantage attending it was that the children were trained to the habit of giving, which adhered to them in after life. The great secret lay in teaching the children to give.

Mr. J. H. REYNOLDS, of Manchester, said that his experience of the offertory as a means of obtaining a sufficient amount of funds with which to pay for the services of their several ministers was that it had been an utter failure; in fact, the funds collected by this means in the several chapels in the district fell so miserably short that they could not by any means maintain a minister. He belonged to what he would call the aristocratic Unitarian congregation in Manchester, and the seats had been thrown open, to give those who wished an opportunity of giving; but after watching the matter for three or four years, what was the result financially? There was a large chapel in the very centre of Manchester, with two ministers sufficiently able, he supposed, to attract out of something like four hundred thousand people a sufficient number to hear them, and he had been to the chapel in the evening when there were from seventy to ninety people present, and the addition to the fund was just about sufficient to find money for the Committee to pay for advertising, but the practical point of giving the ministers that which they ought to receive was, he might say, simply nil. He thought that there should be a supplementary fund, to enable the congregation to do what they ought with regard to their ministers.

Mr. RHODES thought that the system suggested of individual members placing themselves on a subscription list seemed to be the right one, as they would contribute what was fair and equitable, having regard to the whole of the circumstances under which they were placed. It must be admitted by all who have observed the tendencies of the age that the attendance at church very much depended on the style of the services. He thought the time was come when, in view of the tendencies of the age, it should be considered whether it would be advisable to make the services in their churches more ornate.

After remarks from the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, Mr. Herbert Bramley, of Sheffield, and the Rev. A. Webster, of Perth,

The PRESIDENT said it was most essential that there should be a most cordial feeling with regard to financial matters between the minister and the congregation. First of all the minister should feel that the congregation should do and were doing their best for him. Confidence would beget generosity. That confidence should be established not only by agreement between the parties at the first, but by every mode of organising that agreement, which was possible. The minister should know the whole resources of the congregation with regard to endowments, funds, and pew rents. He should be assured that he got what was intended for him, and then he would be satisfied; but if a certain sum was fixed as a maximum salary a very uncomfortable feeling would be created if it was not reached. The minister should be given to understand that if there was any increase of the pew rents or subscriptions during his ministry he should sooner or later have the benefit of it. All the members of the congregation should be fully informed of the condition of the funds, by annual statements of the list of subscriptions, the resources of the endowments, &c. Let the congregation be put in perfect harmony with their minister, and a great deal would be done towards encouraging benevolence.

Rev. A. WORTHINGTON then read a paper on THE TERMS OF RELIGIOUS COMMUNION.

The Rev. A. W. Worthington, after a personal reference, touched upon the marked indications of a desire for union that have appeared during the last thirty years, alluding especially to Dean Stanley's comprehension proposal, to the Pan-Anglican Synod, to the Old Catholic movement, and to the Free Christian Union among ourselves. He then proceeded to say that the most recent attempt at a broader religious platform has created considerable excitement during the last twelve months. A section of the Independents is endeavouring to establish religious communion independent of dogmatic agreement. In May last the supporters of this movement expounded their views to a large meeting in the Cannon-street Hotel, and on the next day members of the Established Church and of various Dissenting bodies, including our own, joined together in worship. This movement meets with strenuous opposition, and if it seeks to organise itself into definite shape, it may be forced to secede from the old Independent body. It would perhaps do better to follow the example of the Free Christian Union, and freely confide in the power of God's spirit of truth and love, rather than add another organisation which would only divide in the very effort to unite.

Discussing the terms of religious communion, Mr. Worthington said: They are surely to be sought by us in the pages of the New Testament rather than in the creeds of Christendom, or even in the rules of our own Association. The subject clearly divides itself into two branches, viz. :—(1) The terms of religious communion among those who unite as a congregation of worshippers, and (2) the extent to which such congregations can hold religious intercourse with those who differ in more or less degree from their faith and ritual. The latter question we can alone consider to-day. We have not yet fathomed the wisdom of Jesus, and I recognise in him the very free-est teacher at whose feet we can sit. The New Testament may speak upon this subject with somewhat varying tones; but when we consider that the Jewish Apostles brought a sectarian spirit to the understanding of Jesus, that Paul had to deal with bitter opposition from the Jewish party, and recognise on the other hand that Luke may have been influenced by a desire to combine these opposing elements, we shall be surprised at the united voice with which they declare the broadest terms of religious communion. It appears to me that no one can be a true disciple of Jesus unless he is prepared to hold religious communion even with some who do not call themselves his disciples. For what did Jesus say and do himself? He joined in the worship of the Jewish Synagogue and Temple. He approved the faith of the Canaanite woman who besought him to cure her daughter. The Roman Centurion won the favourable word, "I have not found so great faith—no, not in Israel." He declares that men shall come from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God; and announces as the terms of fellowship with himself: "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother." Obedience to God, which is thus announced as the bond of fellowship, is also the test of truth. "If any man will do God's will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." It is the condition of salvation. "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven."

The distinction, then, of the true child of God is the willingness to do His will. It is certainly not a dogmatic knowledge about God, or even a right knowledge as to His requirements from men, but the desire to do His will. If this be the real test of religious communion, who, we may next ask, is to apply it? The answer is—God! The Saviour's lesson on this point is conveyed in the parable of the tares sown in the field of wheat. The householder forbids his servants to gather and cast out the tares prematurely. The good and the evil are to mingle together in the field of the world till the angels separate them at its termination. The judgment is forbidden even to the servants of the householder—i.e., to the ministers of Christ.

Mr. Worthington proceeded to refer to other teachings of Jesus, and to those of Paul, continuing: The disciples were thus to have the strongest spirit of brotherly love. With all who sought to do the will of God they were to hold themselves in brotherly communion; neither seeking to determine dogmatically what the will of God may be; nor yet judging one another in matters about which a difference of opinion might arise.

But this Christian brotherhood: this abstinence from mutual condemnation of each other's opinions; this recognition of each other's upright will and purpose, even though it should result in different opinions; this unity of spirit amid difference of faith, does not cover the whole ground of religious communion. The act of worship has also to be considered. The lessons of both Old and New Testament strongly condemn idolatry. I suppose no one would contend that we could join in an act of worship with actual idolaters. Our Puritan descent at once raises the question as to whether the use of the crucifix may not be an act of idolatry. There is no need, however, to attempt to draw a nice line of distinction between idolatry and symbolism; for if there be any vital distinction between the Unitarian and the Trinitarian faith, if we recognise that Jesus is a created being, we must hold ourselves apart from any act of supreme worship addressed to him, whether figured on the earth or glorified in heaven. The words of Jesus give us instruction in this matter. "After this manner therefore pray ye, Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name;" and St. John records him as saying, "In that day ye shall ask me nothing." A Unitarian cannot consistently with his faith join in any act of worship which is addressed to Jesus.

However freely, therefore, we may hold ourselves towards our brethren, here is a limit which no spirit of united good wish can transgress. We may hold the spirit of religion to be consistent with every form of theology. We may be sure that God will accept the prayers of all His children by whatever name they may address Him, however imperfectly they may understand His nature, under whatever errors they may conceive His person. We may believe that He will accept the prayers and service which they offer in submission to His will, even though they mistake His requirements; as when He blesses the faith of Abraham, while He forbids the sacrifice of Isaac. We may hold our brother's conduct and opinions no bar to brotherly intercourse so long as they are not opposed to the manifest law of right. We may thus believe him, equally with ourselves, in a position to receive the Divine acceptance and blessing. But no recognised terms of religious communion can be settled between those for whom the object of worship is fundamentally different. The idolater cannot be admitted to communion with those who hold that the living God is an invisible Spirit. Those who believe in the Deity of Jesus, the incarnation of God in a body of created flesh, and those who hold that God is a Spirit not to be seen by fleshly eye, may attribute to their God the same attributes of wisdom and goodness, but their conceptions of His essence and nature are distinctly opposed. You cannot arrange terms for united worship which will entirely satisfy the conscience of both; for to do so you must either bid the Unitarian join in prayer to a created being, and an impersonal Spirit, or you must omit all prayer to two of the persons in the triune Godhead whom the Trinitarian holds himself bound to adore.

It will be understood that in so decisive a statement, to which I have long felt myself reluctantly reduced, I am referring only to definite terms for an organised intercommunion, to a "concordat" that could be arranged between different churches. It is surely possible, however, to establish an occasional union for worship of the Father. It is, I trust, permissible to join occasionally in worship whose expression is not altogether consistent with our own faith, and where religious communion must be partial, and not complete. It is an exquisite pleasure to me occasionally to attend the evening prayer of the Established Church in one of our national cathedrals; but when many years ago I was residing for three months in Wales, where the only accessible English service was the morning prayer of the Establishment, I felt conscientiously compelled to abstain from habitually joining in it. My religious emotions and sympathies have rarely been more deeply stirred than when I stood amid the devout multitudes that knelt at the tinkling of the Sanctus bell in Continental churches of the Roman Catholic faith; but even in such a moment of devotion my worship must have been utterly distinct from that which adored the elevated host as being miraculously changed into the flesh of God the Son. I would gladly arrange for an occasional interchange of pulpits between an orthodox Dissenter and myself; but it must be under the express condition of addressing prayers to the Father only, which would make it an exceptional, however welcome an act.

I find myself led to a somewhat remarkable conclusion, which would justify religious communion wider in extent, but less complete in its character, than might have been anticipated.

In a Jewish synagogue, in an Arab mosque, in the assembly of the Brahmo Somaj, worship would be addressed to a Divine Spirit, conceived of as corresponding in essence, and to a great extent in character with the Father whom we recognise, and probably the form of worship would not greatly conflict with the feelings of a true disciple of Jesus. Yet between the Jew, the Mohammedan, and the Unitarian a very wide distinction of personal feeling, conviction and habit renders any complete unity of religious life practically impossible. On the other hand, those who study the New Testament; whose characters and feelings are imbued with the spirit of its teachings, and whose religious sympathies may be of the closest nature, are practically debarred from any complete and solid union for worship by differences in the form of their theology. The Trinitarian and the Unitarian may be in almost perfect sympathy as to the religious life, but their conceptions of the Deity are so distinct that they cannot, except by special arrangement, which must needs be rare, join together in worship. Even in the recent meetings for religious communion, when the presence of Unitarians was expected, one of the hymns was an adoration of Jesus, and another an invocation of the Holy Spirit.

There may come a time, and I devoutly trust it is not far distant, when these creeds that divide shall be recognised as merely human forms of thought; when the Lord, whom they seek, with faltering tongue, to define, shall be seen to be more than they; when men can understand, with Jeremiah, that they must no longer forsake the fountain of living waters, and hew them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water; when they shall leave God free to call each of his children as he will, and, like Eli, bid the listening ear of devotion to reply at once, "Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth." There may come a time when men shall trust God to lead their souls into communion with Himself, to let his word declare His truth, and his Spirit to bear witness with their own, and teach them [how] to pray. Then they will recognize that the same God worketh all things in all men, and will be ready to kneel devoutly, hand in hand with every worshipping brother, with the utterance of spiritual worship, in the attitude of expectant reverence; and to feel that such sympathy in prayer enhances its truth and efficacy beyond measure. If the time seem far away, let us hail every effort that may be made to hasten its approach. I believe that we, as Unitarians, would willingly run forward to meet any such advances; and if I have thought it my duty to utter a word of caution lest we may forget, in our delight at such proposals, anything that is due to our Father and our conscience, I would also range myself in the front rank of those who are ready to offer and to grasp the right hand of an honest and sincere fellowship with any brother in the family of the Universal Father.

The Rev. C. WICKSTEED said his opinion was that the term of communion amongst the creatures of God were not to be found in any existing Church or in all existing Churches combined, but in the spirit of Jesus Christ himself. No doubt a portion of the spirit has been embodied in Churches, and that was the way in which the work of the world and the work of good had been practically promoted. But Jesus Christ had been degraded by having been made the head of a great sect, and if Christians were in any way separated from any other branch of the human family they were not acting, or thinking, or feeling, in the spirit of our Lord. The terms of communion established by Jesus Christ were the communion of God with His creatures and His creatures with God, and if he appeared at this moment upon earth there was not a living creature to whom his spirit would not be bound by great affinities—not one who might not at once become his disciples. He would not confine himself to any existing Church, to any existing religion, to any existing nation. The spirit of Christ was co-extensive with the human family. Religious communion should not stop short of the communion of the sons of God with their Father in Heaven—the terms of communion laid down by Christ himself.

The Rev. H. SOLLV thought there was a distinction to be made between general religious communion and Christian communion. He could not understand how there could be Christian communion except on some dogmatic basis. Christian communion had been spoken of as if it was to be based upon obedience to God in reference to the great commandment of love to God and love to man; but these existed long before Christ appeared upon the earth. They were the practical bases of the Jews communion, but the Christian communion was a distinctly new departure, and had reference especially to the relation of the disciples to Christ, acknowledging his authority both as a ruler and as a teacher. Men must always have various opinions; but where there was a deep true love and allegiance to Christ that ought to be sufficient to unite all his disciples; but even that must be placed on the dogmatic basis of his authority as the Christ, the Son of God.

The Rev. M. C. GASCOIGNE said the spirit of sectarianism had rendered Christianity obnoxious to many minds, and would do so until the world had learned the sublime principle "If ye are my disciples love one another." This, in his opinion, was the only mode in which the name of Christ could be made a sacred name, when all men should be as brothers recognising Christ as the head of the family, worshipping in the true spirit of love and charity, the one only living and true God.

Mr. T. C. CLARKE said it would be a most admirable result of the Conference if they expressed a feeling of warm sympathy with those fine-hearted men who had lately in the metropolis and elsewhere been endeavouring to widen the bounds of Christian communion. He thought that the Association should show their deepest sympathy with those men who were struggling amid much unpopularity and semi-martyrdom among their own sect, and he was convinced that the younger men of the Congregationalist body were to a large extent in sympathy with them. They wanted to be cheered by the enlightened thought of the country. It was the older men who were trying to crush out the movement in the Congregational body. The great practical aim of a meeting like that should be to give a warm expression of Christian sympathy without any reference whatever to dogmas, to those men who were struggling to promote what would be a great social benefit to the religious opinion of the country. There was amongst them an earnest loving piety and devotion which Unitarians as a body would do well to imitate.

The Rev. A. B. CAMM said that if the Congregationalists who regarded Unitarianism as cold found that there was some recognition on the part of Unitarians of those truths that were enshrined in the old dogmas, that were still the life of their spiritual blessing, there would be a broader basis for union than had yet been found. If their friends who had such an aversion to the name of Unitarianism could be led to feel that it did not only mean anti-Trinitarianism, but the great principle of the correlation of natural forces and spiritual forces, the gathering up of all that was good in all the systems past and present, he believed there would be a broader basis found for the communion which was one of the finest tendencies of the age.

The Rev. R. SPEARS said that many Unitarians were not prepared to say that all Christian societies should be formed upon an undogmatic basis, and, therefore, they could not enter into full sympathy with the gentlemen who were forming the nucleus of the movement which had been alluded to; but there was one thing every Unitarian could do, they could worship with men every where, with every sect, and every nation—with the Jew and with the Mohammedan.

Professor EVERETT said that in America he knew of no common general movement towards any form of religious union between Unitarians and other Christian people, but the lines of distinction were slowly fading out.

The Rev. E. B. WILSON (of Salem, Mass.) said as the discussion had gone on he had felt anew what he always felt at home—how safe it was to trust to their highest and deepest emotions in regard to a matter of this kind. His own thoughts had been almost precisely expressed by Mr. Wicksteed. If he desired to follow most closely the dictates and spirit of Christianity he could find no other clue so clearly indicating its essence as those great guiding emotions of love to God and man. These things were very much a matter of temperament. He had none of that fear of vagueness which seemed to haunt so many, nor did he feel the anxiety of exactness of definition on these points. He began to suspect himself whenever he began to value definitions too highly—he suspected that something of the great natural world was to be excluded by these definitions.

The Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON having replied, the CHAIRMAN said there was extreme difficulty in arriving at any statement as to the terms of religious communion; and the difficulty he thought arose from trying to establish a system before a clear idea was formed as to what was intended. The religious question underlay it all; he knew persons and Churches in which the idea of religious communion existed; but when these instances became sufficiently numerous, no doubt some terms would be furnished, but those terms would not be arrived at in a hurry.

Mr. H. BRAMLEY proposed a vote of thanks to the readers of the papers.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER seconded the motion, which was agreed to, and the meeting terminated.

THE SOIREE.

MR. HERBERT NEW'S RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK.

On Thursday evening upwards of three hundred guests sat down to a collation in the Alexandra Palace; HERBERT NEW, Esq., presided.

The usual loyal toast having been patriotically responded to—

The CHAIRMAN said it had been his happiness at the present meetings of the Association to hear of its increased prosperity in the abundant extension of its useful work. The Association had now been placed on a wider basis than ever before; those who lived in the different provinces had been encouraged to form themselves into separate societies in order that they might do their work with increased strength. Unitarianism was a useful and recognised power all over the country. He trusted that the future of the Association would be one of extended usefulness and constant active work. He for one did not believe that Unitarian was an extinct word, or a word that had lost one item of its most important meaning. It was said with truth, that the Unitarian body was not definable, and that they were all more or less anxious to shake of the imputation of sectarianism. They were not distinctly definable; they had no common organisation which represented their Churches, and they did not require one. They stood upon a basis of distinct independency, and they did not choose to delegate any portion of that independency to any body of men whatever—(applause). But the report showed that the propagandism of particular notions formed but a small part of their work. Their object was to assist to establish assemblies for the pure worship of God and the open and free recognition of Christianity everywhere where people would gather together and seek their aid and assistance. Not merely was there liberal and open thought, but pure and free worship, for unless the worship followed the thought, he for one should not feel disposed to go after it—(hear). They must work out their faith in all its lines with the greatest simplicity and the greatest earnestness for religious purposes. They had done this from age to age, and it had come to pass that wherever heretics had turned up the stigma of Unitarianism in some form or other had invariably attached to them; but they were now living in an age when it was no longer necessary for orthodox religions to show forth the doctrine of the Trinity as an essential one—(applause). This Unitarianism was a thing which they had felt bound to support and to stand by, and in maintaining the name of which he wished the Society all success in the future. The position of Unitarians to the Established Church was that they were for the present Dissenters; but this was an ecclesiastical and not a doctrinal one. For the most part, he believed that the members of the Unitarian body were not desirous that they should continue Dissenters. Some looked for the principle of wide comprehension, by which the Church would be what he would call vague enough to include everybody who was either indifferent to the forms of religious doctrine or who wished to find a shelter for a profession of their own. He did not look forward in that direction, because he believed there must be honesty of thought in order to secure depth of religion, both at the present time and in all time coming. (Applause.) Some of them joined with their Dissenting brethren in endeavouring to promote the separation of Church and State—(applause)—and he might say that that purpose openly and honestly avowed by Dissenters everywhere had come to be regarded by a great many Churchmen as not a declaration of hostility towards their religious interests. He believed their Church friends—if he might call them so—were willing to recognise that they themselves would have great advantage if they joined in loosening the bond he had alluded to. That bond would be loosened, he believed, not from action from without, but from the operation of causes acting within the body of the Church; and it was most important, when a great body of that kind was to break up, the Dissenters should be prepared to watch the progress of disestablishment in order that justice and equity might be done to the whole nation. (Applause.) Having alluded to the relations that subsisted between Unitarians and the different sections of the Established Church, he then alluded to the proceedings of the Independent body, and their action with regard to the late Leicester conference. He described them at that time as being in a state of panic, and he looked with honour and esteem to the position taken up by Mr. Baldwin Brown on that occasion. (Applause.) The competition of heresy on the one hand would lead to the competition of orthodoxy on the other. They were both wrong, and the sooner they were reconciled on a firmer basis the better. They all wished for the widening of the basis of religious worship, and their highest aspiration was for that time to arrive when all should gather before the throne of God a multitude whom no man can number, when all those defects, differences, jealousies, heresies, and orthodoxies would pass away. But the widening of the basis of religious communion between the Independents of the older and the newer school and between themselves might become a fact, and in some instances it had become a fact. But what was their duty in regard to this? They must first show sympathy with the whole body; in fact, they must make this religious communion before they began to discuss the terms of it. He believed that if they took a strict Protestant Puritan principle into their habits, thoughts, and feelings, they would be even freer than they were in some respects, and would find a large body of persons ready to sympathise with them on purely religious and not on secular grounds. There was, in his opinion, a defect at present in their body as to the great principle of faith. They were also defective on the side of worship. He did not like to hear preachers invariably judged by their sermons. Some preachers whom he most admired he had judged by the very simple test of reading the Scriptures, which convinced him that the man had felt the power of the Scriptures himself, and was reading it to others through his own heart. If they were satisfied with seeing crowded churches and with having their external senses impressed, and if these were to be put as factors in their religious belief and habits, they were in a very dangerous condition. With all his heart he desired to see that respect for public worship which he remembered as a child. They had yet to make the poor feel that their religion was something not merely for them, but common to them. They ought to have the poor amongst them, and the Sunday schools were the means at present of reaching them. They ought to take up their position among the churches of Christendom as having the poor for their Christian brethren, as having worship as a means of keeping alive their religious life, as having a belief that the honesty of a personal faith is the living factor, as having an assurance that they should be a very small part of that gathering together of the worthy and the true unless their methods became nobler, their ideas larger, their love deeper, and all their actions and associations tinged by a pure and perfect Christianity. (Applause.)

Dr. ASPLAND proposed the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over," and in doing so referred to Lord John Russell, who, full of years and honours, had just passed away. (Applause.) Looking abroad, there were many things that were very cheering. In France especially, a great conspiracy against liberty had ignominiously failed, and afforded great ground for hope that at last that country was about to enjoy a period of freedom and prosperity. (Applause.) At home, the state of things in respect to civil liberty was not so satisfactory as it might be. Certainly, at present, England was enjoying the blessings—if blessings they were—of personal government to an extent which was somewhat unusual. (Laughter.) All that was permitted to the people now was to shut their eyes and see what Lord Beaconsfield would send them. (Laughter.) He did not think that civil liberty was in any danger, but it was necessary to be watchful, and when once the attention of the English people was directed to the necessity of preserving their liberties, the appeal to them would not be made in vain. (Applause.)

The Rev. H. W. PERRIS proposed "Prosperity to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association." He had many personal grounds for being deeply interested in the work of the Association. It was to him the large and general expression of forms of worship, and of liberty of religious association, which he had found after a temporary life of Christian ministry in a religious body of a more restricted range. It also served to symbolise the religious freedom in which they all so much rejoiced.

The Rev. H. IERSON acknowledged the sentiment.

The Rev. J. C. STREET proposed a vote of thanks to the two ministers who conducted the religious services in Essex-street Chapel on Wednesday morning, and in doing so spoke highly of both the devotional service and the sermon.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, having gratefully acknowledged the kind sentiments which Mr. Street had expressed,

The Rev. W. BINNS returned thanks for the kind way in which the sermon he had preached had been spoken of. It seemed to him that Unitarians had in many respects improved their position during the last few years. He did not think that any of them would care about defining their limits, because they seemed so wide that they would not really know where to fix the boundaries. No doubt they were all, in an historical sense, Christians, and they might fairly style themselves Christians, and personally he would look upon it as a very absurd thing to try to break loose altogether from their spiritual ancestry. He supposed that some kind of word other than Unitarian, which he considered etymological, philosophical, and historical—wider even than Christian—would better define their condition. He was not there, however, to throw any apple of discord amongst them; because, if he remembered mythology rightly, the original apple of discord was thrown among questionable people. Juno wanted to be a domineering wife, and Minerva was rather cantankerous, and Venus was slightly loose. (Laughter.) He should leave all this on one side, and should not attempt to define the sense in which he himself understood these words. It was unnecessary for him to do so. This was certain, that they were all Christian Unitarians in the general sense of the word. He believed they were all at one for the establishment of a free theology. All their representative men and financial organs said this. The Herald, which, according to its editors, had now alighted on a heaven-kissing hill, proclaimed that from week to week; and the Christian Life proclaimed that as the basis on which it rested; and in quest of it the Inquirer ransacked the whole world of scientific and philosophical thought; and the Theological Review every quarter sheds down mystic beams of light from the place where its brilliant and untheological editor dwells. (Laughter.) He honoured all those people and every man that had waged a long complicated war with speculation and philosophy, and so endeavoured to build up a scientific theology. All they had a right to insist upon with respect to religious theories was that they should be regarded as stepping-stones towards a higher truth. No theory presented merely as a theory, so long as it did not profess to be conclusive, ever tried his own patience; it only put him out when the people who had found that particular theory said, "Oh, this is the final goal." As a labourer in scientific theology he protested against the doctrinal system of finality, even though it professed to stamp with infallibility the faith which was dearest to his own soul, for he hoped and trusted that God had not finished his educational work either with him or any one else. Mr. Binns closed a long and excellent speech by observing that Unitarians found it possible to follow their religion in harmony with a free mind. They could trust the perfect love of God which casts out fear; they could work for the establishment of a scientific theology; and although they could not be permitted to see the Temple arise, yet they felt it would arise at the time to which the world was hastening when so many bad things would pass away, and when so many good and better things would take their place. For the rest—if he might venture upon such an assertion—

"The Monarch and the Anarch will pass away,
And the dawn will break, and morn awake
In the light of a better day."

(Loud applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then, in the name of the Association, welcomed the visitors, mentioning specially the names of Mons. Le Pasteur Dide, from Paris; Mr. William Kay, from Adelaide, South Australia; the Hon. Mr. Everett, of Harvard College, Cambridge; and the Rev. Mr. Willson, of Massachusetts. There was, he said, a brotherhood amongst Unitarians everywhere; but this was especially the case between English Unitarians and their brethren in America.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN FRANCE.

M. DIDE, in reply, spoke in French to the following effect: I have the pleasure and the honour to salute the English Unitarians in the name of the liberal Protestants of France, and especially in the name of the liberal Protestants of Paris. Many sympathies and remembrances unite us. You have been for us, in the midst of our struggles and our trials, the best of friends and the most devoted of brethren. Athanasius Coquerel was accustomed to say that he found himself at home when he was with you. Among you, indeed, he found sincerity and elevated convictions, an indomitable love of truth, desire for progress in all its forms, hate of fanaticism, of hypocrisy, and of spiritual tyranny. After telling you of our affectionate and grateful feelings towards you, it is my duty to speak of what Protestantism is doing in France, and of important progress. We are but small in number—a few thousands only amidst forty millions of people, but we are great in influence. Of the nine ministers who guide the destinies of our dear French Republic, five are Protestants. In the academies, in the high administrative functions, in the arts, in the great industries, we find the Protestants. Such men as M. Taine, the illustrious author of the History of Literature in England, have their children baptised by liberal pastors; M. Renan, the author of the Life of Jesus, sends his daughter to our friend Etienne Coquerel for a course of religious instruction. These are signs for rejoicing. But there is the reverse of the medal. Those Protestants, who, united, could transform France, are divided—tear each other to pieces. They are the one to the other as the Capulets to the Montagues. Their best forces are lost in sterile and grievous quarrels. We hope, nevertheless, that these things will take another aspect, and that justice shall also be done to the liberals who have so long been persecuted. To encourage us in passing through the trials which yet remain to us, I solicit anew your friendship. It has been of service to us in the past, it will be good and helpful to us in the future. Such is my prayer, and that of all your friends in France. Your applause assures me that we are right in counting upon your fraternal affection.

Mr. Wm. Kay, from Adelaide, also replied, and gave some interesting details as to the progress of Unitarianism in Australia.

The Hon. Mr. EVERETT also responded. He said that if the question was asked in America, of any cultivated Unitarian, who the persons were who contributed most to modern Unitarianism, as it existed in that country, he would give the names with little hesitation, of Channing and Martineau; Channing had laid the foundation and Martineau had been able to build upon it. With regard to the Unitarian life in America, he would simply say that was very much the same as in this country, and that they were working more harmoniously than they had for years.

The Rev. E. B. WILSON, of Salem, Mass., also replied, and spoke of the warm feelings the Unitarians in America entertained towards their brethren in England.

A vote of thanks was then passed to the stewards, on the motion of J. T. PRESTON, Esq.

Mr. BICKNELL, the President for the ensuing year, then took the chair, and after a brief address acknowledging the honour conferred upon him, he proposed a vote of thanks to the retiring President, which was duly acknowledged, and the meeting separated at nine o'clock.

MINISTERS' CONFERENCE.

The proceeding of the Anniversary week were brought to a close by an exceedingly pleasant open meeting of the London Ministers' Conference, at Dr. Williams's Library. There were about forty ministers present, presided over by the Rev. Dr. Sadler. The proceedings of this Conference are always regarded as private, and therefore, much to our regret, we cannot report the very valuable and interesting discussion which took place; but it is permissible to record that a paper was read by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., on "Some Changed Aspects in our Ministry," and that the speakers were the Revs. A. Chalmers, J. Worthington, R. A. Armstrong, A. W. Worthington, E. B. Wilson, and H. Solly.

During the meetings, in addition to the names we gave last week, there were present H. Y. Brace, financial secretary, and the following vice-presidents: Lady Bowring, Miss Anna Swanwick; Revs. Charles Wicksteed, B.A., Dr. Sadler; Messrs. F. Collier, E. Lawrence, D. Martineau, R. Pinnock, and J. Troup; also, the Hon. W. Everard, and Mr. W. Kay, of Adelaide, Australia; Sir Rowland and Lady Wilson, Drs. Aspland, Haward, Higginson, and Longstaff; Revs. Professor Everett, Cambridge, U.S.A., J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., C. B. Upton, B.Sc.; Revs. J. T. Whitehead, Dendy Agate, B.A., James Pantou Ham, M. C. NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

THE annual meeting of this Assembly was held at Southport yesterday. The day was fine, and the chapel was crowded. The devotional service was impressively conducted by the Rev. C. C. Coe, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. C. Lunn, from Hebrews, xi., 1—"Faith is the evidence of things not seen." The preacher said we were not here to-day to re-assert our principle of liberty: that stood unchallenged. We had found no flaw in our orders. The question of the moment was that between those who were satisfied with a purely natural explanation of the universe and those who recognised beyond the natural sphere, though nowise in opposition to it, another and a higher—the supernatural. The discourse was an able and effective vindication of the supernatural element in man's being, realising by faith the truths of God and Immortality.

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

ACCRINGTON DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. The fourth conference in connection with this association for the session 1877-8 took place at the Burnley, Trafalgar-street Schoolroom, on Saturday last, when about forty persons were present. After tea, the president, Mr. Peter Bibby, took the chair, and made a few introductory remarks: after which, Mr. John Heys, of Manchester, read a paper on "An outlook on our position as Sunday-school teachers," wherein he pointed out the difficulties that the teachers had to contend with in the state of transition through which our schools are passing. He also laid down several suggestions, which, if practically carried out, teachers might see their way to make the Sunday school a more beneficial institution than perhaps it has been in the past. One suggestion was that collective lessons should be given in place of class lessons; and he urged that the introduction of more singing between lessons would tend to interest and bring out the religious element in our scholars. The meeting was addressed by the President, the Revs. W. Matthews, H. S. Solly, M.A., Messrs. John Mackie, Anderton, and Hartley. After a vote of thanks to Mr. Heys for his instructive and most valuable paper, the conference was brought to a close by a reply from Mr. Heys, the singing of a hymn, and the benediction.

COLYTON.—A respected correspondent writes to us in reference to recent statements as to the population of this town and the attendance at the Unitarian Sunday school. The last census, he says, makes the population of Colyton, inclusive of the village of Colyford, to be 2,500. He doubts the accuracy of the figures given by Mr. Dare, as representing the number of children attending the Sunday school; but the question here assumes too much of a personal form for our columns.

DEWSBURY.—A tea party was held on Saturday, June 8th, to bid farewell to the Rev. J. H. Smith before leaving our church for Sydney, New South Wales, where he is to take charge of the Unitarian pulpit. Invited friends of neighbouring towns visited us on this occasion. After tea, an artistically-written address, expressing the thanks of the congregation to Mr. Smith for his valuable services during the years of his ministry, was presented to him. Speeches, songs, and pianoforte recitals followed, and finally Mr. Smith spoke in eloquent words, reviewing the years of his pastorate, concluding by bidding the assembly good bye. On Sunday, June 9th, at the evening service, Mr. Smith preached his farewell sermon to a full congregation.

HUDDERSFIELD: FITZWILLIAM-STREET CHURCH.—The Sunday-school anniversary, with assistance of the Philharmonic Society's orchestra, came off duly last Sunday. The church was full in the morning, in the evening to overflowing full, benches having to be provided. Great satisfaction was expressed at the improvement of the service by the orchestral addition. The offertory music was especially taking. Hopes were freely expressed that this union of choir and orchestra and organ would become an oft-repeated exercise in the devotions of the church. We regret to say the collection can hardly be considered commensurate with the size and character of the congregation assembled—being but £7. 8s. However, the state of trade may explain and justify.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Since September last a literary class, for the study of English authors, has been held in connection with the above place. The session was opened by the Rev. J. J. Wright reading a paper on "Books: how to choose and how to use them." In beginning the literary class it was carefully explained to all members that the object of meeting together was not merely elocution and dramatic recital, but rather an earnest attempt to understand and appreciate the mind and heart of an author. This aim has been kept in view throughout the year. The meetings have been well attended by both old and young people. They have read and studied together from twenty to thirty shorter poems of Longfellow, Shakspeare's "Macbeth," and the whole of Tennyson's "In Memoriam." This latter study, it is felt, has been quite an education in itself. Last Tuesday week the year's work was brought to a close by the members meeting to take tea together; after which Mr. Wright read a paper, covering the whole ground gone over, and explanatory of the plan and details of the "In Memoriam."

LIVERPOOL: UNIVERSITY DISTINCTION.—Mr. T. Thorneley, LL.B., of Liverpool, who was the senior in the history trips of 1877 and second in the law trips of 1876, has been elected a Whewell scholar in moral philosophy and international law in the University of Cambridge. The value of the scholarship is £50 per annum, and it is tenable for four years. Mr. Thomas Thorneley is the son of Mr. James Thorneley, a well-known Liverpool Unitarian.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—At the last committee meeting of this institution, of fifteen candidates for admission, eight were admitted—namely, Messrs. Francis Martin Blair, of Raloo; William Davies, of Aberdare; William Fielding, of Ballymena; Peter Holt, of Astley; Alfred Lancaster, of Padham; William Parry, of Carmarthen; James Ruddle, of Trowbridge; and Harry Bodell Smith, of Leicester. In view of the fact that the Board will, during the next session, which commences in September, have the unprecedented number of twenty students, we are confident that our readers will willingly render it the increased support, without which it will be wholly unable to meet the enlarged demands upon its funds.

WHITBY.—The Unitarian Chapel at this place was re-opened for divine worship on the 16th inst., after having been closed for the annual cleaning. The preacher was E. Wiseman, Esq., of York; and the day being Trinity Sunday in the calendar of the orthodox, he discoursed in the morning from I. Cor., viii., 6—"To us there is but one God, the Father;" and in the evening from Matt., xxii., 42—"What think ye of Christ?" The congregations were good (that of the evening much above an average), and included several orthodox friends, chiefly men, who were most attentive. The sermons were argumentative and eloquent, and such as must be most powerful in the shaking of the dry bones of orthodoxy, and the giving of life to those who are asleep in the arms of their well-to-do mother church as by law established in this realm.

Letters were read from Germany, Holland, and France, and it was "That the Meeting recalls with satisfaction the numerous civil and religious reforms which have been effected in this country during the last half century, but that it cannot consider the great work of Liberal Reformation complete so long as any vestige remains of civil privilege on account of religious beliefs, whether in regard to endowments or fellowships in the chief National Universities, or the allowed teaching of denominational creeds in schools supported in whole or in part by public money, or the exclusion of Dissenters as such from the free use of the parochial burying-grounds, or the national maintenance of public worship in connection with any favoured Church or religious sect."

"That the thanks of the Meeting be presented to the Rev. James Panton Ham for his kindness in allowing the use of the Chapel for the Anniversary Meeting of the Association."

DOING AND SAYING.

The present Lord Derby is credited with the shrewd dictum that the reason why boys of the higher classes are better educated than those in a lower social position is not that they learn more, but that they learn less.

Abraham Lincoln told one of his friends, William H. Hannah, that he never could bring himself to believe in eternal punishment; that man lived but a little time here; and that, if eternal punishment is man's doom, he should spend that little time in vigilant and ceaseless preparation by never-ending prayer.

The Ritualists, the Rev. Dr. West announces, have not the slightest intention of allowing themselves to be "squeezed out" of the Church by the Bishop of Gloucester, or by all the Episcopacy combined. On the contrary, they will not rest content until they have secured the repeal of the Public Worship Act, the popular election of bishops, and their expulsion from the House of Lords. We have heard speeches of this kind before: they are simply a means of giving relief to angry feeling, and of educating the public mind as to the best means of getting rid of grievances.

The Old Catholics have abolished the rule of compulsory celibacy. A conservative section have all along resisted a change which must so greatly widen the breach between themselves and Ultramontanists. But the majority of Old Catholic laymen have come to think the wider the breach the better. Herr Eckhard, bank director of Mannheim, spoke for them at the Bonn Synod, at which the matter was settled, when he said that it was not enough merely to protest against Infallibility; it was necessary to make the priesthood independent of Rome, and to abolish celibacy would be an important means to that end.

Earl Granville, presiding at the distribution of prizes to the successful students in the North London Collegiate and Camden Schools for Girls, expressed his opinion that very large numbers of women would be ready to show that they had the ability, industry, and instruction which would enable them to claim degrees from the London University. They were aware that to this time they had given no degree, but they had had examinations, and he was informed that very little difference was observable in the standard arrived at by the two sexes. His belief was that the time would come, if it had not already, when men would know how to appreciate those of the other sex who had fitted themselves, by industry and by study, to become really useful members of the community to which they belonged.

The fiftieth anniversary of the opening of University College falls within this year. It is intended to celebrate the occasion by a gathering of members of the corporation, present and past professors and masters, old students of the college and school, and other friends and benefactors of the institution, to be held within the precincts of the college on Tuesday, July 9th, at one o'clock p.m. The Right Hon. Earl Granville, K.G., Chancellor of the University of London, has kindly accepted the invitation of the president, council, and senate to attend and lay the first stone of a further extension to the college buildings, and preside at the luncheon; and the presence is expected of many other persons of distinction interested in the welfare of the college and in the promotion of university education.

Cardinal Manning in opening the church of St. Albans and St. Stephen—the first Roman Catholic Church in the town of St. Albans since the Reformation—said he had no heart for controversy. He loved England and English people too well to have the slightest disposition to sharpen his tongue. He did not abstain, however, from protesting against what he termed the "modern deception" by which men were taught to use the word "Catholic" not in the sense of expressing that which was identical throughout the world. We should like to know on what authority Cardinal Manning translates the word Catholic by "identical," but if he may be allowed to rise the latter word for the former, we can only say that High Mass at some of our National Churches has only too much appearance of being identical with that of the Cardinal's own communion.

Mr. W. Rathbone, M.P., speaking at Leicester at the opening of a school for the higher instruction of girls, said there was a most narrow, unmanly, ungenerous, and from an economical point of view very unwise, and even acrid opposition to such schemes as that in a great many parts where there were ample funds, and where such schools were much wanted. He could not understand the ground on which narrow-minded people proceeded. He felt inclined to give same reply to them that was once made by Gibson, the great sculptor. His uncle had a great objection to people wearing long beards, and he was descanting upon the ugliness of a great beard at a time when these things came into fashion. "Well," said Mr. Gibson, "all I can say is this, if you choose to differ from your Maker on a question of taste, I have nothing further to say." All he could say to those who opposed the establishment of girls' schools was, "If you differ from your Maker in a matter of social economy and reform, I have nothing further to say."

A VISIT TO CHICAGO.

It is not many of us who are fortunate enough to visit Chicago, that wonderful city of the West, and of the many to whom the names of Robert Collyer and Brooke Herford are dear and familiar. There are, perhaps, few who have ever seen, or may ever see and hear them, in their own churches in that city. To these it may be interesting to hear something of them and their work out there in the West; and I propose, therefore, to give a brief account of my visit there a few months ago, chiefly in reference to the Rev. Brooke Herford and his church—the Church of the Messiah.

I would first speak of American churches in general as I have found them. The difference between us and our American brethren in these matters is very marked, and I must confess it seems to me that we might, with great advantage to ourselves, take a considerable leaf out of their book—in some particulars at any rate.

The buildings themselves compare very favourably with ours; if not, perhaps, as large or as beautiful in the exterior, the interior I have found superior in many ways. Let us take Mr. Collyer's for example. It is very fine, the largest of our Unitarian churches I have ever seen. It is carpeted throughout, the aisles are spacious, and the seats luxurious and roomy, furnished with a plentiful supply of books for the service. There is no pulpit, but a raised dais, with a large reading desk, around the base of which, throughout the year, plants are tastefully arranged. Upon the desk stand two reading lamps, carefully adjusted to suit the reader.

Most of the light for the church is derived from a large chandelier suspended from the roof. Above the dais is the gallery, where the organ stands, and from which the choir sings. In all the churches I have visited in the States the music, both vocal and instrumental, is excellent. In Mr. Collyer's church the organ is really grand, and I am told that before the fire they had a finer one still.

The choirs are well chosen, for the most part professional, in some cases very large fees being given. Twice or three times in the service selections are sung by the choir alone, either as solos or duets, &c., and the voices are often so beautiful that it is quite a musical treat. In the hymns the congregation joins, so that there is no lack of heartiness in the singing. This is especially the case at Mr. Collyer's church, and the service there is most delightful and impressive.

The Church of the Messiah is neither so large nor so fine, but the building itself is very large, there being many rooms in connection with it, such as the Pastor's study or library, and the committee rooms. There is one large room where the Sunday school is held, another where the Ladies' Industrial Benevolent Society meets once a week. I went there one day, and found the ladies at work. It was a sight to be admired, and a good example for many ladies of our English congregations. There were about 15 ladies—on the average there are as many as 30 present—at work in good earnest, cutting out material and "fixing" dresses, quilts, aprons, &c., some working at machines, of which three were kept going all the time. They meet at about 10.30, I believe, and stay till late in the afternoon. Lunch is contributed by the ladies in turn, and served by them at mid-day, hot coffee being prepared on a stove in an adjoining little room, which serves as kitchen and storeroom for the necessities. They meet in this way every Friday from October till April. The effects of their industry are given to charities and the poor, and sometimes they execute orders for different ladies.

In all church matters the ladies take a most active part, as is seen from the following extract from a paper, or calendar, printed for the month of May:—

"The Ladies' Congregational Society carries out various parts of the church life and work, under the following branches: The Ladies' Industrial Benevolent Society; The Committee of Charitable Help; The Committee on Church Sociality and Hospitality; The Literary Department; The Musical and Dramatic Fraternity (open also to gentlemen, subscription, $1)."

But I must now pass on to that which most interested me. After morning service the congregation, instead of dispersing, lingered a few moments, exchanging friendly greetings, and while some at length left the church, others made for an adjoining room. Following the stream, I found myself in a large room, with chairs arranged in a semi-circle, and several children seated in the front rows, all smiling and happy, as if waiting for some pleasure in store for them. Here and there, at short intervals, were banners, on which were inscribed different mottoes, with appropriate designs, such as "The Little Mary's," "The Cross," "Lilies," "The Reapers," "The Crusaders," &c. Under these, in little bands, the children are arranged, and so each little class or set has a banner of its own. The organist seated herself at the piano, and played the accompaniment to some hymns for the children—pretty, bright little tunes, and simple, childlike words. The superintendent spoke in a simple, easy, familiar way to the little ones, and called upon them to suggest any hymns which they would prefer to sing. One little fellow would not rest till we had sung one called "The Beacon Light," evidently a great favourite amongst them. They sing from a book in which both words and tunes are printed, called "The Sunny Side," a book of songs for the Sunday school and home, published in New York. We sang about three hymns all together, the little ones shouting lustily. The superintendent, having addressed to them a few words upon the subject of the sermon we had just been listening to, then read a lesson with responses, in which all joined; and Mr. Herford having concluded this little service with a prayer, the elders adjourned to the pastor's, or church study as it is called, leaving the children to their Sunday-school work. Here in the study we seated ourselves round Mr. Herford who read a chapter with us, and commented upon it, freely discussing it with all who chose. So pleasant was the half hour that it seemed but a few moments when the children's voices, again heard, proclaimed the fact that school was over, and the "Minister's Class" broke up, the parents returning home with their little ones.

It seemed as if we had all been as one large family, so entirely without constraint of any kind, so at home with one another were we, and so simple and hearty was that meeting together. And in everything connected with the church the same spirit seems to prevail. On the paper before quoted, beneath a notice relative to the work and institutions of the church, is written in italics: "Do not wait for us to find you out, but take the initiative yourself. You will be welcome."

Our cities are large, and congregations are scattered, but could not some such spirit as this exist in many of our churches at home? In the matter of Sunday school, how much better it would surely be for little children to join in service such as the above, than to sit in church through a long sermon, tired and fidgety, deriving no benefit from that which they cannot possibly understand, and feeling in their little hearts that the worship of God is but an irksome, weary task. F. B.

CONFERENCE OF LIBERAL THINKERS.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

AMONG the recent assemblies held in London, those held in South Place Chapel (Mr. Moncure Conway's) were in many respects the most remarkable. The time chosen for this gathering placed it somewhat in rivalry with the Unitarian meetings, which was certainly to be regretted. Apart from this, however, the conference was one in which we could not but feel a deep interest. On the first day Mr. Conway, in a few well chosen sentences, extended a cordial welcome to all who were present, and then proposed that Dr. Wild should preside for that day. The Chairman, having taken his seat, read a very able address in rather a sermonic style, in the course of which he expressed his desire that the young people who were being reared in an atmosphere of free religious thought should be taken care of and provided with some sympathetic comradeship to carry them along. He discussed in a very lively manner the way in which what he called the quasi-rationalists were endeavouring to take the wind out of the sails of the real rationalists, and he seemed to imply that the great proportion of honesty was on the side of the latter. And when he went on to deny the theory that there was no ground for religion without supernaturalism and authority, and to affirm that on the contrary a pure and exalted religion was possible without either, his utterances met with marked approval from the meeting. Dr. Wild was of opinion that free thought was in several ways in danger. He instanced the insidious acts of the clerical party at school boards, together with the influences that were brought to bear in middle-class education. It seemed to me that there was a complete ignoring of the possibility that the clerical and evil geni of middle-class education might be in downright earnest and sterlingly honest; but there was no denying the doctor's affirmation that nothing would exorcise the false religion except the genuine article. The question always is "which is which?" On the whole the Chairman made out a good case for the cause of combination among Liberal thinkers.

At the conclusion of the Chairman's address Mr. Conway mentioned that a number of letters had been received in which the writers with one consent made excuses for being absent, but most of them expressed their entire sympathy with the movement. Dr. Martineau declined to be present, tersely expressing his reason in the aphorism, "Negation supplies no bond." Mr. Matthew Arnold excused himself, thinking that wider culture would do all that was necessary. Some were away for their holidays, and others were detained through various causes, though no mention was made of any being away on their honeymoon. Professor Max Müller, Mr. Rosetti, Rev. Allanson Picton, Rev. Frank Walters, Professor Huxley, Mr. Thomas Scott, and many others sent apologies. Karl Blind was so deeply imbued with the sense of what must for ever remain unknowable that he could not take part in any organisation.

Rev. Chas. Voysey, B.A., then read a paper on "The Religious Needs of our Time," which were, he said, intellectual, emotional, and æsthetic. Creeds and articles needed disestablishing, he thought, and the act of Uniformity should be repealed, for speech being then set free, there would be something reasonable to say about religion. He admitted that difference of opinions showed that the whole truth about God was as yet, perhaps must always be, unknown, but he thought that the encounter of thought with thought would lead the way to a more complete knowledge.

Mr. Voysey's paper, which was a most admirable and timely utterance, was exceedingly well received by the very mixed and peculiar audience, though there were many present who could not agree with the rev. speaker in several matters of belief. That was, of course, what might be expected in an assembly of which Geo. Jacob Holyoake, Mrs. Harriet Law, Mr. Leslie Stephen were members, and which indeed included blank atheists, and the more fashionable people called agnostics. The discussion became fairly general, and the effort to find common ground of course resulted in many extraordinary, not to say extravagant, utterances. One gentleman gasped out that he could prove the existence of God, knew all about man, where he came from, what he now is, and where he is going to. Another speaker, a lady, knew nothing about anything. She had been a Catholic, but she said she had wandered all over London to discover some teacher who could point out a "path" for her to follow. She had listened to Mr. Conway, and had gone away from the services wanting to do something for humanity—a statement which was received with very hearty applause—the reason of which I could not see, for it seemed to me that if a woman really wanted to do something for humanity, there was an easy way of finding a "path." The nearest policeman could direct her to Whitechapel.

Presently a speaker stepped on the platform and took the Bible for his guide. He turned out to be an evangelist, and to have a very disagreeable way of putting things, but it was scarcely wise to silence him by a direct vote. The Rev. W. Binns followed in a peculiarly characteristic speech, in which, for the most part, he reasserted the fundamentals of God, Communion, and Immortality, after which the Rev. J. Street raised the practical point of organisation, and was followed by Mr. Holyoake, who said that the meeting was like a new world to him, and then recounted the points upon which there had been the most marked change of opinion during the last 25 years. Mr. Holyoake pleaded for the most complete liberty, liberty all round, and said he had no objection to subscribe to a Methodist chapel, or to the support of any other sect. Mr. Leslie Stephen remarked that he enjoyed perfect liberty in publishing his opinions, and he could not see any particular reason for the proposed Association.

On the reassembling of the Conference on Friday, it was evident that the discussion of the previous day had tended to make tolerably clear the "whereabouts" of the various sections represented in the gathering. A letter was read from Mr. Voysey that, after hearing some of the speeches of the preceding day, and the applause which had greeted them, he felt that the Conference was no place for him; a rebuke which it is to be hoped some of the intolerant "free-thinkers" present will take to heart. Mr. A. Ellis presided and delivered a singularly able address. In contending for a combination of Liberal thinkers, he argued for the fullest expression of opinion, for thought unexpressed was thought but half thought out, while the first step towards certainty was doubt. Mr. Johnston Russell followed, and said very truly that much of the discussion on the previous day had had reference to the needs of religious unbelief, and therefore was beyond their scope. Mr. Henley contended that spiritualism would simplify matters, which so tickled the audience that the speaker undertook, if the meeting would "give him the chance," to convince every one of them of its truth. After the Rev. J. D. Hirst Symth had added a few words, Mr. Conway read the report of the Scheme proposed for adoption—after which the discussion took a more practical turn—and the adoption of the scheme was moved by Mr. Stuart Glennie, seconded by Mr. Wentworth Higginson, and ultimately carried in the following form.

I. This organisation shall be called the Association of Liberal Thinkers. Its objects shall be:—

1. The scientific study of religious phenomena.
2. The collection and diffusion of information concerning religious developments.
3. The emancipation of mankind from the spirit of superstition.
4. Fellowship among liberal thinkers of all races.
5. The promotion of the culture, progress and moral welfare of men, and of whatever in any form of religion may tend towards that end.

II. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone.

There were several speeches on the general resolution and the points were taken seriatim. The alterations were not important and the discussions upon them were only remarkable for the extraordinary amount of hair splitting in which Liberal Thinkers can indulge. Professor Carpenter wished to omit No. 3, inasmuch as there were beliefs cherished by many, and possibly by himself, which others would call superstitious. The Professor's motion was seconded by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (of Nottingham), and then Mr. Conway gave an elaborate explanation of what he understood by superstition, which was the determinate clinging to doctrine against the weight of evidence. But as it was clear that if the "object" were explained, it would be desirable to add Mr. Conway's explanation, or an appendix, some happy genius—I think Colonel Higginson—suggested the words "the spirit of," with which everybody had to be content.

But it was on number five that the greatest divergence was manifested. Originally it stood thus, "The promotion of pure and universal religion, which includes the culture, progress, and moral welfare of man." But nobody seemed enamoured of pure and universal religion, and one speaker remarked that it was by no means certain that when the element common to all religions was found it would prove to be a pure and universal religion. The only thing that seemed at all to command agreement was the culture, progress, and moral welfare of mankind; but Mr. Binns contended that the object should be made a religious one by the use of the term religion, and so, ultimately, the article was carried as given above.

There were throughout the conference several very remarkable speeches. Mrs. Harriet Law delivered one of considerable point, proposing that South-place Chapel should be hired out to different people by turns, that their different "views" might be declared. Miss Marshall made a speech composed largely of denunciations of the introductory remarks. She would "go ahead," and did go ahead, almost without a head—as it seemed to me. Many smart things, she said, in a smart histrionic style, but her remarks tended less to edification than to entertainment. But Miss Marshall only did what so many others had done—resorted to South Place to unburden their souls of their extravagances of belief or unbelief, or whatever it is, under the impression that it was liberal thought. Mr. Armstrong's remark that Comte had spoken of the superstition of atheism left it by no means certain that somebody would not rise and refer to the superstitions of liberal thinkers. The debates, however, were, for the most part, conducted with reverence and kindness on all hands. I thought I detected an inclination to sneer at religion on the part of some of the speakers, but it was effectually checked, for there was unquestionably a thoroughly genuine and earnest desire on the part of the really thoughtful people present to come to an understanding; and if this had not been the case it would hardly have been safe to sneer in the presence of Professors Upton, Drummond, and Carpenter, Mr. Binns, Mr. Street, Mr. Drummond (Edinburgh) and about 20 other Unitarian ministers, to say nothing of Unitarian laymen.

But to one lady's speech I must specially refer, for while it did not contain a sneer at religion it certainly was a remarkable utterance. Mrs. Rose, an elderly lady, said to be a Pole by birth, and celebrated in America as "an orator," declared all religion to be superstition, and therefore she would eliminate all the words and references to it from the programme. She thought religion was the great stumbling block of man. The religion of to-day would be the superstition of the future. It did not seem to occur to Mrs. Rose what Mr. Binns, however, pointed out later, that that was very much the case also with science, but we did not therefore abandon scientific inquiry. Further, Mrs. Rose declared she had no time to consider whether there was a God. She found that man made a god more or less of a human kind, as he wanted him; and for her part she held that life was so short that we could not spare an hour for all the gods in creation. She could not subscribe to religion in the programme, for she feared that religion would become a creed, and a creed was a chain—a straight-jacket. But if they would take her help—she was about to say she wished them “God speed”—and the audience burst into roars of laughter—but, instead, she would say she would do what she could. It was the most extraordinary speech I ever heard from a woman; and coming as it did from a lady of advanced years, and spoken as it was with a really deep earnestness, it could not but touch all who listened sympathetically.

But all things human end, and this conference, memorable in some respects, of which I fear I have given but a very hurried and imperfect sketch, ended by the appointment of a committee to take further steps in the direction indicated by the objects. Among the members of the committee I caught the following names:—Mrs. Harriet Law, Mr. Preston, Mr. Stuart Glennie, Rev. R. B. Drummond, B.A., of Edinburgh; Mrs. Dowling, Professor J. E. Carpenter, M.A.; Rev. W. F. Walters, of Glasgow; Dr. Wild, Mr. A. Ellis, Rev. J. D. H. Smyth, of London; Mr. Leslie Stephens, Mr. J. Ellis, Rev. Carey Walters, of Whitchurch; Rev. J. C. Street of Belfast; and several others whose names I did not catch. H. R.

A BOY'S SONG.

JAMES HOGG.

WHERE the pools are bright and deep,
Where the gray trout lies asleep,
Up the river and o'er the lee,
That's the way for Billy and me!

Where the blackbird sings the latest,
Where the hawthorne blooms the sweetest,
Where the nestlings chirp and flee,
That's the way for Billy and me!

Where the mowers mow the cleanest,
Where the hay lies thick and greenest;
There to trace the homeward bee,
That's the way for Billy and me!

Where the hazel bank is steepest,
Where the shadow falls the deepest,
Where the clustering nuts fall free,
That's the way for Billy and me!

And this I know: I love to play
Through the meadows, among the hay;
Up the water and o'er the lee,
That's the way for Billy and me!

NORMAN MACLEOD AT HIS BEST.

MUCH as one enjoys many things that come from his pen, full as they are of healthy life and human-heartedness, nothing he has written is any measure of the powers that were in him. The sermons he preached, with the language warm from his heart, were far beyond the best he published. His addresses to public meetings were better than his sermons, for they allowed him to flavour his earnest thoughts with that overflowing humour which would have been out of place in the pulpit. Sometimes, when he met a congenial party at dinner, or on an evening, his talk impressed them more than his best speeches—so rich was it, so varied and versatile. But the time to get him at his best and fullest was when you sat up with him till midnight, all alone in his study, with none to hear but one familiar friend, on whose sympathy he could fully rely. It was then that his whole soul came out in all its breadth and rich variety, touching every chord of human feeling, and ranging from common earth to highest heaven. The anecdote, reflection, argument, bright flushes of imagination, drollest humour, most thrilling pathos, and solemn thoughts wandering through eternity, all blended into one whole of conversation, the like of which you never before listened to. In a moment he would pass from some comical illustration of human character to the most serious reality of sacred truth, and you would feel no discord. In other hands there would have been a jar, but not in his. At such times I used to think that if all the pleasantest, ablest conversations ever heard at Oxford from one's best friends had been rolled into one, it would not have made up such a profusion of soul as came from Norman then. No one, however well he might otherwise know him, could estimate his full breadth and depth of nature, unless they had spent with him some such solitary evenings as these.—Principal Shairp.

SMOTHER THE SPARKS.

THE tongue is a little member, yet it boasteth great things. It does a large business on a small capital; it raises a mighty storm on the most trivial occasion; it often leads the whole troop of a man's faculties to revolt against him and to make treasonable cause with his enemies. Few there are, if any, who cannot recall seasons when this unruly bit of flame set on fire the whole course of nature in themselves. A little impatience was the first spark, which a moment's silence would have extinguished; but the unfortunate utterance came, and with it misunderstanding and resentment. Every word that succeeded was a burning one, and as in a great city's conflagration, dwellings take fire from the wind, so persons but distantly related to a wordy quarrel feel its hot breath and are suddenly ablaze. There is not a family, or school, or single village in all the land, which is fire proof, and they are all in momentary danger.—The Alliance Journal.

PIN FEATHERS AND QUILLS.

DR. KYNETT tells us a story of Scott Chinn, an eccentric coloured preacher, who, at a missionary meeting in New Orleans, after a tedious and lengthy address from another brother, had to manage the collection.

The preceding speaker had closed with a description of the angel with the everlasting gospel flying over the earth, when Scott Chinn arose and addressed the angelic messenger as follows: “O angel of de mighty wing, flying through de world! You've bin flying a long time, and you've got a long journey yet before you. You look tired. Tarry and rest wid us awile. Dis is de Lord's day of rest; dis is de Lord's house, and we are de Lord's people. Tarry and rest.” Then turning to the congregation the preacher continued:—“De angel is goin' to stay awhile. He is foldin' his wings; he looks like his feddars was wearin' out. Bring on de new feddars for de angel's wings. Bring on de feddars!”

This appeal was answered in the usual fashion of the coloured people, who with songs and fantastic motions and marches came forward and deposited at the altar their offerings. Scott Chinn regarded the gifts for a little while, and noticing that the most of them were pennies or postal scrip, called upon the congregation to stop singing. He said, “Children, stop dat singing. What are dese dat you've been bringin'? Dere's nottin' but pin-feddars! Bring along de long quills for de angel. Bring de long quills!”

If we were to hazard an opinion we should say there are a good many people who think God's messengers can fly with “pin-feathers,” and who use the long quills for their own enterprises. If many people should manage their own business as they do the Lord's they would find bankruptcy and starvation before a year had passed.—The Wayside.

CURIOSITIES.

In De Quincey's account of Coleridge's life, mention is made of an old clergyman who knew a little Hebrew. He used to charm and astonish his congregation by quoting Hebrew texts in his sermons, and giving them, as he said, “the very words used by the Holy Ghost.”

A clergyman having been inducted into a living in Kent, took occasion during his first sermon to introduce the word “optics.” At the conclusion of the service a farmer who was present thanked him for his discourse, but intimated that he had made a mistake in one word, softening down the severity of his criticism by saying, “We all knew very well, sir, what you meant.” On the clergyman making further inquiries about the word, the farmer replied: “What you called hopsticks, in this part of the country we call hop-poles.”

At the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland a gentleman named Kidston, while conceding that “the former drawing kind of singing” was not a style to be perpetuated, uttered a solemn warning against the adoption of quick time, and said that vocal music, the fruit of the lips, was the only authorised method of praise. It was, he said, in accordance with apostolic practice and precept, and so it continued until the Man of Sin, amidst his growing corruption, attempted to introduce the whole of the Temple services—sacrifices, priests, incense and, last of all, instrumental music.

BELFAST.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIANS. THE annual meeting of this association was held on Wednesday week in the meeting house of the First Congregation, Rosemary-street, Belfast. Rev. David Gordon (the outgoing president) preached, selecting as his text Matthew xix., 20 and 21.

On the motion of Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER, seconded by Rev. Professor ORR, Rev. David Thompson (Mountpottinger) was unanimously elected president for the year, and ascended the pulpit, which was vacated by Mr. Gordon.

Rev. Hugh Moore was re-appointed honorary secretary and treasurer for the year.

It was agreed to meet next year in York-street, on the Wednesday succeeding the third Tuesday in June.

The report of the Committee for General Purposes recorded the presentation of a petition to the House of Commons, praying that the University Education (Ireland) Bill might not pass into a law; the said bill having for its object the erection, by Royal Letters Patent, of the seminary known as the Catholic University, into a second college in the university of Dublin. The report included also a resolution of the Committee, recommending that the regulation requiring guarantees on behalf of bursars and exhibitors on the Ministerial Education Fund be adhered to, as it belonged to the original plan, on the faith of which the fund was raised.

Rev. J. SCOTT PORTER moved the adoption of the report.

Rev. J. C. STREET, on whose notice of motion last year the matter had been referred to the committee, said he was still as strongly opposed as ever to the system of guarantees, but he held that, under the circumstances stated in the resolution, there was no course left open but to continue the plan.

Rev. Professor ORR seconded the adoption of the report, and the motion was passed.

The General Purposes Committee was thanked for their diligence during the year, and dissolved.

A new committee was then appointed, which consisted of the members of the former committee, with some exceptions.

A resolution was passed deploring the death of Rev. William M'Cullough, assistant minister of Larne, and conveying the sympathy of the association to his widow.

Mr. SMYTH (elder) reported that the Committee on Temperance had by circular invited ministers to preach to their congregations on this subject, and several of the ministers present reported that they had complied with the request. It was agreed that ministers should preach special sermons on Temperance on the Sunday before the meeting of the Association.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF THE ASSOCIATION.

Rev. J. A. CROZIER moved the following resolution:—“That, whereas it is desired, on the part of Non-Subscribing Presbyterians of this association, that the basis of union of the four Presbyterian bodies therein should be placed on constantly accessible record, the following resolutions—the former from the minutes of 1833, whereby the association was originally constituted, and the latter from the minutes of 1865, whereby the Northern Presbytery of Antrim was admitted—be hereafter annually printed along with and prefatory to the minutes of the association, viz.:—“That, whereas the Synod of Munster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster are perfectly unanimous in acknowledging allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church, and in the maintenance of the great principles of the Reformation—namely, the sufficiency of the Scriptures, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority in matters of faith—they do agree to unite under the denomination of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians.' 'That the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, holding the principles on which this association is founded, be, and it is hereby, recognised as one of the bodies constituting the association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians.' Mr. Crozier went on to say that he hoped to ensure perfect unanimity in this resolution. The motion was proposed by him from a sincere and honest desire to heal strife, to clear away misconceptions, and to bring hitherto opposing sections of their association to a mutual good understanding. The motion was entirely his own. He was responsible for it from first to last, and had consulted with no one in drawing it up. He must refer to the terms on which the Free Christians were admitted. They found in the minutes of 1871, page 14, that "after much discussion it was resolved that the name of the association shall be called the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians." At the same meeting it was afterwards resolved that Rev. Mr. Street be received in accordance with his own request as a member of the association; and at a subsequent meeting successively the Second Congregation of Belfast, Rev. David Thompson, of Mountpottinger, and his congregation were admitted on that understanding. He (Mr. Crozier) was not present at the meeting in 1871, or he should certainly have felt bound to have objected to the change made in the name of the association, for he was convinced at the time of the change, and he had never since seen reason to alter his conviction, that it was a grave mistake. The mistake, however, having been made, and these gentlemen and their congregations having been admitted on the faith of that change, he felt that they were all bound to treat them with every fairness, consideration, and justice. At the same time that should not prevent them from ascertaining and clearly defining their own position. The debates of previous years must have brought them to the conviction that a crisis had arisen in the history of their Non-Subscribing Association, and that they could no longer continue to go on in the way they had been doing, and that it was necessary they should make clearly manifest their position. He believed that the resolution would meet the case. It was one that could not be reasonably objected to by their Free Christian friends, and he hoped it would commend itself to the universal acceptance of all the Presbyterian bodies constituting their association.

Mr. JOHN SMYTH, jun., seconded the resolution, believing that it commended itself to the common sense of all.

Rev. J. SCOTT PORTER said that that association, like every other association, was grounded and founded and built upon certain principles. What its founders declared to be their views, and what had been adopted by others who had since joined the association, must still be regarded as its fundamental principles. He wondered that Mr. Crozier was not struck with the illogical nature of the distinction that he himself took between members of the association as Presbyterians and those who were not. Mr. Crozier insisted that the Presbyterian bodies had a right to put their views and feelings on record, not by the action of their Presbyteries and Synods, or even by a separate meeting of the Presbyterian bodies that were united with their association, but by the association itself as a whole. That was illogical. If the association took upon itself to republish what he referred to as the views of the members of the Presbyterian bodies, but what he (Mr. Scott Porter) regarded as the fundamental principles of the association itself—(hear, hear)—certainly honesty, fair play, and consistency required that they should put on record the principles of those who were called "Free Christians." (Hear, hear.) Now, he was not prepared to go that length. This association acted for the whole. Mr. Crozier alluded to certain statements which they had heard usque ad nauseam—namely, that their principles were not known to those members when they entered the association. His answer to that was, that it was only doing common justice to the sagacity of those Free Christians who sought and obtained admission at their own request that they knew and had taken means to ascertain what the principles of the association were. (Hear, hear.) But he would allow that there might have been some misconception on the part of Mr. Street, who might not have thought it necessary to inquire what were the principles of the association. Now, however, that Mr. Street found he could not accept their principles, he should say that Mr. Street made a mistake at that time, but a mistake could be rectified, and if he found he had got into the wrong box all he had to do was to jump out of it. (Hear, hear.) The same excuse could not be made for his congregation, for from the first—from the year 1835—that congregation was connected with the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Association. As for another gentleman, to whom he did not wish to make particular allusion, as he occupied a very distinguished place in their meeting, he was a Presbyterian before he became a Free Christian, and, if there were any force in Mr. Crozier's argument, he must be understood to be bound by the declaration he had made.

The PRESIDENT said he was a Presbyterian still. (Hear, hear.)

Rev. I. SCOTT PORTER said he was so too, and, that being the case, he considered it would be well to knock out of Mr. Crozier's resolution everything that referred to Presbyterianism separately. He then moved the following amendment: "That, whereas the Synod of Munster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster are perfectly unanimous in acknowledging allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church, and in the maintenance of the great principles of the Reformation viz., the sufficiency of the Scriptures, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority in matters of faith—they do agree to unite under the denomination of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned."

Mr. JAMES MAJOR (Lisburn) seconded the amendment.

Rev. J. C. STREET then addressed the association at great length. Whatever probability, he said, there was of finding unanimity for the motion before the House, there was none for the amendment. The amendment would not have his vote, or the votes with whom he was associated. It was not for the Presbyterians to consider whether or not they were prepared to accept the motion. He certainly was not prepared to vote against it. It seemed to him that if all the Presbyterians of that association were united in the affirmation of what was contained in the notice of motion, they had a perfect right to reaffirm it. By so doing they took a step which he entirely disapproved of, and they might be forging fetters anew for themselves and posterity; and he would regret it, for they would no longer belong to a Non-Subscribing Church. Referring to part of the resolution of 1835, in which it was stated that the Synod of Munster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, were "perfectly unanimous in acknowledging allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church," Mr. Street expressed himself to the effect that he could not agree with those terms, and that he could not apply them to Christ, for only King and Head of the Church was the Lord God Almighty himself. ("Shame, shame.") Mr. Porter seemed to think that logic and honesty required, if that resolution were adopted, that the principles of Free Christians should also be put on constantly accessible record. But Mr. Porter need not trouble himself with that, for, by the simple declaration that they were Free Christians they affirmed all they desired to affirm. While they did not break loose from the past, they put before the word "Christian" a term which described their mental attitude towards the future. In the year the change of title was made not one word was said about fundamental principles. From the moment the change was made he felt that another plank was added to their platform on which Free Christians could stand. He was admitted without any question being asked or any creed put before him. The motion before the House would not disturb his relations to the association. They had had for a long time many painful and awkward disputes. They had had difficulties, some, perhaps, of their own introduction, which it was not necessary to raise, and probably the time had come when these difficulties might be met.

Mr. THOMAS McCLELLAND asked Mr. Porter to withdraw his amendment, and let them be unanimous.

Mr. SCOTT PORTER said the amendment had not been brought forward without deliberation, and he was not prepared on the spur of the moment to withdraw it, and he was quite sure it would pass.

Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER spoke in opposition to the motion.

Mr. WM. GAULT (Ballyclare) said he hoped they would pass the resolution, and put an end to such meetings.

Rev. Professor ORR supported the resolution, believing that it offered a solution to their difficulties.

Rev. R. CAMPBELL thought, with all respect to Mr. Crozier, that his position was an absurd one. The motion tried to bring together people who had no common sympathy regarding their fundamental principles.

Rev. R. J. ORR did not fall in with either the motion or the amendment.

The amendment was then put to the vote, and carried by 15 against 9.

The amendment thereupon was put as the substantive motion, and was carried by 22 against 9.

Rev. J. C. STREET, addressing the House on his own behalf, said he had long felt that on the part of a large majority of the members of the association there was a desire to bring matters to an end, and to take such steps as would lead practically to the expulsion of himself from their association. The decision which they had arrived at in so pronounced a manner left to him as a free-thinking man but one course. It seemed to him that the only bond of communion between them was a theological one, and that men who did not accept what was called their fundamental principles were not wanted there. By their action this day they had excluded him from their midst.

Mr. T. McCLELLAND expressed approval of Mr. Street's sentiments, and he was sure his congregation endorsed them.

Mr. Street then retired from the House with his friends.

The association afterwards adjourned.

At the Thursday's meeting the Rev. Mr. Orr proposed a resolution, expressing regret at the secession of the Rev. J. C. Street from the association, and appreciative of the services he had rendered during his membership. The Rev. J. S. Porter objected to the allusion to Mr. Street's services, and considered he had done a great deal of harm to the association. The Rev. T. H. M. Scott could not recollect a single service that Mr. Street had done for the association, and saw no necessity for any resolution on the subject. After some discussion, the resolution and an alternative one, proposed by the Rev. A. Gordon, both dropped, neither having been seconded.

At the close, the Rev. Charles Beard delivered an address to the students, a report of which will appear in our next.

KENDAL.—On Monday, the 3rd inst., the teachers of the Unitarian Sunday School, with their minister, the Rev. James Macdonald, met at Anchorite's House, the residence of Miss Greenhow, to present to her a stationery case, in acknowledgment of her years of willing service on behalf of the school. Mr. Macdonald, in asking Miss Greenhow to accept the case from the teachers and scholars, hoped she would take it as a token of the affection and esteem which all felt towards her, and assured her that they could never forget how earnestly and kindly she had laboured amongst them. Miss Greenhow very feelingly thanked Mr. Macdonald, the teachers, and scholars for their beautiful present, and said she had never felt the work a task. It was with great pleasure she looked back upon the peace and harmony which had always prevailed amongst them during the years which had elapsed since the school was opened, and she hoped it would long continue. The case was of ebony, silver-mounted, and combined envelope, inkstand, and writing-desk.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

LEON HERBERT.

LITTLE by little the time goes by—
 Short if you sing through it, long if you sigh;
 Little by little—an hour, a day,
 Gone with the years that have vanished away
 Little by little the race is run,
 Trouble and waiting and toil are done!

Little by little the skies grow clear;
 Little by little the sun comes near;
 Little by little the days smile out
 Gladder and brighter on pain and doubt;
 Little by little the seed we sow
 Into a beautiful yield will grow.

Little by little the world grows strong,
 Fighting the battle of right and wrong;
 Little by little the Right has sway;
 Little by little the Wrong gives way,
 Little by little all longing souls
 Struggle up nearer the shining goals!

Little by little the good in men
 Blossoms to beauty for human ken;
 Little by little the angels see Prophecies better of good to be;
 Little by little the God of all
 Lifts the world nearer his pleading call!

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

SEA-SIDE and sunshine, on behalf of Mother Nature, welcomed the Provincial right heartily, and not less so—on behalf of articulately speaking and cooking mankind—did the minister and congregation of Southport. Mr. LUNN's sermon was long enough to include not only his own opinion, which was a firm, reasonably-founded, and spiritually-enlarged faith in a living and true God in whom we have eternal life, but also to give due place to the opinions of others. The man of science and his excellent work were not decried, and no slight was cast upon the questionings and difficulties of anxious souls who strive to be faithful, and to walk according to the light they have, although it be but a twilight. The afternoon presented no exciting scenes, but it gave us an address from the President—may we call him Right Reverend when all of us truly revere him, or Venerable when we remember his fifty years of good service?—an address abounding in matters of general and denominational interest. Fit honour was done by Mr. RUSSELL CARPENTER and Mr. CHARLES WICKSTEED to the memory of Earl RUSSELL, and a little episode brought out the voice of Mr. FOGG, who, with the President, could remember the celebration in the Provincial Assembly of victories of toleration under Earl RUSSELL's banner half a century ago. Something better than mere toleration—viz., the fruit of freedom in the growth of truth and love among the members of a religious society, was set forth in the address of Mr. JOHN WRIGHT at the evening meeting. Mr. WRIGHT brought to mind the history of the Assembly itself. Apropos of a letter which appeared in the local paper of the day before, with the signature of a Presbyterian minister of the town, in which the writer wondered and chafed at the claim to the name Presbyterian as associated with Unitarian in the title of the Assembly, Mr. WRIGHT showed what had been the distinctive principles of the English Presbyterians, and what were the ways into which those principles had led them. In this connection our readers will find a document of deep interest in the memorial addressed by Manchester New College to the Privy Council, which appears in our columns this week, and about which we shall have more to say in our next. Then Mr. COE came in with a word of warning, lest we should lose ourselves in an empty boast of freedom and a vague outlook for a unity of belief not likely to come while men have diverse view-points, and use their various faculties of observation and reflection. We should set an example of devotion with freedom, and good work with faith. Mr. BINNS followed up his London sermon, which unfolded the doctrinal contents of religion as now to be apprehended, with a speech, on this Thursday evening at Southport, on the general characteristics of a religion fitted to satisfy our times. It must be large and warm and affirmative. It was a speech, like all the others, without Utopianism, with close and practical aim, but with a high aim, and calling upon us to be our best selves, though no more than our possible selves. So at least we felt, while the spell of its brilliancy and power were on us. The eccentricities of once popular theologies were revealed in their native crudity under the wholesome treatment of our eccentric apostle of common-sense. We were made to feel quite sure that mankind would finally get rid of a great deal of nonsense before long, and that there was a vast world of divine and beautiful realities lying in view to be entered upon and enjoyed.

This year, both at London and at Southport, we have possessed our souls in peace, and no one can say that it has been from any want of feeling for the practical or speculative difficulties of the hour. Both at the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and at those of the Provincial Assembly, in sermons and speeches, there was not a word of careless content; on the contrary there was a very earnest endeavour to meet and to satisfy some pressing want or inquiry of the individual mind or of the religious community. But there was a spirit of good fellowship in all, a desire to work with one another, to help and encourage one another, which we take to be the germs of richer fruits than could ever have grown from pips of the apple of discord.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN THE HOUSE OF ITS FRIENDS.

THE position of things among our friends in Ireland is one which, if we were not all born to inconsistency, would seem to be peculiarly Irish. The members of the Non-Subscribing Association who really will not subscribe have had to leave the Society, while the majority which belong to the party that named the Association, have gone in for putting their hands to a very definite test. The situation altogether is not easily to be comprehended from this side the channel. Personal considerations, no doubt, have had much weight, which is the bane—perhaps the inevitable bane—of small societies. A desire to reconcile the several elements was the motive of Mr. CROZIER's proposal, which was, in effect, that those who wished to stand upon a doctrinal basis should do so, while those who, under the name of Free Christians, would put no definition on their Christianity, should be allowed their liberty in that respect. This compromise, a rather curious one, we confess, failed to satisfy the majority. Non-subscription, in the real sense of the term, is not even to be tolerated in the Non-subscribing Association. Will the Association now proceed to change its name? Or are we to regard the present action as merely temporary, and is a chance to remain open for another generation to realise the promise of the title, which came down from a day of struggle on behalf of freedom, and which might, who knows, inspire one effective struggle more?

PAST AND FUTURE.

THE speeches at the banquet held last week to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, though naturally confined in the main to sentiments of congratulation on the liberal ecclesiastical achievements of the past, included also some anticipations of the future. Everybody who took part in the proceedings, whether Dissenter or Churchman, Whig or Radical, is for abolishing the clerical monopoly in churchyards, and for doing what yet remains to be done to nationalise the Universities. But beyond these objects is another goal; and it must have been in the minds of men like Earl GRANVILLE, Mr. FORSTER, and Mr. GOSCHEN, that the time is approaching when the historic alliance between Liberalism and Nonconformity must come to an end except a new point of departure is mutually resolved upon. Lord LANSDOWNE said that very little of the edifice of religious liberty remains to be completed—an assertion, as the Nonconformist remarks, indicative either of the speaker's incapacity to grasp the Establishment question, or of his opinion that disestablishment is not to be thought of. With greater breadth of view, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN declared that if much had been done, much still remained to be done; the victories already won being but instalments of others yet to be secured. Mr. RICHARD, after enumerating the measures of religious liberty passed since the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, asked—as he had a right to do—“What harm has come of all this? Has not great good come of it?” adding that, “he hoped to live to see the day when the Church of England would be freed from the burden and encumbrance of State patronage and control, and to hear the members of the Church admit the benefits arising from that great work.” [And Mr. STANLEY did well to remind the Liberal leaders that the Liberal party is a party of progress, and of new ideas; that it has to adapt its policy to the needs of the time, and that, therefore, the old watchwords require to be used in a new and fuller sense. Religious equality, he added, was the natural development of religious liberty, and if the principle were acted upon, they would be able to inscribe new and more important victories on the old flag. Mr. GOSCHEN, however, deprecatingly expressed a hope that the Liberals would not be called upon to engage in a service for which the old battalions were not enrolled, and said that disunion would be fatal to the Liberal cause. But there is something else quite as likely to be fatal to that cause, and that is, a union based upon no principles, and having no definite or inspiring aims. Mr. GOSCHEN, and those who think with him, had better revise the drill, and change the tactics of the old battalions than let them be weakened by slumberous or timid inactivity.]

GOVERNMENT AND THE PRINCIPALITY.

WHATEVER little popularity the Government enjoys in Wales will not be increased by its refusal to make a grant in aid of the University College at Aberystwith. This institution is the greatest which Welshmen have yet established to promote the higher education of the Principality; and they not unreasonably looked to the Government for sympathy and help. There were a million and a quarter signatures to the petition asking for a grant; and it is difficult to avoid the suspicion that ungenerous pressure of a party character was brought to bear upon the Government to induce it to give a cold reception to this influential appeal. There is a college at Lampeter, where church influences predominate; and the authorities of this institution have shown a not very creditable jealousy of its splendid rival at Aberystwith, which is founded on a far broader basis.

IRISH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION.

THE Government scheme for promoting Intermediate Education in Ireland is a moderate and judicious measure. In the clear and concise statement with which he introduced it, Lord CAIRNS illustrated the necessity for it by pointing out that according to the Irish census returns of 1871 only two boys in every thousand of the population were learning either Greek, Latin, modern languages, or mathematics, while the proportion in England was 14 to 15 per 1,000. The Government are liberal in the amount of money they propose to appropriate to the bettering of this state of things. One million of the surplus funds of Irish Disestablishment to allot to the encouragement of Intermediate Education in Ireland. A Board of seven persons, with two paid Commissioners, is to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant to work the scheme. There are to be money prizes of considerable amount to tempt scholars, and there are to be local examinations. Some encouragement, too, is to be given to schools which turn out a good proportion of successful competitors. No account is to be taken of the manner in which the students are taught at their schools; the Government will only deal, as the Lord Chancellor described it, with "the manufactured article." There are to be six groups of subjects for examination: English literature and history, Latin and Greek, French, German, and Italian, mathematics, natural science, and one other group to be afterwards arranged by the Board. The "religious difficulty" is met by the significant provision that "no examination shall be held on any subject of religious instruction, nor any payment made in respect thereof." In this provision will be found perhaps, says the Daily News, the germ of any objections to the scheme which may come from the Catholic hierarchy in Ireland. From the opposite side of the controversy an objection may, perhaps, be urged against the dedication of any part of the surplus funds of the Irish Church to a scheme of general and undenominational education, although this, in our judgment, is one of the most commendable features of the measure. The scheme in itself seems to be fairly and skilfully devised; and the National party and the priests in Ireland ought to think well before they reject so large and liberal an offer of money for the encouragement of popular education. The manner, however, in which the Lord Chancellor spoke, although he urged the necessity of making rapid progress with the measure, seemed rather that of one who is anxious to have the question discussed than of one who hopes to have it promptly settled.

UNIVERSITY REFORM: FREE TEACHING IN THEOLOGY.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE MEMORIAL TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

A DEPUTATION of members and friends of Manchester New College waited yesterday upon His Grace the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, President of the Council, and presented a memorial on behalf of the College, praying that "In revising the application of revenues in Oxford and Cambridge, and also in establishing hereafter any new teaching university, provision may be made for systematic instruction, with examinations, degrees, and honours in theological philosophy, history, and literature, conducted by professors unpledged, in the university or out of it, by articles, creeds, or confessions of faith."

The memorial sets forth the history of Manchester New College as the successor and present representative of a long series of academical institutions which, ever since the passing of the Act of Uniformity, have been maintained by the body known in the history of this kingdom as the English Presbyterians.

The first of them was that which was founded in 1669 at Rathmil, in Craven, in Yorkshire, by the Rev. Richard Frankland, M.A., of Christ's College, Cambridge; the same Mr. Frankland who had previously been selected as a tutor at the college which the Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell intended to institute at Durham, for the promoting of learning and piety, but of which the project was never fully carried out, being baffled by the events that brought the Restoration.

Frankland's work (he died in 1698) was taken up by a pupil of his, John Chorlton, who, in 1695, established an academy in Manchester, in conjunction with John Coningham, M.A., and conducted it till his death in 1705. But these institutions, depending on the abilities of some eminent man with fixed professional engagements, could seldom—on the same spot—survive their head, and in 1708 a pupil of Chorlton's, Thomas Dickson, M.D., carried on the academic work, first at Whitehaven, then at Bolton, till his death in 1729. The scene then changes to Kendal, where an eminent pupil of Dickson's, Caleb Rotherham, D.D., successfully conducted a liberal academy for the higher education of ministers and laymen, from 1733 to his death in 1752.

In 1754, in succession to the academy at Kendal, the so-called Warrington Academy was established, which, under Dr. John Taylor (a pupil of Dickson), Dr. Priestley, Dr. Aikin, Dr. Nicholas Clayton, and Dr. Enfield, all men of celebrity in science and literature, theology, and religious culture, was maintained for many years with great credit, and with a large and influential resort from amongst the liberal and cultivated English Presbyterians and others, all of whom sought in it the opportunity of the highest education, and practically the only one to which they had access.

In the year 1785 it was found convenient to discontinue the academy at Warrington, and to remove its undertaking, with its library and endowment, to Manchester, where accordingly, in 1786, the Manchester Academy was opened under the principalship of Thomas Barnes, D.D. (a pupil of Aikin's), to provide full and systematic courses of education for Divines, and preparatory instruction for the other learned professions, as well as for civil and commercial life. Students for the ministry were to be instructed in regular succession, during a term of five years, in Hebrew, logic, ontology, psychology; in ethics, and the elements of jurisprudence; in the evidences, doctrines, and precepts of Christianity; in ecclesiastical history, and Jewish antiquities, with particular attention to Scripture criticism. While thus engaged they were expected to avail themselves of the opportunities afforded them of pursuing other branches of knowledge essential to a liberal education. It was expressly arranged that the lectures thus provided for students for the ministry should be open to any others whose age and attainments might qualify them for attending with advantage. The academy provided full courses in pure and applied science, history, and ancient and modern literature and languages, and courses in political economy and law. It was, in fact, founded and maintained on a liberal and comprehensive plan, for the purpose of providing a complete and systematic course of studies for the sacred ministry among Liberal Dissenters, and at the same time for young men destined for other occupations or professions, without distinction of party or of religious denomination, and was entirely and characteristically exempt from every political test, and all doctrinal subscription.

The academy, thus re-established, was completely organised on a plan and scale very far in advance of that of any other college at that time in existence in England, and anticipated and foreshadowed the development of what is now known as the Liberal University programme of the present day. It soon became known as the Manchester New College, and later as Manchester College. In the year 1803, for the convenience of teaching, it was transferred to York, where it continued to be maintained under the name of Manchester College, York, as a school of enlightened and free theological study and instruction, and of liberal, literary, and scientific culture, for ministers and laymen, until the year 1840.

In 1840 the College was removed back to Manchester, and again opened there as Manchester New College, as an institution for the sole purpose of giving University learning to those who seek it, without test or confession of faith, upon a scheme as liberal as that of any other college of the day. As such it received Her Majesty's warrant, dated 28th of February, 1840, of affiliation to the University of London.

The opening of University College, London, provided, on a large and effective scale, the means of education in literature, arts, and science, and in the special studies of the medical and legal professions, and rendered them accessible to the classes who could not resort to Oxford or Cambridge; and from 1840 the degrees of the London University were obtainable, first through any one of several affiliated institutions, and subsequently by private study alone. Under these altered conditions the want which Manchester New College sought to meet was, in the secular departments of knowledge, better supplied by more public and powerful bodies. Availing themselves of the new opportunity, the trustees determined to discontinue their own courses of general instruction, and to supply their wants in this respect in connection with the University College in London. In 1853 the College was removed again, and was, and now is, established near the University College in London, where it is at present almost exclusively the resort of students for the ministry. It still steadfastly adheres to its original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge, without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines.

The memorialists attribute to a very deplorable seclusion of students for the ministry from those habits of independent, honest, and fearless pursuit of knowledge and truth, which happily characterise the intellectual movements of this country and this age, a very large part of the now widely-prevailing distrust of received opinions, and even of religious thought in general; and the common and very lamentable want of any genuine and thorough cultivation of theological learning amongst unprofessional students and laymen. They earnestly assert that no culture of the human faculties can be complete which omits a frank and liberal study of the sources, the history, the intellectual value and moral significance of religion in its past and present forms; and they represent that to leave the treatment of so large, so various, so vital a subject, to schools and seminaries pledged to the schemes of particular creed-bound churches, narrows and degrades the noblest of studies, and turns the most elevating of influences into a source of ignorance and bigotry, pride, prejudice, petty controversy, and dissension.

They further submit that any disposition to set theology and culture at variance can proceed only from a narrow conception of both. The great religions of the world have played so large a part in the formation of its languages and the order of its vicissitudes, that neither its past aspects nor its present tendencies can be intelligently interpreted without insight into their common origin and their distinctive meanings. But evidently, for their effective study, they must be submitted to minds open, reverent, judicial, subject to no conditions but such as favour the apprehension and expression of truth.

The memorial was signed for the College by Edward Enfield, president; William Gaskell, chairman of committee of management; David Ainsworth, treasurer; Robert Dukinfield Darbishire, hon. sec.; Charles Beard, hon. sec.; and James Martineau, principal.

LLWYN-RHYD-OWEN, CARDIGAN-SHIRE.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF THE MEMORIAL CHAPEL.

LAST Friday, in the presence of a large concourse of people, notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the foundation stone of the new chapel at the above place was formally laid. It will be remembered that at the latter end of October, 1876, the congregation worshipping at Llwyn-rhyd-owen, being one of the oldest in the county, had, after an unexpected and peremptory notice of one day, to give up the use of the chapel and burial ground, unless they were prepared to run the risk of a perhaps protracted and expensive law suit. The chapel was quietly surrendered, and the uncertain contingencies of a suit-at-law avoided, the congregation meeting for two Sundays in the open air, and afterwards in an adjacent dwelling-house, until a neat wooden structure for temporary ends was thrown up, where the religious services have been regularly carried on since Christmas, 1876. In the meanwhile, however, a piece of land was bought for a chapel and a burial ground in a spot situated within some quarter of a mile of the old place. The new graveyard has been enclosed for some time, several having been already laid to rest in it. The chapel, which measures 52 feet by 34½ feet, is to be made to seat 320, with a gallery only at one end for the present. The contract is £1,095. The land has cost no less a sum than £450, that sum being demanded for a trifle over half an acre. The wooden chapel, besides, cost £100.

The laying of the foundation stone was an event anxiously looked forward to for some time past. The Unitarians are numerous in this district, but ministers of all, or nearly all, the Nonconformist denominations were either present or had written to say they were in sympathy with the meeting, and were only prevented from attending by unavoidable circumstances. The Rev. John Davies, of Altyblacca, read appropriate passages of Scripture and offered up prayer. Two new hymns, written for the occasion by the Rev. William Thomas, M.A., were sung. The foundation stone was laid by Mrs. Jones, of Gellifahren, one of the oldest and most faithful members of the congregation, an elegant silver trowel, ordered from the firm of the Messrs. Haywood, of Sheffield, having been presented to her in the name of the committee by the Rev. William Thomas.

Mrs. Jones, notwithstanding her years and failing strength, managed to lay the stone with great dexterity and art, much to the admiration of all. The Rev. D. Evans, B.A., of Maesymeillion, offered a prayer for blessing on the inauguration ceremony.

After this the large crowd were requested to move up to a higher part of the ground, where a spacious stage was erected for the ladies and ministers present; the three united choirs of Llwyn-rhyd-owen, Capel-y-Fodfa, and Llandyssul stood right in front, and the rest of the assembly behind. Mr. Jones, solicitor, of Gelli-fahren, on taking the chair, delivered an animated and effective speech in which he gracefully acknowledged the honour conferred on his mother by her being asked to lay the foundation-stone. The Chairman then referred in feeling words to what the evicted congregation had had to pass through, and said we had here now a veritable God's acre—our own, paid for, consecrated by the first-fruits of our dead. The light of a better day he was glad to say had already dawned on the Llwyn congregation. Various resolutions were then proposed and carried—the Nonconformist ministers assisting in the moving and seconding of them. The Rev. D. Evans, B.A., of Maesymeillion, one of the former minister's of Llwyn-rhyd-owen, and one who was a grandson of the distinguished scholar, poet, and preacher (the Rev. David Davis, of Castell Howell) who himself had been a minister of this congregation for more than 50 years, proposed in very feeling terms the fifth resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. Wm. Thomas, of Llwyn-rhyd-owen: "That the warm and unanimous thanks of the meeting are due to numerous friends of all denominations. Church of England and Nonconformists alike, who had shown such ready sympathy with the Llwyn-rhyd-owen congregation in its trouble, and who had so handsomely contributed towards providing a new place of worship and of burial." All the resolutions were passed with marked enthusiasm. The hymns throughout the meetings were given out by the Rev. John Davis, of Altyblacca, and at the close a sumptuous tea was served by the ladies of the congregation, many of whom had travelled great distances.

WEST RIDING UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE sixty-third annual meeting of the West Riding Unitarian Mission Society, was held in Wakefield on Wednesday, 19th inst., commencing with a service in the Westgate Chapel, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., Nottingham. Many gentlemen from other churches attended, and the following are the names of some of those who were present:—Revs. Goodwyn Barmby (the pastor), W. Blazebly, B.A., Secretary of the Society; M. S. Dunbar, M.A., J. C. Odgers, B.A., C. Hargrove, M.A., D. Agate, B.A., F. G. Millson, Jno. Fraser; Messrs. Geo. Buckton (the treasurer), Darnton Lupton, C. Woollen, J. Gittings, Elijah Lee, J. Whitaker, J. Lupton, J.P., H. J. Morton, J. W. Connon, Henry Clarkson, T. W. Marriott, Wm. Legge, W. Armitage, Joseph Lupton, and J. Hunter.

After luncheon in the school-room, was held when Mr. Michael Hunter, jun., of Sheffield, presided. There was a very fair attendance.

THE BUSINESS MEETING

The CHAIRMAN briefly introduced the meeting. He said he had old connections with Wakefield, and he had somewhere an old document showing how a hundred years ago a young member of his family on his going to school was detained two or three days by snow at Wakefield. But they could go to and fro more easily now. He was glad to preside over that Society because it maintained the Unitarian name. He believed in adopting a straightforward course. They preached what they believed, and in doing so they did what was right. After a few more remarks, especially urging that as Unitarians they were called to support their mission in a most liberal manner by their contributions, he called upon

Rev. W. BLAZEBY, the secretary, who read the report, of which the following is a summary:—The past year's work at the several stations, with one exception, has been of an encouraging character. To those who look for the gradual and reasonable, and not extraordinary success of our liberal faith, the West Riding Mission will show evidences of more than average progress. At the beginning of the past year the committee considered that the time had come to make a reduction of £5 annually in their payments to the two more flourishing stations. The Pudsey station, under the charge of the Rev. John Bevan, reported a year of good and zealous work. The church has from 80 to 90 seatholders. The average of the Sunday school is for morning 75, afternoon 69. There is a large staff of teachers. There are also week-night classes for young men and young women, and for boys and girls. The sewing class realised at Christmas a profit of £21. The Band of Hope is increasing in numbers. The social teas and entertainments of this station have maintained always unusual success. The several collections, notwithstanding the great depression of trade, have kept up very well. The congregation have not been able, however, to accept a reduction of the £100 grant now made to them by the Mission. Until better times come it is as much as they can do to raise another hundred among themselves, including £50 towards the minister's salary and £50 for chapel and school expenses. The committee have rescinded their resolution so far as this station is at present concerned. The Dewsbury church has concluded a prosperous year under the Rev. J. Henry Smith. Average morning attendance 52, evening 83. Sunday school average, morning 52, afternoon 62. The collections for the Sunday school, church, Indian famine, and Dewsbury Hospital were all good. The balance sheet showed a gratifying increase in receipts of £40 above the previous year. Successful week-night re-unions have been held during the winter months. The chief feature of the year, as indicating the excellent condition of this station, consists in the congregation having unanimously assented to an annual reduction of the Mission grant on the understanding that they thereby acquire the position of an independent church. The committee have cheerfully accorded this congregational independence. Owing in great measure to the success of his labours at Dewsbury, the Rev. J. H. Smith has just been appointed to the responsible charge of the Unitarian church at Sydney, New South Wales. Elland: This particular station has been a source of great anxiety to the committee throughout the past year. It was found necessary to discontinue the services of the Rev. A. Buckley, and the appointment of a successor is left till such a unanimity shall be obtained amongst the members of the congregation as shall give to your committee better promise of future success. The Pepperhill station continues to sustain its favourable character. The services are conducted on alternate Sundays by Mr. Pickles, and on other Sundays by various ministers and lay preachers. The afternoon attendance averages 102, including 44 adults and 58 scholars. Many of the young men and young women, from 18 to 30 years of age, maintain their connection with the station. The surrounding population is very limited, and this Unitarian station appears to secure all the children in the vicinity. The Sunday school sermons on June 2nd, preached by the Rev. F. E. Millson and Mr. Pickles, realised £11. At Keighley, in consequence of the great reduction in the grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a regular missionary has been discontinued, and the services have been maintained by the voluntary assistance of several ministers and lay preachers. The attendance has varied a good deal. There are 20 reliable members and 30 scholars. Tracts have been largely distributed. Lydgate: The Rev. E. Allen deserves to be congratulated on his last year's pastorate at this place. The attendances at the chapel and the Sunday school have both improved. A young men's class has been started on Sunday afternoons. The school has been opened as a newsroom and recreation-room on week-nights. The several collections have been above the average of past-years. The Mission part with the services of Mr. Allen with much regret, as he has by his acceptable and useful ministry won the hearts of old and young alike. He has accepted the pulpit of Walmsley, and the Rev. B. Glover will succeed him at Lydgate. From Doncaster the Rev. J. Fraser reports a successful prosecution of his work. The evening services have averaged 60, and in the lecture season reached 81. Some fresh families have joined the chapel. Mr. Fraser has circulated a large quantity of tracts, as many as 1,200 in last Christmas quarter. He is now issuing from his hand-press tract-covers, giving all congregational information, and he also sends forth from 300 to 400 handbills from week to week announcing his evening subjects. He has started music, mutual improvement, sewing, and lay-preachers classes. The special lectures in the winter caused the small chapel to be crowded. The minister and congregation feel encouraged to take up a fresh and former scheme for the erection of a new chapel. The cost is estimated at £1,000, the land being already at command. At Thorn the Rev. Geo. Wooller has retired of his own accord from the pulpit, and arrangements have been made by the Mission with Mr. Fraser for his preaching there on alternate Sundays, the friends on the spot undertaking the other Sundays. Mr. Fraser was also engaged by the committee to deliver a course of Unitarian lectures during last season at Pepperhill, Keighley, and Hunslet. They were well attended and greatly appreciated. In conclusion the committee wished a hearty "God-speed" to their departing co-workers, the Revs. J. H. Smith, E. Allen, and Dendy Agate, and gave a cordial welcome to the Revs. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., and Benj. Glover. The past year had put their missionary organisation to unusual test and strain, but it had proved equal to its responsibilities. The funds had been regulated with combined liberality and prudence; a good oversight had been maintained over the several stations; the resuscitation of one of the oldest West Riding chapels had been accomplished at Doncaster, while to the promising young Mission church at Dewsbury that "complete independence" had been accorded which it is the distinguishing glory of our own free churches to possess and to perpetuate.

Mr. GEORGE BUCKTON, of Leeds, the treasurer, then read the balance sheet for the past year, which showed that the income had been £568. 10s. 6d., and the expenditure £658. 1s. 11d., leaving a deficit of £89. 11s. 5d. as against one of £81. 11s. 8d. at the commencement of the year.

Mr. S. P. BACKSHELL, of Wakefield, moved: "That the reports of the Committee and Treasurer be adopted and printed, and that the thanks of this meeting be given to the retiring officers." He urged the claims of the Society on all the congregations of the district, and strongly insisted that the balance due to the Treasurer should be cleared off forthwith. (Hear.)

the resolution, and though hesitating, as a member of the committee, to criticise the operations of their Mission Society, thought the report took a somewhat roseate view of their affairs. He did not, however, question any of the statements of the report, but he could not help thinking that the Society ought to be doing a good deal more.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON rose to support the committee's report as against some of the last speaker's remarks. Mr. Millson having further explained what he had intended to say,

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., of Leeds, urged that such a society representing the West Riding did not discharge its full duties. He thought that the subscription list did not show that the members of their congregations were as interested as they might be in the Mission. He illustrated this by stating that their own collection at Leeds on Mission Sunday was very small indeed in proportion to what they raised for their hospital collection. Why was there this great difference?

Rev. W. BLAZEBY, the secretary, maintained that with one or two exceptions their mission stations were never in a more flourishing and promising condition. It was a great reason of congratulation that Dewsbury church had claimed to be considered an independent congregation; it was no small matter that Pudsey station raised £100 per annum; it was encouraging to see how well Pepperhill sustained its good position; and then at Doncaster an old congregation, reduced to a very low ebb, had been resuscitated by the help of their Mission. (Cheers.) What they were doing was good work. They admitted the disappointments at Elland and Keighley, but they did not despair of these places. Those who wanted more to be done had only to provide larger funds. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was unanimously carried, and several gentlemen in the meeting offered to subscribe towards clearing off at once the debt against the Society.

The Rev. GOODWYN BARNABY, of Wakefield, proposed, in an admirable and sympathetic speech, that the best thanks of the meeting be given to the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., of Nottingham, for his powerful and appropriate sermon before the Society.

Mr. JOHN ARMITAGE, of Sheffield, warmly seconded the vote; and, in regard to the discussion on their mission stations, stated from his own knowledge that the Society was doing a great amount of good. He offered himself to contribute more to the funds. (Cheers.)

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., responded to the vote of thanks; and, dwelling pointedly upon some remarks of the report, earnestly pleaded that as individuals and congregations they should endeavour especially to "realise," to make real, their best thoughts and highest aspirations.

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS, B.A., late of Leeds, and now of Evesham, proposed, and Mr. PADLEY, of Scarborough, seconded, "That this meeting expresses its earnest interest in the work of the mission stations and their ministers; congratulates Dewsbury church on its becoming an independent congregation; and accords its grateful thanks to the various ministers and lay preachers who have rendered their valuable services in mission work during the past year.

The Rev. J. FRASER responded on behalf of the missionaries, and Mr. CHARLES WOOLLEN on behalf of the lay preachers, both gentlemen delivering very effective addresses.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., proposed, and in a most admirable though short speech supported, the following resolution: "That this meeting desires to record the esteem and gratitude in which it holds the memory of the late venerable and illustrious statesman, Earl Russell, to whose exertions were especially due the passing of the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and the various successive measures in favour of religious liberty consequent thereon. And at the same time, to express its earnest hope that the great reform so inaugurated may soon be carried to its full and legitimate extent, so that profession of dogmatic belief shall no longer be required as the condition of holding any office whatsoever subject to State control or patronage."

Mr. H. J. MORTON had great pleasure in seconding this resolution, and supporting the wish of the meeting that a copy of the same be forwarded to Lady Russell.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON then proposed a resolution of good wishes to those ministers leaving the district, and a hearty welcome to those entering it, to which the Rev. S. DUNBAR responded.

A vote of thanks to our Wakefield friends for their hospitality, and one to the Chairman, brought the meeting to a close.

PRESCOT. Special services were held here on Sunday week, when sermons were preached by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of Liverpool, and collections taken in aid of the chapel funds.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The Rev. WM. GASKELL said that when it was considered that that was the tenth occasion on which he had had to address the Assembly, it could hardly be expected that he should have much that was novel to offer them, but that his thoughts were very likely to run in grooves that they had run in before. All that he could say was that if they would persist year after year in placing him in the position of president, they must take the consequences. (Laughter, and hear, hear.) First, following his usual course, he noticed the changes that had taken place in the province that more immediately affected them during the twelve months, and referred to the losses they had sustained in the deaths of the Rev. T. Elford Pointing, of Monton, and the Rev. F. Ashton, M.A., of Glossop. Speaking of the gains to the Province during the year, he said that they would have ten new ministers settled among them—a larger number than usual. They were the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth, Lancaster; the Rev. E. Allen, Walmsley; the Rev. J. G. Evans, Preston; Mr. M. E. Gabriel, North End Mission, Liverpool; the Rev. H. Hill, Rawtenstall; the Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., Oldham; the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, Hale; the Rev. Jas. Macdonald, Kendal; the Rev. C. H. Osler, Over Darwen; the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., Warrington; and the Rev. E. C. Towne, B.A., Ardwick. To each and all of these he was sure the Assembly would join with him in offering a cordial welcome, with a sincere wish that their work would prosper in their hands and that they might be abundantly blessed in it. (Hear, hear.) After remarking on the position of some of the mission stations, the President referred to the gratifying change of opinion in regard to future punishment. Still, he observed, there were plenty of hindrances to be removed out of the way before the Christianity of Christ, as distinguished from that of the Churches, could have a free course and display fully its saving power. For instance, there was the system called Catholic, but which was so in no respect. There was good reason, he feared, for Cardinal Manning's boast that Romanism had been making steady progress of late in this country. Across the border half a century ago there was no more than 80,000 belonging to the faith; now there were 360,000. In England, too, the activity of the Romanists had led to a like success. Their schools, their chapels, their monastic institutions had multiplied. In laying the foundation stone of a new wing of a college at Manchester, Cardinal Manning had urged "the necessity of creating educational institutions adequate for the needs of the future of the vast middle class that was growing up among them. A few years ago, the middle-class Catholics were exceedingly limited in number, but of late years, especially in London, by commerce and industry, a large middle class had been created among them. Since 1788 the number of Catholics had increased in Manchester from 16,000 to over 100,000, and the number of churches and priests had multiplied in like manner." Now, while he (the speaker) did not share in Mr. Whalley's alarm, and had no fear that Papalism would ever again become dominant in this country, he could not regard with slight concern or as having no manner of interest for them, the progress that was thus being made. It constituted a call on them to make known their claims and their faith and to do all they could to prevent the bringing back of a belief which Lord Macaulay termed an execrable superstition, and which to him seemed little better than semi-Paganism. He could respect the motives of many of these men; they were, no doubt, kind, self-denying, and hard-working, but there stood the damning fact that the Church of Rome was an organised tyranny, framed to crush all individual thought and spiritual activity out of the soul. (Hear, hear.) Nor should they shut their eyes to the system in the English Church which called itself "Catholic truth." Its near approach to Romanism was shown in the secessions from it that were constantly taking place to the Church of Rome. Not long ago this was treated lightly, and it was said "it was only a few priests and women playing at religion," but that was not the case now. This party in the Church was gaining ground, while the Evangelicals were losing in influence and strength. To some people the candles, the parti-coloured clothes, the processions, wafers, &c., were very small matters, of trifling moment, but they showed how desirous the Anglo-Romanists were to re-establish the Roman ritual and doctrine, of which these things were the symbols, in the English Church. They refused to be called Protestants, and were sliding back into the ante-Reformation regime. One effect of this was the tendency to hide from view the spiritual nature of Christ's Kingdom, and cause the real objects of worship to be lost sight of altogether. Like Romanism they would make salvation sacramental and ministerial—something to be wrought by the hand of a priest. For resisting these pretensions they (the Unitarians) had special advantages. Their testimony against them was not weakened by connection with a State Church, which sheltered, if it did not sanction, them. (Hear, hear.) They recognised no other law than that of obedience to their own convictions of what was right. It seemed to him that there was a clear call upon them to turn this position to good account by hearing open testimony to great Protestant principles, and by showing that no man is true to himself if he suffers any intermediary—be he priest, patriarch, or pope—to come between him and God. (Hear, hear.) Although, as he had pointed out, orthodoxy was undergoing a change for the better, it was not seldom that persons were to be found who persisted in preaching a form of Christianity which was so repulsive to the minds of many. In one of the principle churches of Scotland last autumn he had heard the most unmitigated Calvinism taught. "Good dispositions," the preacher said, "availed nothing; good works availed nothing; good morals amounted to nothing; strict observance of religious duties availed nothing; only faith in the atoning blood of Christ can save you." At the last meeting of the Congregational Union a resolution was passed by a large majority, though the President himself thought it was unwise to do so, to the effect that "in consequence of the uneasiness in the Churches caused by the proceedings of the Congress at Leicester on the terms of communion, this meeting desires to reaffirm the essential conditions of communion in Congregational Churches," and among these was a belief in the incarnation and the atoning sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ. At the annual Conference of Evangelical clergy recently held in this town, Canon Farrar's book, "Eternal Hope," was condemned as mischievous by Canon Ryle, and he did not know what interpretation to put upon that gentleman's language if he did not mean that his reverend brother was coming under Satanic influence, for he said, "The arch enemy was still using his old weapon; he was still whispering: 'Thou shalt not surely die.'" At the same conference, the Rev. A. Stowell, on behalf of the Evangelical clergy, repudiated utterly the conduct of those clergymen who were accustomed to disuse the Athanasian Creed. Many of the Evangelical clergy, he said, were its stoutest defenders. Things like these showed that there was still a great work to do, to which they must resolutely bend their energies. After protesting against the indifference to the propagation of their principles manifested by many Unitarians, the President said that in his recently published history of the 18th century, Lecky said that the Unitarians never had been, and were never likely to be, an important or an aggressive sect, for a great many of them were little disposed to attach themselves to any religious body, or to take any interest in sectarian life. The latter statement might be true, but the former was becoming less and less so, and their influence outside their own ranks was becoming proportionately greater. Looking more to the great principles in which they agreed, and less to the minor matters on which they differed, they were prepared, he trusted, for "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together." As a summoning up of these remarks, he might say:

Look back, how much there has been won;
Look round, how much there is to win;
The watches of the night are done,
The watches of the day begin.

The SECRETARY having read the minutes of the last meeting.

The Rev. S. FARRINGTON moved, and the Rev. G. WELLS seconded, the re-election of Mr. Gaskell to the office of President.

The motion having been carried with loud applause, Mr. GASKELL, briefly acknowledged the honour conferred upon him.

Mr. H. Rawson was re-elected treasurer, and the Rev. H. E. Dowson secretary.

The TREASURER presented the financial statement, from which it appeared that the total receipts had been £44. 19s. 10d. The expenses had been £20. 2s.; leaving a balance in hand of £24. 7s. 10d.

The Rev. F. H. JONES invited the Assembly to meet next year at Oldham, and, on the motion of the secretary, the invitation was unanimously accepted. Lancaster was added to the list of places where the Assembly could be held. The Rev. S. Farrington was appointed Supporter for the next year.

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER then moved: That the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire, in annual meeting assembled, desire to pay the tribute of their grateful homage to the memory of the Right Hon. Earl Russell; that as Nonconformists they cannot but remember that for the wide exercise of their civil rights which they now enjoy they are largely indebted to the honoured champion of civil and religious liberty, who lived to celebrate the jubilee of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, which repeal was mainly due to his strenuous exertions; and that they would present to the Countess Russell the expression of their respectful sympathy with her in a loss which the nation shares. That this resolution be engrossed, signed by the Chairman, and forwarded by the Society to the Countess Russell.

The Rev. W. H. HERFORD seconded the motion, which was supported by the Rev. C. Wicksteed, who in the course of a few remarks mentioned the fact that he was present at a dinner held at Liverpool just 50 years ago in connection with the Annual Assembly, at which Earl Russell was thanked for his efforts to secure the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts.

The motion was carried unanimously.

The Rev. J. Freeston gave notice that at the next Assembly he would move the appointment of a select committee to devise means for the removal of certain unredressed grievances of Dissenters.

The Assembly then adjourned, and the members proceeded to the Prince of Wales Hotel, where a substantial meal was served.

THE EVENING MEETING

Was held in the Town Hall, when Mr. W. A. Jevons presided.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said the other denominations had distinguishing creeds and organisations which tended to exclude those who did not believe in all the articles of those creeds. Unitarians, on the other hand, constituted a body without creed and without organisation, but with a history of over a century and a half, which proved that their bond of union was not their theology but their freedom. But freedom had its duties as well as its privileges. He had heard it prophesied that the future of the advanced Churches of Christendom would pass out of their hands; that their ministers would not much longer be the leaders of thought. They knew that in many other communities, such as the Broad Church, the Congregationalists, and even the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland, freedom of thought was beginning to make its way; and they also found that the very views which they had long advocated created great sensation when put forward by these orthodox bodies. Were they then to conclude that the Unitarians were no longer to be the leaders in free thought and inquiry in theological matters? He did not believe that would be so; he did not believe that any advocacy of their views could be so effective as when put forward by those who for a century and a half had been entirely free and without restriction in their thought and teaching.

In conclusion he suggested that at their annual assemblies, their ministers should be interrogated as to the work that was being done by their respective churches, and as to what steps were taken to bring the Gospel into the dark places of the earth.

The Rev. JOHN WRIGHT then addressed the meeting. He said that they valued the liberty which they possessed not as an end, but as a means to an end—that end being truth. Then they valued theology far less than religion; they valued it, indeed, only as it led them to religious truth, and to the love of truth. It had often been said that theology, and especially Protestantism, had caused great evil by creating so many divisions among Christians, inasmuch that there seemed to be no prospect whatever of Christians becoming "one in Christ," but rather that the prophesy that he came not to give peace but dissension on the earth was likely to be fulfilled. Well, for one, he did not wish to see fewer of these theological divisions, because he believed that the greater the amount of freedom that existed, the more likelihood there was of Christians becoming one in religion, even if they were many in theology. The speaker went on to express the opinion that the evidences in support of this view of a greater unity and union among the various denominations of Christians were becoming every day more numerous. Referring to a letter that had appeared in a local paper, signed by a minister of a Presbyterian congregation, expressing his astonishment that they should claim the name of "Presbyterian," the speaker pointed out that their Assembly was a continuation of an ancient institution which bore the name of Presbyterian, and he did not see why, because they had grown into the latter name of Unitarian, they should be false to their ancient title. The writer said that Presbyterianism was identified with a creed and with a certain form of church government; to him (the speaker) it was identified with freedom of religious belief without regard to creed. The letter contained an ungenerous hint that the adherence to the name of Presbyterian was connected with the holding of emoluments. Now, the writer could not know that the Unitarians held no endowments, no chapels, no property whatever which contained in any way a reference to Trinitarianism. Whenever they had found such a connection, they had at once voluntarily renounced them, and they had done so in every case. (Hear, hear.) The rev. gentleman next referred to the great amount of insincerity that existed at the present time in the preaching of Christian ministers, and strongly advocated every man boldly speaking out the whole truth that was in him, whatever the result.

MR. COE ON DENOMINATIONALISM.

The Rev. C. C. COE said there were, he believed, 130 sects in England, and if there were 131 there were many people who would declare that that was just 130 too many. There ought to be but one religion and one church, and this indefinite multiplication of sects is an abomination in their eyes. Why should men divide what God intends to be one and indivisible? Why should the seamless robe of Christ be rent or even raffled for? Hence some would recommend the one church which is based upon Divine authority, teaching infallible truth, celebrating its divinely-appointed ritual, holding those lost and doomed to everlasting punishment who do not believe this truth and submit themselves to this discipline, and, as the natural, the logical, and benevolent outcome of this faith, persecuting all recusants here in order to secure their everlasting salvation hereafter. There was a time when it was highly dangerous to argue against a system which made so pointed and so personal an application of its principles to outsiders. But now this practical and logical application of these principles is forbidden by the humane spirit of the age. Others hoped to maintain the Church one and indivisible by basing it on the fraternal sympathy of those who have common religious sentiments, regardless of the differences of theological opinions. For his own part, he questioned whether such a church has ever existed, could ever exist, ought ever to exist. There is a denomination—and we have not to go far to seek it—in which the ex-Catholic priest, the ex-Church clergyman, and the ex-Orthodox Dissenting minister, unite to form a strong and first-class mixture; but the harmony of the union arises from the fact that they have left their distinctive doctrines behind them. If they had not, did we think that it would be possible to muzzle them? The honest expression of opinion would soon make such union impossible; the dishonest suppression of opinion would make such union immoral. The covenant of silence would be a conspiracy of silence. We were told, indeed, that the Church is one, because it is the Church of God, and that man ought not to break it up into sects. But this one Church of God seemed a rather visionary affair. It is a figurative way of saying that God accepts every sincere worshipper, whatever his culture, whatever the consequent strength or feebleness of his aspiration. But it is one thing to say that God is willing to accept these varied utterances, and another thing to assert that all men can unite in such varied worship—for worship which is articulate must indicate the faith of the worshipper. And how shall they worship together thus whose conceptions of Deity really constitute them worshippers of different gods? The same argument applies to the unity which some infer from the fact that the Church is the Church of Christ, and that Christ will accept all who live in his spirit. It is not a question, however, whom Christ will accept, but who are willing to work together for the promotion of Christian influences. Surely only those can combine as Christians in religious organisations who take a similar view of the person and work of Christ. But, again, it is said that the Church on earth ought to be one, because the Church in heaven will be one. But, if so, it will be one, because we shall then "know even as also we are known." Circumstances will render unity possible; but that does not prove that a similar communion is feasible here, where the circumstances are so different. And as to the complete intellectual agreement between all souls in heaven, he was not himself at all clear upon that point. He believed that there was a continuity between this life and another, and that we should carry our individualities with us: that "as one star differeth from another star in glory," so also is the resurrection. It was thought by some sanguine souls that the Established Church has only to adopt a modified liturgy, and content herself with the simplest of her three creeds, and then there will be no further need for Dissent. That was a beautiful dream, not likely to be speedily realised. The modification would not attract the orthodox Dissenter, already hopelessly repelled by the connection between Church and State. And it was hardly to be supposed that the High Church and the Low Church would readily consent to an arrangement which would have for its effect to make the doctrines of the Broad Church the established religion of the country. This desire for the one church seemed to him to ignore the force of family tradition and of personal association. For himself he did not believe that the denominations would be absorbed into one church; and he was not sorry to arrive at this conclusion, for he believed that they each had a great work to do. They met the different wants of the community at large, and they performed different functions. Nor was there any reason why these denominational differences should be abused so as to breed sectarian jealousy and bitterness. We must tolerate one another: hence we need not be afraid of one another. It was said the other day "that the tomahawk could never be buried, and the pipe of peace could never be smoked between the spirit of the age and orthodox Christianity." Whatever might be the case with respect to this conflict of ideas, he rejoiced to know that the tomahawk of persecution, as between sect and sect, had been buried, and, he trusted, never likely to be dug up again; and rather than it should be, he for one would revert to narcotic practices, and take once more to the literal smoking of the pipe of peace. Even in our controversies there need be nothing of bitterness. We should learn not only to state clearly what we believe to be wrong, but we should also strive to penetrate to that underlying truth which gives its strength to every error. It would be a gross abuse of denominational divisions if they led us to ignore the opportunities of common action which awaits us as fellow-citizens and as Christians. It was a delightful fact that in the broad field of public service and of Christian philanthropy, all can and do meet together; and Southport, although an honourable, is not an unique instance of the fact that the Unitarian minister, no less than others, may find his sphere of public usefulness, and be honoured by the community at large for the fidelity and earnestness of his disinterested labour. But now, as to the duty which a man owes to the denomination to which he belongs: certainly he should not be ashamed of being what he is. It may be an honourable thing to belong to a church which has long antiquity on its side; it may be a highly respectable thing to belong to the established religion of a country; it may be satisfactory, in many ways, to belong to the church which is locally the most numerous and influential, but, if our conscience forbids us to choose in any of these directions, we ought not to regret the baits which have failed to allure us, so as to appear ashamed of our high choice of principle over expediency. We ought to cultivate a special sympathy within the limits of our own denomination. If it is well for us to work in connection with Christians of all denominations, as far as opportunity permits, it is surely no less our bounden duty to work for the church in which our lot is cast, since in this connection only can our religious service be given. The yearning for denominational sympathy, the zeal for denominational work, is therefore no narrowing thing; it is simply zeal for the only effort in behalf of religion which is open to us. In the present crisis it appeared to him to be of the greatest importance that we as a denomination should not only discard the vision of the one church as an impossible dream, and that we should discourage the bitter sectarian spirit, and cultivate a generous appreciation of those that are without, but that, above all, we should look to ourselves, and to the impression which we are likely to make upon the world in which we live. The question which was now agitating one great section of the church was whether a sect can be left free to inquire and yet develop a rich spiritual experience. There seemed to be in some minds a doubt upon this point, and it was for us who were born free, and remained uncompromised by creeds, to solve the question by showing ourselves not only free to receive new truth from whatever source it may come, but willing to make the truth, which is ours, the guide of our feet, the stay of our souls, the palpable inspiration of our lives.

THE RELIGION FOR THE AGE.

The Rev. WILLIAM BINNS said he would briefly state what, according to his belief, a sound and healthy religion was, as the want of the world in the present age. The philosophy and science of the matter he would put on one side in the main. What we needed was such a practical interpretation of religion as would satisfy the mind and conscience and heart at the same time, and make us brave, strong, and joyous. Men must have a religion of some kind, if they are to be true and complete men. And there were so many varieties that it required a wide sympathy to do anything like justice to them. The first impulse of untrained minds was to condemn all round what they did not agree with themselves, and to baptise all faiths as heresies which were not the fac-simile of their own faith. We had to guard equally against the bigotry which shows itself in persecution, and the bigotry which shows itself in contempt. (Hear, hear.) But this freedom from bigotry, which he hoped we all had, is not to be confounded with indifference, which he hoped none of us had. While we treated all systems with tenderness and reverence because of the sacred aims they set before them it was plain that there were profound distinctions among them, and if one was a watchfire for a village, another was sunshine for the whole human race. He wished to discover the best religion, what the world was groping and longing for, and what he was persuaded we had it in our power to give to the world, and so to satisfy its hunger and thirst with spiritual meat and drink. Of course we might fairly say the best religion is being good and doing good, and loving God and our neighbour, and that would be right enough as far as it went. But human nature is not content even with such sublime generalities as these. Wisely or unwisely we insisted on systematising our religion and making a theology of it. The world needed a religion that should be large and warm, and should make grand affirmations. Such a sound religion would alone succeed in enlightening agnosticism, and converting secularism, and delivering the popular orthodoxy out of Egypt. It was our function to be its herald, and to proclaim the infinite and eternal perfection of God, and his fatherly providence running through all ages, and the final triumph of his will in gathering all prodigals to his fireside. (Cheers.) There were many difficulties in our way, and the chief difficulty was the readiness of people to content themselves with bits of things which imagination conveniently contrived to treat as a whole. Everybody who had tried experiments of progress either in politics or education or religion was well aware how hard a task it was to persuade men to accept great and all-embracing schemes. To be interested in them even is a troublesome business. And it was so much easier to stop at a halfway house, and either say that's the end, or the road further is impassable. And this was particularly the case in these easy going days with respect to religion and religious theories. If you say all is mystery, idlers are pleased, for then they have done. If you say all is nonsense, of course it is a waste of time to try and make meaning where there is none. (Hear, hear.) These were two methods of dispensing with religious theories. But the bulk of men happily could not and would not dispense with them. The mind had its claims and it created dogmatists. And the dogmatists who gave less trouble could be the most popular. If doctrines could be shut up in a catechism, or swallowed whole like a pill, or gulped down like a glass of wine, multitudes would gladly secure them. (Hear, hear.) How very easy it was to take in the most popular religious systems, which also take us in. (Laughter.) Roman Catholicism is vouchsafed for by the priest, and an implicit belief compasses all. Calvinism is a short syllogism with the major and minor premises, both begged and the conclusion illogically drawn. The mental labour was made as light as possible. There were no tossings on a tempestuous sea of inquiry, and no fresh revelations of truth to look out for; all was possessed in a few sentences, or else a book contained it. He had rehearsed the articles of his belief as a boy according to the Catechism. He had been a Methodist, and tasted the fleeting raptures of the class meetings. He had put religion aside along with the Secularists and agnostics. So he had known what a poor satisfaction there was to be got from them all. He called these systems small, cold, and negative, and believed that in the providence of God they would be outgrown, and that a larger, warmer, and affirmative system was what the world was moving to. (Cheers.) Look at the comparisons, or, rather, contrasts. He called that a large religion which embraced all forms of theological thought as attempts to decipher the meaning of the mind of God, and all sacred books as records of the experiences of pious men, and all scientific facts as divine thoughts taking outward material shape, and all the opportunities of life as spheres for serving God in, and all men and women as making a pilgrimage through discipline and tribulation to their eternal and heavenly home. Show him a larger, and it should be his. By the side of that Catholicism was poor, and Broad Church comprehensiveness was a blue gingham umbrella pretending to be the overarching sky, and physical science of any sort, or all sorts, was the mere swell of the Atlantic laving the muddy banks of the Ribble and the Mersey. (Laughter and cheers.) And he called that religion small which says only our church has a glimmering of the true light, only our interpretation of the Bible has saving grace in it, literature and science by themselves are outside the pale, the natural life is a profane thing, and only our faith will help men to find their way safely to where

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dressed in living green;
As to the Jews old Sannan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

He called that small—he called it very small. But for a long time to come yet it would be popular precisely on account of its smallness, just as it gratified pothouse politicians and tailors of Tooley-street to style themselves “we, the people of England.” (Cheers.) And he called that a warm religion which feels its heart beat in sympathy with humanity, which cannot endure a heaven from which the brethren are for ever exiled, which believes that God knows how to turn every sinner into a saint and will do it, and which foretells the advent of a blessed time when the people that now walk in darkness shall see and rejoice in the great light of God. (Cheers.) As he spoke of it he felt the summer sun shining, and heard from afar the echoes of the hallelujah chorus which the angels sing. (Hear, hear.) And he called that religion cold which is satisfied to save a handful of the chosen, which can be happy with the knowledge that sinners are always sinners, and whose votaries can bear to wave palm branches in the New Jerusalem untroubled by the thought that “all hope abandon ye who enter here” is inscribed on the portals of the gloomy Inferno where the rest of the children of God with devils dwell in darkness, fire, and chains. (Hear, hear.) Really, he knew and could imagine nothing colder than such a religion when you probe it. It had a flinty, an icy heart. It was the very frigid zone of theology. (Cheers.) One heard talk, sometimes, of its warmth. The warmth was the crackling of thorns under a pot, burning the fingers of standers by, and leaving outsiders to starve and freeze, yet giving them warmth enough afterwards, of a sort that would be disagreeable. (Cheers.) Calvin at Geneva must have been as grim and cold as the rugged Matterhorn. And he called that an affirmative religion which boldly, in the face of waywardness and iniquity, dared to proclaim the sure establishment of the Kingdom of God, which believed that His power, wisdom, and goodness are absolutely infinite, and must conquer, and must baffle our folly and sin, and never tire in seeking us out, and never shut the door against us when, weary and penitent, we turned towards home. These were affirmations which deserved to be called Christianity. Behind all frowning providences they worshipped a smiling face. They asked time for their fulfilment, but they made the calling and election of all humanity sure. (Cheers.) And he called that a negative religion which sets a victorious devil against God, and a hell from which there is no deliverance against heaven. It was made up of denials of the grand affirmations of faith. (Hear, hear.) It practically reduced to nothing the omnipotence, omniscience, and infinite goodness of God. We hear foolish talk sometimes of its being negative theology to question the beauty of the Apocalypses, to doubt the historical reality of miracles, and to depart a hair's breadth from the established standards. But the negative theology from which he charged them to flee, as from Vesuvius in an eruption, was that which takes away from us our Heavenly Father. (Cheers.) These, then, were some of the comparisons and contrasts between a sound and an unsound religion. An unsound religion was small, cold, and negative; a sound religion was large, warm, and affirmative. And a sound religion was what the age needed. We were—partly by inheritance, partly by a providential necessity, and partly by our free choice, its appointed mouthpieces. We were in the front rank among the prophets of the good time coming. (Hear, hear.) He wished he could believe that we were up to the mark of our high calling. But some of us took refuge in mystery; and, because we could not know God to perfection, we talked as if we did not know Him at all. And some of us, again, were frightened because so great a duty was laid upon us, and we went about like Tennyson's weak minded “Lady of Burleigh,” burdened with an honour unto which we wished we had not been born. (Hear, hear.) With a large religion we were not all large in culture and sympathy; with a warm religion we were not all warm hearted and helpful in our lives; with an affirmative religion we were too prone to utter our affirmations with bated breath and whispering humbleness. The dwellers in the lowlands shamed some of us who stood on the mountain tops. They were faithful, as they easily could be, to their little schemes; and we trembled as our eyes ranged over the wide prospect, and felt that to fill it with aspiration and service was a toilsome, though it was so glorious an enterprise. (Hear, hear.) Why was there so much selfishness in all classes of the community, such narrow culture, such indifference to the ideal, such contentment with the common round, such an absence of devotion to universal ends? He would tell them. It was because the popular religion did not invite people to take possession of thought, imagination, emotion, and practice, and consecrate them all to God; and because, although their own religion did invite them to do so—nay, commanded them to do so—they feared to face the obstacles which stood in their way, and to grapple with them in the strength that God never fails to give to those who put their trust in Him. Henceforth, let us teach agnosticism to the agnostics, accompanied by the confession that, as we only know in part we can only prophesy in part, but still we do know, and we do prophesy. (Hear, hear.) Let us in tenderness and charity guide men and women from small, cold, and negative systems, into a system large, warm, and affirmative. He would not lift a finger to disturb any faith, however inadequate he might consider it, except he felt sure that he could give something better in return for what he took away. But the world now was waiting for such a message as we had to deliver. Let us, therefore, arise and shine, because our light is come, and the glory of the Lord is arisen upon us. (Loud cheers.)

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. John Felstead, of Nottingham, has accepted the unanimous invitation to become the minister and pastor of the people worshipping at the Conigre General Baptist (Unitarian) Chapel, Trowbridge, as successor to the late Rev. Samuel Martin, who filled the office so worthily for fifty years. Mr. Felstead, it is expected, will enter on his duties in August or September next.

ABERDEEN: FLOWER SUNDAY.—Last Sunday, June 23rd, the church was decorated with plants and flowers. The school children occupied the centre of the building, and sang two hymns in a very creditable manner. Mr. Walters preached from “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God,” after which those scholars who had attained the age of sixteen, and who, during the past year, had become members of the church, were presented each with a Bible and hymn-book, one from the church committee and the other from the school teachers. There was a very large morning congregation.

DUNDEE: SUNDAY SCHOOL EXCURSION.—On Tuesday, June 25, about 180 friends visited Blebo, the estate of Alexander Bethune, Esq., in Fifeshire. Additional interest was given to the journey by the crossing of the remarkable railway bridge over the river Tay, recently completed, two and a half miles long, said to be the longest bridge, over a tidal river, in the world. The weather was excellent, and throughout the day all heartily enjoyed themselves.

CHEADELLE, STAFFORDSHIRE.—On Monday evening last, the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Leicester, delivered a lecture here on “What has the Unitarian Church to offer to the world.” There were about seventy adults present, who listened attentively to the lecturer, showing that they were in unison by their frequent rounds of applause. A very hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Hopps, and a strong wish was expressed that they might soon have the pleasure of hearing him again.

GLASGOW: ST. VINCENT-STREET CHURCH.—On Thursday, 20th June, the teachers, scholars, and friends

DOING AND SAYING.

On the reverse of the medal struck in 1828 to commemorate the repeal of the Corporation and Tests Acts are four words; and whenever the question is put, "What do the Dissenters of England want?" the reply may be given in these words—"Truth, peace, charity, freedom."

Miss Isabella M. S. Tod, hon. secretary of the Belfast Ladies' Institute, writes to the Daily News, stating, on good authority, that the Irish Intermediate Education Bill is intended to apply to girls as well as boys. The committees of those schools and institutions which have striven by private effort to make up the acknowledged deficiency, as far as the large towns are concerned, and those which take charge of the examinations for women of the Dublin University and the Queen's University in Ireland, are moving in the matter. Memorials on the subject will shortly be laid before the proper authorities; and there is reason to believe that this opportunity—the best that has ever been presented in Ireland—will not pass without some adequate effort being made to give women a fair share of help.

The annual report of the Committee of Council on Education, just issued, shows very satisfactory statistical progress. Accommodation has been provided for 3,653,418, scholars, being an increase of 6.62 per cent; scholars on the register have increased 7.17 per cent; attendance, 8.37 per cent; inspected, 9.16 per cent; and those individually examined, 16.85 per cent. The passes per cent averaged 85.78 in reading, 78.99 in writing, and 69.97 in arithmetic. Voluntary contributions, rates, and school pence all show an increase; and the Government grant averaged 14s. 4½d. per scholars against 13s. 3¼d. last year. A very acceptable feature of the report is, that Government loans to schools boards now amount to 9,348,318£., and that since the commencement of the Act upwards of 700 schools have been transferred to schools boards, including 447 Church schools, 10 Wesleyan, and 167 British schools.

The Guardian is not at all pleased with Bishop Ellicott's Nineteenth Century article on the Establishment. The bishop's tone "helps us," says our contemporary, "to understand why things do not go quite smoothly in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol. He begins by allowing that the desire for some readjustment of the relations between Church and State is assuming considerable dimensions, and is not confined to any one party; and then, rather inconsistently, proceeds to treat it in an essay, which is an elaborate 'Pooh, pooh!' from beginning to end. He reviews various measures which have been proposed; but finally comes to a conclusion, which reminds us a little of the invalid host in one of Miss Austen's novels, whose hospitable invitations to his famished guests at supper-time dwindle down in fear of what may be unwholesome, to the final proposal, 'Let us all have a little water gruel.'"

The Paris correspondent of the Guardian refers to a construction in the Paris exhibition which is well worthy of notice on many accounts. This is an Egyptian "house." It is described by M. de Lesseps as being an "exact reproduction of what was supposed to be the dwelling of Abraham's great grandfather!" Who can lay claim to sufficient Biblical lore to venture to say more on such a subject? But, whatever may have been the uses to which the venerable individual above mentioned may have applied his dwelling, its fac-simile is now filled with a very complete collection of the produce, chiefly agricultural, of the land of Egypt—fruits, seeds, wheat, maize, grapes, vegetable produce of all kinds, cotton, &c., all very beautifully arranged, and calculated, by their richness and variety, to impart considerable comfort and confidence even to a disconsolate Egyptian bondholder. Surely a land apparently so teeming with the fruits of the earth ought to be able to pay its dividends.

A rumour has got afloat that Lord Beaconsfield will not return from the Congress empty-handed, and that he is preparing for his countrymen a sensational surprise—no less a thing, in fact, than a British protectorate over the Holy Land. Whether this rumour has arisen from a perusal of Coningsby, or whether it be based on the notion that Lord Beaconsfield would be doing a popular thing if he succeeded in that which the Crusaders failed to perform—anyhow, there is a very widespread opinion among French politicians (and it deserves, at least, mention on that account) that the coast from Beyrout to Gaza will soon become English ground, while the Christian standard of Britain will float over Jerusalem and Damascus. It is said in Paris that Lord Beaconsfield will never find such an opportunity as the present for realising one of his most oft-avowed dreams. The French under a Republican Government are more indifferent to the fate of the Holy Land than they used to be under monarchical institutions, and would make little objection to its passing under the English flag; while an excuse for the annexation might easily be found in the necessity for protecting the Christians of Palestine from fanatical measures like that of 1760. This, say the French, would set Lord Beaconsfield right with the ecclesiastical section of Mr. Gladstone's followers, who accused him of being indifferent to the lot of the Bulgarian Christians; while throughout every Protestant home in the three kingdoms there would be a thrill of joy at the thought that the Holy Sepulchre was at last rescued from the custody of "infidels."

The Jewish World, in a leading article on the "Conference of Liberal Thinkers," says:—It may well be regarded as a significant phenomenon, the possibility of which could not have been anticipated in the wildest dreams of the most advanced humanitarian thinkers a quarter of a century ago. By what mysterious influence has this remarkable conference been rendered an accomplished fact? There is but one explanation. The conviction is rapidly gaining ground in enlightened and thoughtful minds—partly as the result of discovered historical incoherencies in the sacred books of many religions, and partly owing to the felt incompatibility of science with most schemes of supernaturalism—that there is a something underlying all religions, "one touch of which makes the whole world kin." It also expresses the opinion that only those who are willing to subordinate their speculative theories of the universe, whatever these may be, to the accomplishment of some practical object in which they can cordially and actively unite, should be encouraged to join the association. Surely the rational method is to begin with some work which is intelligible, easy, within convenient reach, and in which all shades of opinion could combine. Instead of imitating the philosophers of Laputa or directing telescopes to the moon, in the name of common sense let the microscope be turned upon the sufferings, wants, errors and superstitions endured by mankind, and let the mirror of natural law be unceasingly held up—as the serpent is reported to have been of old upon the pole—that perishing multitudes may realise its true import and attain a happier and nobler life. This plan need not interfere with either Jews or liberal-minded Gentiles enjoying within their own circles their specific theology. But we are emphatically of opinion that any union chiefly based on a mere inactive community of theological or anti-theological sentiments is necessarily a rope of sand.

All men love liberty, and seem bent on destroying her.—Voltaire.

Speech issuing in no deed is hateful and contemptible. In God's name let us find out what of noble and profitable we can do.—Carlyle.

Augustus de Morgan gave this felicitous definition of the highly-educated man—one who knows everything of something, and something of everything.

I delight to meet my fellow creatures either on the general ground of humanity, or on the special ground of affinity; but mock intimacy with quasi-friends is intolerable.—Ivy Leaves.

Why journeyest thou wearisomely, in thy antiquarian fervour, to gaze on the stone pyramids of Geeza, or the clay ones of Sacchara? These stand there, as I can tell thee, idle and inert, looking over the desert, foolishly enough, for the last three thousand years; but canst thou not open thy Hebrew Bible, then, or even Luther's version thereof?—Carlyle.

Let your rest be perfect in its season, like the rest of waters that are still. If you will have a model for your living, take neither the stars, for they fly without ceasing, nor the ocean that ebbs and flows, nor the river that cannot stay, but rather let your life be like that of the summer air, which has times of perfect peace. It fills the sails of the ships upon the sea, and the miller thanks it on the breezy uplands; it works generously for the health and wealth of all men, yet it claims its hours of rest.—Philip Gilbert Hamerton.

It is the growth of the individual man which is the purpose for which we came into this world. It is not national greatness and glory, however important these may be; it is not that the records of a great history, a great literature, a great art may be left upon the annals of the world. These things are great and glorious things, but they are not the purpose for which you were born. The purpose for which you were born is the full, healthy development of your nature as individuals; it is the expulsion of what is bad, the strengthening of what is weak; it is the development and opening out of what is good; it is that which the Scripture calls renewal in the image of God made manifest to us, made intelligible to us, made accessible to us by its being manifested in the person of our Saviour.—W. E. Gladstone.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

RECOGNITION SERVICE FOR OUR ADULT SUNDAY SCHOOL PUPILS.

I SHOULD like to say a few words through the medium of the Herald to those who are interested in training up children in the way they should go.

During the last year or two I have been trying to find out the best way of getting the children in our Sunday schools, as they grow up from year to year to manhood and womanhood, to enrol themselves as members of our churches and to become part and parcel of our church life. I believe we cannot attach too much importance to the necessity of attending to the rising generation from time to time.

I am not aware that such a service as I propose is in existence, or is adopted in any of our churches. Perhaps some would not care for following the Episcopal Church in this respect; and I have, therefore, to avoid this difficulty, suggested a different name from that in use in the church referred to, still holding that "Confirmation Service" is a better name than the one heading this letter. Not that I care what name we give to the service suitable to adults leaving our Sunday schools to go out into the battlefield of life, provided some such service were established.

That there is great need of such a religious service I am convinced; and that it would be the means of strengthening young souls for life's conflict, and of helping them to fight their "fight of faith" more bravely and more successfully, I am also convinced.

This service might be made to take the place of the ordinary Sunday service, in which case the prayers and hymns I would recommend to be suited to the occasion; or it might be made a special religious service, held either on a week day or on a Sunday afternoon, as our different ministers may wish. Should it be made a special service, I would suggest that it consist of two prayers at least—one introductory and one concluding—three or four suitable hymns, a suitable passage or two from the Bible, and a special address (say of about twenty minutes' duration in delivery), the address to consist of as many divisions as would enable the minister to say an appropriate word to each individual coming forward for confirmation—strengthening the inner life. In this address the temptations with which the young will have to come in contact could be enumerated, e.g., the temptation of being carried away by the rushing, and I am sorry to add swelling tide of popular fashion, and be thereby influenced to go to the popular and fashionable churches, casting overboard conscience and ceasing to be true to conviction, true and faithful to God. Some of the quicksands and hidden rocks of life's ocean might be pointed out, so that the young spirits, rendered cognisant of where these lie, might be able to steer their barques safely over or past them. It would be well to impress upon their minds the fact that the ocean of life will not be always smooth, but that billows will rise and beat against their crafts. Still the young voyagers must not be dismayed or discouraged, but hope on, faint not, and must be led to feel that there is a supremely powerful hand at the helm, with full knowledge of the chart and compass. A suitable word might also be said to the young females, and what they are likely to expect on life's great voyage, though for the most part what advice, exhortation, and warning are given to the adult males, would be apropos to those of the gentler sex.

If such a religious service as this were introduced, I feel confident that it would very materially assist our youths and maidens, and would be the means of keeping them in our various churches, instead of being led away by the allurements of fashion, of heaping up money, of gaining "good" society, i.e., the society of Episcopal Church people, all of which Unitarians have to contend against.

As this service might not occur oftener than once a year, or perhaps once in several years, may I insist that we lose not sight of the young, nor leave them devoid of the great, broad, and deep principles which will actuate and influence all their after lives for good. The vital principles of religion must be deeply implanted in their natures, and nurtured in their souls. I believe that such a service would cause young people, when they leave country congregations for large towns, not to turn to other churches, but to find out the church where they could worship the God of their fathers, and more important still, the God of their own convictions, without a scruple of conscience.

I throw out these suggestions in the hope that some of our older ministers—in fact, all our ministers—may take up the subject; and in the hope also that it will receive the attention of our entire church.

[Such a service as Mr. McGowan recommends was conducted at Park Lane, near Wigan, on Sunday, February 11th, 1877, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., and the Rev. George Fox. See report in Unitarian Herald of Feb. 16th, 1877.—Eds. U. H.]

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE SWALLOW.

Of all the birds that swim the air
I'd rather be the swallow,
And, summer days, when days were fair,
I'd follow, follow, follow
The hurrying clouds across the sky,
And with the singing winds I'd fly.
My eager wings would need no rest
If I were but a swallow;
I'd scale the highest mountain-crest,
And sound the deepest hollow.
No forest could my pathway hide:
No ocean plain should be too wide.
I'd find the sources of the Nile,
I'd see the Sandwich Islands,
And Chimborazo's granite pile,
And Scotland's rugged Highlands;
I'd skim the sands of Timbuctoo;
Constantinople's mosques I'd view.
I'd fly among the isles of Greece,
The pride of great Apollo,
And circle round the Bay of Nice,
If I were but a swallow,
And view the sunny fields of France,
The vineyards merry with the dance.
I'd see my shadow in the Rhine
Dart swiftly like an arrow,
And catch the breath of eglantine
Along the banks of Yarrow;
I'd roam the world, and never tire,
If I could have my heart's desire!

LENDING A PAIR OF LEGS.

SOMETIMES we ask people to "lend a hand," and sometimes we can hear them say, "Lend me your eyes." Here is a story about a boy who lent a pair of legs just to accommodate.

Some boys were playing at base-ball in a pretty, shady street. Among their number was a lame little fellow, seemingly about twelve years old, a pale, sickly-looking child, supported on two crutches, and who evidently found much difficulty in walking, even with such assistance.

The lame boy wished to join the game; for he did not seem to see how much his infirmity would be in his own way, and how much it would hinder the progress of such an active sport as base-ball.

His companions, good-naturedly enough, tried to persuade him to stand on one side and let another take his place; none of them hinted that he would be in the way; but they all objected for fear he would hurt himself.

"Why, Jimmy," said at last, "you can't run, you know."

"Oh, hush!" said another—the tallest boy in the party; "never mind, I'll run for him, and you count it for him;" and he took his place by Jimmy's side prepared to act. "If you were like him," he said, aside to the other boys, "you wouldn't want to be told of it all the time."

How many times loving hearts will find a way to lend their powers and members to the aged, the poor, the sick, and the weak.—Christian Register.

CURIOSITIES.

While a country parson was preaching, the chief of the parishioners, sitting near the pulpit, was fast asleep; whereupon he said: "Now, beloved friends, I am in a great strait; for if I speak too softly those at the further end of the church cannot hear me, and if I talk too loud I shall wake the chief man in the congregation."

An undergraduate of Oxford was asked, in a Scripture History examination, what was the greatest calamity that ever befel the human race. Of course, the question pointed to the Deluge. But the youth startled his examiner by replying, "The confusion of tongues, sir, because it has given rise to so many differences of opinion between undergraduates and their tutors."

WEST RIDING DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE eleventh annual meeting of this Association was held in the schoolrooms of the Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, on Saturday last, June 29th. The attendance was not so large as might have been expected, and those who did not come missed a pleasant time. Among the number present were the Revs. W. J. Knapton, of Bradford, president of the Association; C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S., of Bolton; M. S. Dunbar, M.A., Hunslet; W. Blazeby, B.A., Rotherham; G. Knight, Sheffield; F. E. Milson, Halifax; R. Wilkinson, Holbeck; D. Agate, B.A., Scarborough, secretary of the Association; Messrs. Darnton Lupton, treasurer; W. A. Morton, Councillor Mathers and Thomas Wilberforce, Leeds; Dixon and Hurst, Holbeck; W. Clay, Hunslet; Gittings and Gledhill, Bradford; and S. Wood, Wakefield; together with friends from Pudsey, Lydgate, and Keighley.

Tea was served at half-past four, and at its close the chair was taken by the PRESIDENT (the Rev. W. J. Knapton) who, in the course of his address, spoke of the advantage which he thought would come to our churches and Sunday schools by more definite dogmatic teaching. He then called upon the Secretary to read the report of the committee, of which the following is an abstract:—

The comparison of the returns furnished by thirteen schools this year with those of the same schools last year, showed a slight decrease in the number of teachers, entirely on the male side, a considerable increase in the number of officers, a slight average improvement in the attendance of both teachers and scholars, and a large increase in the number of both sexes over 16 years of age. As the total number of scholars was almost the same as last year—a little short of 1,650—the increase in the number of elder scholars, though most encouraging, was noted as indicating a difficulty not hitherto much experienced, in securing the attendance of younger children. The visitors (Messrs. Darnton Lupton, W. A. Morton, S. Wood, and E. S. Anthony) reported a good attendance of both teachers and scholars at the opening of school, though there were failures in some cases—and the general efficiency of the teachers and the suitability of the books in use. In many schools there are no scholars' libraries; in others the books are out of date, and the committee thought that in spite of the free libraries in our large towns, in one of which at least, viz., Leeds, special provision has lately been made for the wants of juvenile readers, there are still many places where a supply of pure literature for the young is by no means abundant. The visitors had observed somewhat more systematic teaching in many of the elder classes, though in the younger classes the want of more system was very perceptible. Improvement in the present very defective method of teaching the infants might, it was thought, be obtained by the giving of model lessons by some accomplished day school teacher. Lastly, the visitors reported the need, still apparent in many schools, of interesting and instructive week evening employments, and the establishment of suitable classes and societies.

The committee then referred to the provision by the Central Sunday School Association of copies of their latest publications, so that the set of specimen books is very complete. The question of the formation of a sick friendly and burial society, for which the last annual meeting had directed the committee to draw up a scheme, submit it to the schools and report to the present meeting, had been settled by the replies received from the schools, only one of which had expressed any readiness to join the projected society.

The examinations had been conducted again this year, the subjects being taken from Teachers' Notes. The Rev. H. S. Solly's course on the New Testament had been appointed for the advanced grade, and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Lessons in Religion" for the higher and lower grades. Mrs. Barnby had examined in the latter and the Rev. Charles Hargrove in the former. Seventy-seven candidates from six schools—a slight increase upon last year—have presented themselves, 16 in the advanced grade, 33 in the higher, and 28 in the lower. Reference was made to the continued smallness of the number of candidates as compared with the number of scholars upon the books, and it was suggested that the new committee should see what steps could be taken to make the examination more effective. Mr. Hargrove reported that two candidates only in his subject had obtained first class certificates, the merit of their papers being very great, while eight had been placed in the second class. Mr. Hargrove suggested three causes for this not very satisfactory result:—1, the largeness of the ground covered by the lessons; 2, the fact that the teachers had not always realised what they had to teach; 3, the unfitness of many of the pupils for the subject of study. Mrs. Barnby reported in the higher grade the passing of seven in the first class and thirteen in the second, and considered the general work in this grade satisfactory. The lower grade candidates were not on the whole successful, two only passing in the first class and eight in the second. But, on the whole, the examination in both grades showed, even on the part of those who had not reached the required standard, a considerable understanding of the meaning of the lessons. The names of the candidates who received first class certificates were as follows:—

Advanced Grade.	Age.
Henry Latham, Wakefield	16
Albert Latham, Wakefield	14
Higher Grade.
Emma Hoyle, Wakefield	16
John Ellis, Bradford	15
David Armistead, Hunslet	11
Emily Wilberforce, Mill Hill	13
Ada Sanderson, Mill Hill	15
Emily Rhodes, Mill Hill	16
Henry R. Storey, Mill Hill	17
Lower Grade.
Fanny Clarge, Mill Hill	13
Maggie Grassham, Mill Hill	10

Second class certificates in various grades had been obtained by candidates from the above mentioned schools and from Holbeck. [At the request of the committee Miss Frances Power Cobbe had kindly signed the certificates gained by the successful candidates, and had expressed herself "very much pleased" with the Teachers' Notes. During the year the committee had also been in communication with Miss Florence Nightingale, from whose letter the following passages were quoted:—"I have the deepest interest in the good that you are doing, and am touched by the noble religious spirit of the Teachers' Notes, which I have carefully read. I should like to say to every one of your scholars how much I wish them progress in their lessons. I bid you God speed with all my heart and soul, and you have my best wishes for your truest success."

The co-operation of the committee with the publishing of Teachers' Notes was then spoken of. The Association was required to subscribe for 400 copies as its share of the undertaking. 231 copies had been taken by the schools, and it was hoped that this number might before long be increased. Although it seemed at present that the "Notes" would lay upon the Association an annual charge of £8 or £9, the committee were of opinion that the benefits to be derived from them were worth the cost, particularly as systematic teaching could hardly be more effectively encouraged. Mention was made of the valuable services of the Rev. F. E. Millson upon the board of editors.

The report concluded with a reference to the possibility of an extension of the limits of the Association, and with an expression of congratulation to the Bradford teachers upon their projected opening of a branch school at Laisterdyke on Sunday next.

The treasurer's report, submitted by Mr. Darnton Lupton, showed an income of £39, and a balance of £4 in favour of the Association, against a balance last year of £3 due to the treasurer.

A resolution adopting the reports, and directing them to be printed, was moved by the Rev. R. WILKINSON, who spoke hopefully of the Association's work, and seconded by the Rev. W. BLAZEBY, who appropriately referred to the absence, through domestic affliction, of the Rev. Goodwyn Barnby and his family, and expressed his interest in the suggested widening of the Association.

The appointment of the officers for the ensuing year was then made, on the motion of Mr. T. WILBERFORCE and Mr. DIXON, of Leeds, the following being the nominations: President, Rev. R. Wilkinson; vice-presidents, Mrs. Barnby, Rev. C. Hargrove, Rev. John Fraser; treasurer, Mr. Darnton Lupton; honorary secretary, Rev. D. Agate.

A resolution of welcome to the Rev. C. C. Coe, as representing the Manchester District, and to Mr. J. B. Gardner, as the delegate of the North Midland Sunday School Association, was then passed, having been proposed by Mr. Councillor MATHERS, and seconded by the Rev. M. S. DUNBAR.

Mr. GARDNER responded, and spoke of the valuable work which such Associations might accomplish.

An invitation from Pudsey to hold the next meeting of the Association there having been accepted, a paper was then read by

THE REV. C. C. COE ON THE DUTIES OF ELDER SCHOLARS.

Mr. Coe commenced his paper by submitting a practical question: "What certain plan can we adopt, what careful culture can we exercise, so that we may cause our elder scholars to grow up into worthy members of society, to become devoted teachers in the schools where they have been attentive scholars, and faithful members of the church to which their school is attached?" My answer is, "Enforce upon them at every point, and in every connection, that sublimest of words—Duty." Do not suppose that in saying this I wish to exalt morality at the expense of religion; for I would protest against a religion which is all sentiment, as well as a morality which is all conscience, and which in either case takes no cognisance of a service due to God. There is a religious view of life by which all action is converted into a divine worship, since all that is done is done by us as God's children, in obedience to God's law, and with reference to God's approbation; and it is this idea of duty which will consecrate the humblest sphere of life, and make this earth a veritable heaven. First among the duties of the social life, there is the duty which we owe to the inmates of the same home. Dr. Norman Macleod tells a story of an old Scotch Covenanter, who used to declare that "Sabbath schools were the greatest curse the Almighty ever sent to this covenanted land; undermining family life and destroying the parental tie." The theoretical answer to that objection is, that parents are not always the most capable persons to impart any instruction—especially religious instruction—to their own children. The practical reply would be, to send the children back from the Sunday school with eyes newly opened to a mother's self-denial and to a father's kindness; with souls stirred to take up whatever cross of difficulty may be presented by the trials of their domestic life; with hearts prepared to think for others, as well as to be the constant objects of an anxious care. Then there is the duty which has to be performed in the daily vocation of life—"to do my duty in that state of life into which it shall please God to call me"—as the Church Catechism has it—the duty of industry and fidelity, of intelligent interest in our work, of doing our work as well as possible, of cultivating kindly feeling towards those who co-operate with us, whether as our masters, our fellow-workers, or our employés. This duty is incumbent upon the highest as well as upon the lowest. "Noblesse oblige" is a motto which the greatest have adopted. It is not the humblest but the proudest of mankind—the Castilian gentlemen, of whom the poet says, that they "Choose not their task, but choose to do it well."

Then there is the duty which the individual owes to himself, embracing the culture of his talents and the restraint of his passions. If in these days the individual hopes to become something more than a living adjunct of machinery, and something better than a member of a society mainly occupied in bodily wants and indulgences, he must put forth all his strenuous endeavours in behalf of self-culture, turning to advantage those comparatively greater opportunities of leisure which many now enjoy. If he desires to attain to a moral greatness, he must exercise those arts of self-restraint which tame the rampant passions into our pleasant companions or patient beasts of burden. Surely this idea of life, as a multiform expression of duty, affords a worthy programme for Sunday-school instruction; and it remains to say how much our elder scholars stand in need of this idea, and what our Sunday schools can do to meet this want. The period between childhood and early manhood is most critical. It is then that young people aspire to become their own masters and mistresses; it is then that they become impatient of restraint; it is then that they determine their whole after-life by the principles they adopt, and by the compromising acts which commit them to a given destiny. Our elder scholars have escaped from the constraint of the home; they are no longer dependant upon their parents for their sustenance; they can maintain themselves at home or elsewhere—and sometimes they prefer that it should be elsewhere. Obviously they are no longer submissive under the rough discipline of cuff and scolding word. Perhaps they are no longer amenable to the gentler influences of a tender parental affection. Whatever order has come into their lives, through their submission at home, is gone. Our elder scholars have escaped from the culture and discipline of the day school, having passed through the transitional experience of the half-timer. The perfect discipline of those days is gone; for them there is no more the rapid and marvellous intellectual progress over which every spectator at the examination of a good day school must have marvelled. I was told not long ago by the master of our day school that the moment a boy became a half-timer a difference was to be noticed in him; he is no longer the bright and capable scholar that he was before. Thus, these independent young people have only one restraining influence left, and that is, such order and discipline as are indispensable to the performance of their daily work; and this is often a dull routine, which requires little intelligence, and may be carried on with little culture of the higher faculties, and little restraint of lower tendencies. It is of infinite importance at such a crisis that right principles of action should be adopted, and the question comes—the crucial test of every young soul—"Having earned your daily bread, and eaten it, what are you going to live for besides?" Are you going to live for the indulgence of your lower passions; for the greatest possible aggrandisement of self, or are you going to put duty above all other considerations? Will you put duty first until "every desire becomes dutiful," and until aggrandisement itself is only the crowning of an honest conscience with a "Well done good and faithful servant?" And this is a season in which not only determining principles are adopted, but compromising actions are done. As an illustration, take that topic about which it is so difficult to speak seriously and fully to young people—I mean marriage. There are in all classes alike a marriage of selfish convenience, and a marriage of self-denying affection, and while one owes its origin to the "world, the flesh, and the devil," the other comes as an inspiration from on high, and is the very best of all God's gifts. And woe to those who will not wait for the advent of that heavenly blessing, or who will not keep its holy flame pure on the altar of their hearts! This world has never seen such a reformation yet as would be wrought if young men and women could be so impressed as to keep themselves pure—body and soul; if they could be induced to form the highest possible ideal of the marriage tie, and to strive to realise it in life-long devotion, in mutual affection, and in common services on behalf of others. This, then, is the position of our "elder scholars"—aspiring to independence, scorning all but the most necessary control; in their independence adopting, more or less unconsciously, principles which will determine their after course; liable to do actions heedlessly which will compromise them for evermore. What can you Sunday-school teachers do for them? Taking the last point first, I would say: The teacher, by general and particular advice, might do much to determine the general conduct of his or her elder scholars. Next comes the question whether you will encourage by your Sunday school organisation, the idea of duty, or of enjoyment, or of aggrandisement, as the determining motive. I can conceive a Sunday school in which competitive examination makes personal glory the chief end to be aimed at, or at any rate the chief motive to be appealed to. I can conceive a Sunday school which determines to be attractive at any cost, and reduces learning to a minimum and develops amusement to a maximum quantity. I am not going to say that competitive examinations are altogether bad; I am not going to say we should not amuse as well as instruct our young people; but I do say that if, in appealing to the ambition of the young, or to their love of enjoyment, you throw the sense of duty in the back ground, and accustom them to act from lower motives, you do a deed of incalculable injury to their immortal souls. In the third place, do you mean to flatter their growing self-importance; to encourage their independence? Or are you prepared to teach them that life is always a school, and that no independence, real or imaginary, can set us free from moral obligations? Are you prepared to enforce this principle by showing that our elder scholars, as such, have duties to perform? They should surely expect to work harder, more systematically, than hitherto, in their classes. I have little sympathy with that disregard for order, for routine, for definite knowledge in connection with religious culture, which would be simply intolerable in any other connection. I believe the willingness to work hard in order to learn is a necessary condition of all instruction worthy of the name; and that when this ordeal is once passed through, it creates a living interest in the subject for evermore, whereas idle trifling breeds life-long disgust. The elder scholars who work on this principle in their own classes will be prepared to admit that it is for them to set an example to the whole school in regard to its general discipline, obeying with military precision the superintendent's word of command, and showing the most reverent attention during prayer and hymn. This sense of responsibility prompts to those large and readily-granted services which are rendered by our young people in connection with Sunday School business and festivals, and should also prepare the way for that last and supreme duty of the elder scholar, which is the dedication of himself to the office of teacher. No elder scholar can plead unfitness for the office of teacher without bringing a charge of incapacity against his own instructor, or else condemning himself as a most inattentive hearer. What he had learned he could teach, if he would, and surely gratitude demands that he should convey to others the good influences which he has himself received, accepting the humblest post of duty rather than leaving his great debt unpaid. If you as teachers desire to be true to yourselves and your functions, I implore you to bind yourselves to your scholars by this grand idea of duty, and the result will be as eternal soul-uplifting friendship. If you doubt it hear what the greatest of English writers says of the friendship between Kalonymos and Daniel Charisi. "When Daniel Charisi was a stripling (says Kalonymos), and I was a lad little above his shoulder, we made a vow always to be friends. He said, 'Let us bind ourselves to duty, as if we were sons of the same mother.' That was his bent from the first to fortify his soul with bonds—it was a saying of his—'Let us bind love with duty; for duty is the love of law, and law is the nature of the Eternal.' So we bound ourselves, and though we were much apart in our later life, the bond has never been broken."

The quick flight of time did not permit any long discussion of this admirable paper, with the spirit of which all the subsequent speakers expressed their concurrence.

The Rev. F. E. MILLSON expressed a hope, here fulfilled, that the paper would be published, and that teachers would read it to their scholars.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Coe was, in appreciative terms, moved by Mr. W. A. NORTON, and seconded by the Rev. GEORGE KNIGHT.

Resolutions of thanks to the Wakefield friends for their kind reception of the association, and to the Rev. W. J. Knapton, for presiding, were also carried, and responded to, and the meeting separated about eight o'clock.

BOLTON: BANK-STREET.—On Sunday last the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., and in the afternoon there was a service of song, the reader being the Rev. E. Turland. The collections amounted to £101. 8s., being £16. 10s. less than 1877, and about the same as 1876.

CARRICKFERGUS (IRELAND).—On Sunday last the Rev. R. Cowley Smith concluded his ministry in the above town. In the course of his discourse, Mr. Smith referred to the especial kindness and consideration he had universally received from every member of the congregation, and expressed his deep regret that owing to the severance of his connection with the Belfast Missionary Association he was compelled very reluctantly to bid farewell to them also. An address was presented to Mr. Smith by the congregation, expressing their best wishes for him, to which Mr. Smith made a suitable reply.

THEOLOGICAL TEACHING AND THE NATIONAL UNIVERSITIES.

ON the afternoon of Thursday, June 27th, a deputation from Manchester New College, London, had an interview with the President of the Council, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, in Whitehall, to present the memorial which was given in last week's Herald, and the substance of which was "that in revising the application of revenues in Oxford and Cambridge, and also in establishing hereafter any new teaching university, provision may be made for systematic instruction, with examinations, degrees, and honours in theological philosophy, history, and literature, conducted by professors unpledged, in the university or out of it, by articles, creeds, or confessions of faith." The deputation included Mr. R. N. Philips, M.P., Rev. James Martineau, LL.D., D.D., Rev. James Drummond, B.A., Rev. C. B. Upton, M.A., Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., Rev. C. Beard, B.A., Rev. Thomas Sadler, Ph.D., Mr. D. Ainsworth, Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., Mr. J. Westlake, Q.C., LL.D., Mr. J. C. A. Scott, M.A., Rev. R. Crompton Jones, B.A., Rev. J. T. Whitehead, Rev. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. W. Shaen, M.A., Mr. James Heywood, M.A., Mr. R. D. Darbishire, B.A., &c.

Mr. R. N. PHILIPS, M.P., having introduced the deputation,

The Rev. Dr. MARTINEAU, Principal of Manchester New College, said that in asking what they did they did not wish to reflect in any degree on the system of tests which existed in different churches, nor did they desire that any divinity schools which already possessed the power of conferring degrees for theology should be deprived of it; but their position was that, for the purposes of national universities, confessions of faith were as much out of place in matters connected with philosophy and theology, as they would be in the teaching of science, history, or literature; and further, that it was not right that any competent persons, who might choose to devote their powers to the study of those subjects, should be prevented from obtaining those degrees and honours which were due to diligence and devotion, merely because they scrupled to subscribe some particular confession of religious faith. The deputation thought that the function of a university required that it should cover the whole ground of the subjects which occupied the attention of intellectual men, tended to develop the human faculties, and helped to form human character. It was quite impossible to ignore the vast range of subjects connected with the study of theology. However certain subjects might be tabooed, they would be inquired into, and incompetent men would deal with them when competent ones were prevented from doing so by such restrictions as he had referred to. Notwithstanding the attempts that had been made in every age of the Christian church to stereotype a particular system of theology, history declared that it could not be done, and almost every revolution in modern times arose from the bursting of the bonds of ecclesiastical restriction. As natural science was developed the ordinary methods of testing truth and separating what was permanent from what was perishable must be superseded; and it was impossible to suppose that the new lights which had been recently obtained with respect to languages, chronology, and ethnology, should not produce some effect on branches of philosophy and history which were especially interesting to the teacher of theology. He thought, therefore, that it was very desirable that the university arrangements with regard to the teaching of theological philosophy, history, and literature should be readjusted. It seemed to him that the teaching of such subjects should be carried on by men who were uncommitted and unpledged, and who would be able to take a wide and comprehensive view of all the sources from which light could be obtained. It was an indispensable condition of teaching and guidance that the teacher should be impartial, and what impartiality could there be in one who was committed to a particular system, and would be liable to suspension if he taught what was opposed to it? In theology everything was still practically surrendered to the Church, and they desired to have that state of things altered, so that the universities might become truly national and representative institutions. The rev. gentleman concluded by reading the following letter, which he said he had just received from Prof. Seeley:—

Dear Sir,—As a churchman and a member of one of the older universities, I sympathise cordially with the prayer of the memorial which you are about to present as a member of a Nonconformist college, and I regret that a great pressure of work prevents me not only from accompanying your deputation, but even from writing my opinion as carefully as I could wish. Your prayer is directed not against all religious tests, but against a very special sort of religious test, that which binds the theological professor within his own subject. I must say that such tests seem to me to convert the professor from a judge into an advocate, and to deprive his words of their legitimate authority. When all the professors of a given science are thus fettered, the necessary result is to bring the science itself into suspicion, and no other explanation is needed of the fact that it has become common to speak of theology as an illegitimate or obsolete science, than that its professors have been denied the freedom which is a matter of course in every other faculty. I would therefore gladly see theological professors set free in those universities in which it may still be possible for some time to maintain theological faculties in connection with some ecclesiastical body. Still more evident does it seem to me that they ought to be set free in those universities in which the only choice lies between setting them free or suppressing the faculty altogether. I submit that the strongest Conservative in religious matters ought to be the first to recognise this. If unpledged professors might occasionally teach heterodox doctrine they would at least maintain the study itself in estimation, while those whose teaching was orthodox would be far more influential than now. On the other hand, to suppress the faculty would be to silence the voice of orthodoxy, to cause the whole study to drop out of the minds of the students, and at the same time to leave an open field to attacks upon religion, which are easily made under cover of lectures on science. I agree heartily in all that your memorial says about the transcendent value and importance of the study of theology when it is freely pursued.—In great haste, yours very truly,

J. R. SEELEY.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE then said—It is, my lord president, as an attached member of one of the older universities that I have been asked to address you on behalf of the prayer of the memorial. It is far from our intention to cast doubt upon the honesty or the learning of the eminent men who at present hold the chairs of theology at Oxford and Cambridge, but we submit that it would be greatly to the interests of true religion if those to whom especially is entrusted the duty of investigating and expounding its foundations and principles were set free from the obligations at present imposed upon them, of arriving at certain predetermined conclusions. It is a common complaint, both of the Church of England and of other churches, that the work ever increasing outstrips the workers, and that neither is the number of candidates for the ministry as great as is required, nor is a right proportion of them drawn from the ranks of the more thoughtful and intelligent. It is often said that the salaries offered are too small to attract better men, and that exceptional rewards of eminence are too few, but an Englishman will find it difficult to believe that his countrymen are deterred from a service which they believe to be the highest on such grounds alone. Must we not rather conclude that the true reason is to be found in a more or less conscious doubt of the truth of religion in any form which makes the so-called service of God appear neither safe nor honourable? And would not this doubt best be met by men not only learned in the science of religion, but also free, to whom students might bring their doubts and difficulties, not to have them refuted or evaded, but simply to receive knowledge and advice by which they might be enabled themselves to deal with them? We desire, your grace, to raise the professor of theology from the position of advocate which he now holds, having a cause committed to him which he is bound to defend, to that of judge. The advocate may be learned, eloquent, and entirely believe in the justice of his plea, but he cannot be impartial. It is for the judge to hear both sides alike, and to sum up from the evidence for the guidance of the jury. So would we have the teacher of theology study the long story of religion and hear the arguments urged on all sides, and then use all his learning and ability to sum up as before a jury of students, leaving to them to form, not indeed a unanimous, but each for himself his opinion. And if it be said that they would form different and some certainly erroneous opinions, may it not be answered that the opinion which a man comes to after due thought and study, is, even when less true, worth to him more than, it may be, the truer opinion, which he has received of another, and learnt only another's argument in defence of? It is, my lord, because we believe in the truth of religion that we desire thus to make the teaching of it at our universities free. We cannot fear for the truth, we cannot think it needs the buttresses of tests and subscriptions for its support.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD, Liverpool, observed that all that was wished was that a student might obtain degrees in theology if he possessed the requisite knowledge, regardless of any confession of faith. He argued that the purpose of examinations was to test a student's knowledge and not his theories or opinions on controverted subjects.

The Duke of RICHMOND said he did not think it would be convenient for him to enter into any arguments on the question raised; but he entirely disagreed with the deputation as regarded the view which it took of the theological aspect of what had been put before him. He entirely denied what Mr. Hargrove had said about the work of the Church outstripping the workers, or that any looked upon its service as not safe and honourable, nor did he understand what the rev. gentleman meant by the professor of theology summing up as a judge before a jury of students. The gentleman who spoke first said the object of the deputation was that all students should have the wisest, best, and most considerate teaching. He supposed they were all agreed on that point; but, on looking at the prayer of the memorial, he found, if he did not put a wrong construction upon it, that those who were to give such teaching need not have any religious belief at all. According to that prayer the teaching of theology was to be "conducted by professors unpledged, in the University or out of it, by articles, creeds, or confessions of faith;" that was to say, they were to be unpledged to any faith whatsoever. He certainly could not subscribe to that doctrine. But, of course, that would open a very large question, the consideration of which would, probably, occupy more time than the deputation could then devote to it, and would certainly occupy more than he could give at that moment. The prayer of the memorial might be divided into two points—first, that in revising the application of revenues in Oxford and Cambridge, provision should be made for systematic instruction in theology by professors unpledged by articles, creeds, or confessions of faith; and secondly, that in establishing hereafter any new teaching university provision should be made for systematic instruction in accordance with the same view. As regarded the first point, the revision was under the review of a Royal Commission, and therefore it was to that commission that the memorialists should apply in the matter, he having no concern with it. As respected the second point, he had no knowledge of either a wish or an intention on the part of the Government at the present moment to set up any new teaching university. He was much obliged to the deputation for attending there, and giving him the benefit of the expression of their views.

Mr. DARBISHIRE explained that in presenting the memorial the deputation had no wish to impede in any way the granting of a charter for the establishment of a university in the North of England.

The deputation then withdrew.

LEEDS: RECOGNITION MEETING.—The members of the Hunslet Unitarian Church assembled on Monday evening, June 24th, to welcome the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., on his accepting the office of pastor among them. Tea was provided in the schoolroom, at which a large company sat down, and a public meeting afterwards took place, presided over by Mr. T. Baines. Mr. W. Clay and Mr. Darnton Lupton welcomed the new minister on behalf of the congregation, and the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., on behalf of the ministers of the district; after which addresses were delivered by the Revs. Eli Fay (Sheffield), R. Wilkinson (Holbeck), J. Fraser (Doncaster), G. Wooller, J. Bevan, and Goodwyn Barnby (Wakefield). Congratulatory speeches were given by Mr. Joseph Lupton, Mr. Charles E. Wurtzburg, Mr. Thomas Wilberforce, and others; and a very happy and animated meeting was closed with a reply from Mr. Dunbar, who spoke of his former connection with the Scotch Church, and the hopefulness of Christian work in large centres of population like Leeds.

BETTWS AND BRIDGEND.—On Sunday, June 30th, the Rev. E. W. Lloyd, Cwmbach, Aberdare, conducted worship at Bettws Old Chapel, at eleven o'clock in the morning. The congregation consisted of fourteen persons of all ages, which was as numerous as could be expected, considering that no service had been held in the old place during the previous twelve months, when the same minister officiated, six persons being present, who must have enjoyed the service as most of them joined heartily in singing hymns of praise, when only one stanza was sung on the present occasion. Great attention, however, was paid to the discourse delivered, on "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," &c., which was extempore. We have several very humble places of worship in Wales, but this is the humblest of the lot—literally nothing but four bare walls, a small table, and a few planks to sit on. At three o'clock p.m. the same minister preached on the same subject at the Old Chapel, Bridgend, when no fewer than 120 were present, including friends from Nottage and Wick, and upwards of sixty persons from the town and neighbourhood. The congregation was addressed both in English and Welsh, and the majority were pleased with the preacher's remarks on what Unitarian Christians believe concerning "faith in Jesus Christ." At the conclusion of the service it was announced that the Rev. Titus Lloyd, Nottage, would officiate at the same place, at eleven o'clock a.m., that day four weeks. We felt inclined to ask—What! no service in the place for a whole month? If an energetic young man could be placed here he might succeed in forming a good congregation; but the question naturally enough arises—How is he to get bread? We understand both places are endowed. At six o'clock p.m. the Rev. E. W. Lloyd preached to a large congregation at the Old Chapel, Nottage, and it was quite evident he needed rest after conducting two whole services, preaching at the latter place, and riding on horseback not fewer than twenty miles. We were glad to see the venerable minister of Nottage and Wick enjoying better health than he has for some time past.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM

A MAN there came, whence none can tell Bearing a touchstone in his hand;
And tested all things in the land
By an unerring spell.

Quick birth o' transmutation smote
The fair to foul, the foul to fair;
Purple nor ermine did he spare,
Nor scorn the dusty coat.

Of heirloom jewels, prized so much,
Were many changed to chips and clods,
And even statues of the gods
Crumbled beneath its touch.

Then angrily the people cried,
"The loss outweighs the profit far:
Our goods suffice us as they are;
We will not have them tried."

And since they could not so avail
To check this unrelenting guest,
They seized him, saying, "Let him test
How real is our jail."

But though they slew him with the sword,
And in a fire his touchstone burned,
Its doings could not be o'erturned,
Its undoings restored.

And when, to stop all future harm,
They strewed its ashes on the breeze,
They little guessed each grain of these Conveyed the perfect charm.

FRIDAY JULY 5, 1878.

*A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name.
Cannot we become the heralds of this better day?
Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.*

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

ANNIVERSARIES AND AFTER.

THERE is this disadvantage in the season at which our great gatherings are held, that we no sooner begin to feel the influence of their suggestions and inspirations than we are off for our holidays. Wise counsels, warnings, rebukes, and encouragements are all left behind, shut up with other belongings of the study; while we give our easy minds to the winds of seaside or mountain. On our return, when the spring-flowers are gone and the leaves are fading, it is hardly to be expected that such evanescent blossoms as good resolutions should be found remaining in any vigour.

This is unfortunate, and we know not how it can be helped, except by making up our minds to form no resolutions or plans at all until we begin to settle down again to the work of the year. Let the children go to their play, say the best advisers, without any thought about their tasks. The school term comes to an end with a great rush of examinations in which the business of the preceding months is brought to its consummation. Let something of the same purpose govern our annual meetings. Let us take them as the winding up of the work of the bygone season. Then shall our holiday come, not as an intrusion between our good resolves and our good endeavours, but as an interval of pure recreation, without repining for the past or anxiety for the future.

We confess to the creed of optimism. We believe it to be the Gospel, and the pessimist to be emphatically the Anti-Christ. Are we not here to make the best of things? White-washing and painting with colour of the rose, we may say, we do not regard as making the best of things; neither do we so regard mud-throwing, or tarring and feathering.

With this year's annual meetings there is very good reason to feel content, as presenting little of either of those extreme mistakes.
There has been much said that deserves to be remembered, but as we have resolved to burden our minds with none of it for the present, we advise our readers to do as we do—lay by the recent numbers of the Herald, with their store of good grain, and bring them out again when the seed is wanted for the next season's sowing. There is one point to which attention has not been called, and which even at the last moment we must make a note of,
that it be by no means forgotten, viz., the offer held out to our Sunday-school teachers by Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD, treasurer of the Sunday School Association. It was a happy thought, exactly of the kind to send everyone away rejoicing in hope. Mr. NETTLEFOLD offers to share half the nett expense in the purchase of the more costly books with all Sunday schools that shall order 50 copies. Thus, if such books be ordered say to the value of £10, there will first be a deduction of £2. 10s., the usual discount; then Mr. NETTLEFOLD will contribute one-half of the remainder; so that the school will have to pay only £3. 15s. So generous an offer is worthy of all acceptance, and we place it thus prominently before our readers, especially the managers of our Sunday schools, that it may not be overlooked, as many good chances have often been. And with the performance of this pleasant duty we wish that sunshine and happy hearts may brighten school and chapel, as well as seashore and lake-shore, for all the weeks of summer and autumnal months.

DISESTABLISHMENT IN SCOTLAND.

AFTER the recent debate in the House of Commons it will be apparent to all Liberals, if not to most Conservatives, that the disestablishment of the Scottish Church is rapidly becoming one of the practical questions of the day. Mr.
W. HOLMES, the member for Paisley, moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Patronage Act of 1874, and how far the people of Scotland are in favour of maintaining the connection between Church and State. Although the motion did not find much favour, the discussion upon it was of prophetic significance.
Sir A. GORDON moved as an amendment that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the causes which keep asunder the Presbyterians of Scotland, with a view to the removal of the impediments to their re-union in a National Church, which he insisted, were very trivial. Both resolution and amendment were opposed by the Government on the ground that inquiry was needless, and that they would make up their minds if action were needed without the intervention of committees or commissioners. Several important speeches followed. Mr. W. E. BAXTER declared that the Patronage Act had proved a complete failure; its only effect having been to throw the great body of the Free Church into the arms of the Liberation Society, and to promote disestablishment. As there were now 2,200 Dissenting Churches in Scotland, and as there was no difference in either doctrine or church government between the three churches, he could not defend the principle of a national endowment being given to one and denied to the other two. Further, every recent election in Scotland had shown that the time for inquiry had passed, and that the time for action was very near at hand. The Established Church must be given up, and he suggested that its revenues should be applied to the relief of the school rate. Mr. GLADSTONE agreed that inquiry was unnecessary. The question, he argued, was one that ought to be decided by the people of Scotland, who had ample means of making their opinions known to Parliament without the machinery of a committee. It was the promoters of the Patronage Act of 1874 who had really opened the question of disestablishment; and, provoked by that measure, a large proportion of the people of Scotland had pronounced in favour of it. For himself he could not see that a church should be national which did not command the adhesion of a majority of the people, and that was the case in Scotland. It was by the opinion of the people of Scotland alone that the Church Establishment would stand or fall; but while he confined himself to this view of the subject, he complained that the friends of the Church of Scotland had offered no arguments for justifying her continued existence. Mr. CROSS, taking advantage of the right hon. gentleman's serious admissions, charged him and Lord HARTING-TON with having invited the people of Scotland to get up a cry of disestablishment of which they could take advantage, and he protested warmly against such a line being taken by men in the responsible position of leaders of a party.

Lord HARTINGTON, in replying to the Home Secretary, said he was prepared to discuss any remedy that might be suggested, and was not committed to the opinion that disestablishment was the only way out of the difficulty in which the people of Scotland found themselves. But he believed the feeling there in favour of disestablishment was real; and, if the majority of the people decided in that way, he for one should support them in the course they proposed, and not be guided by considerations which might remotely affect another part of the United Kingdom. Eventually the debate was adjourned—adjourned without doubt, not to any subsequent sitting of the present House of Commons, but to the next general election, when Scotland will be able to declare emphatically its determination that the Kirk shall be disestablished and disendowed.

The late Mr. Edward George Handkirk.

It is with deep regret we record the death of Mr. E. G. Hankirk, which took place on the morning of Thursday, the 27th ult., at his residence, 1, Gibson Terrace, Harpurhey, after a severe illness of a few days from congestion of the lungs. When a boy he was a scholar in the Domestic Mission Sunday School, Rochdale Road, afterwards a teacher there, and at Pick-stone-street School. On the amalgamation of the latter body with Miles Platting congregation, Mr. Hankirk took his position, with others, in the church, school, and connected institutions—for some time acting as secretary of school, mutual improvement society, and book club. He filled the office of honorary treasurer to the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union, the duties of which he discharged with marked business ability and strictest integrity. Deep sympathy and respect were shown by fully 100 teachers, elder scholars, members of Miles Platting congregation, relatives and friends of the deceased, walking in procession at the funeral on Saturday last. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, who gave an impressive address at the grave, after which the friends sang "Thy will be done."
On Sunday afternoon last, at the scholars' monthly service, Mr. D. Thompson conducting, touching reference was made to the sudden bereavement. Mr. Hankirk leaves a widow and two young children.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. COUNCIL MEETING.

THE first meeting of the Council or governing body of this Association for the year 1878-79, was held on Thursday, June 27th, at the rooms in Norfolk-street; the PRESIDENT (H. Bicknell, Esq.) in the chair. There were also present Mrs. Akroyd, the Revs. C. Wicksteed, B.A., R. Spears, R. Shaen, R. A. Armstrong, T. L. Marshall, W. A. Pope, H. McKean, D. Maginnis, J. Worthington, J. D. H. Smyth, Alderman Harwood, Salford; and Messrs. J. T. Preston, F. Collier, C. J. G. Eiloart, S. S. Tayler, J. Troup, F. Nettlefold, T. C. Clarke, and I. M. Wade.

The SECRETARY read the minutes of the last council meeting, and also the report of the committee, which was as follows:—

The committee held a meeting, as directed by the rules, in the week following the anniversary, and having appointed the usual sub-committees have referred to them various matters of business which remained unsettled from the committee of last year. A grant of books was made to the Rev. Henry Williamson, partly for his own studies and partly for the church library at Dundee, and also a grant in aid of supplies to relieve Rev. W. Thomas, of Llandyssul.

Three thousand copies of the annual report have been ordered to be printed for distribution among subscribers and others.

As it appeared desirable to take advantage of the presence of members of the Council in London, in connection with the examination at Manchester New College, to summon the present meeting, and the opportunity is thus afforded for the committee to receive the expression of the views of the council on several important subjects which have already been brought before their attention—they have ordered them to be placed on the table of agenda, to which they would therefore refer, simply adding a few observations.

Respecting the model trust deed the committee remind the Council, that the sub-committee that had charge of the subject having lapsed, it will be necessary to consider in what way the work of that sub-committee will be best resumed.

The question having arisen at the annual meeting as to the nominations of home correspondents and other members of the Council, the committee suggest to the Council that steps should be taken to determine the principles and methods on which such nomination should be made.

The subject of publications is one of some importance at the present time, while the pecuniary resources of the Association are so limited. Several suggestions have been made, which will be brought before the Council, especially in connection with the proceedings of the late annual meeting.

The committee would call the attention of the Council to the resolution of the recent annual meeting respecting the canvass for new and increased subscriptions:—"That this meeting observes with satisfaction that a considerable addition has been made during the past year to the regular income of the Association, and expresses the hope that the continued efforts of the committee to augment the resources of the Association will be cordially seconded in the towns and districts in which the canvass has been for a time deferred."

The matter is one in which the help and encouragement of the Council cannot fail to prove of immense service, particularly with regard to considerable districts in which no special effort has yet been made.

The Council will consider whether the next provincial meeting of the Association might not be associated with such an effort, as was the case at Manchester last year.

But whatever course it may be thought advisable to take to carry out the views expressed in the resolution of the annual meeting so as to increase the income of the Association, the committee ask special attention to the statement which the treasurer will make to the Council, from which it will appear that whatever is done by the Association for the remaining half year will depend entirely upon the sale of the remaining stock, unless very large additions are made by donations or subscriptions to the income of the year.

The report was accepted on the motion of the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, seconded by Alderman HARWOOD.

The Rev. C. WICKSTEED moved, and the Rev. R. SHAEN seconded, and it was carried: "That the committee be requested to communicate with the Rev. W. Binns, and to ask him to place his sermon at their disposal for publication."

Mr. TAYLER read a short financial statement which showed a balance of about £870 against the Association at the end of last year, but stated that there was stock to the amount of £4,000 at the disposal of the Council.

In reference to the question of a provincial meeting, it was resolved, on the motion of the Rev. D. MAGINNIS: "That this Council requests that the Executive Committee will take early steps to arrange for an autumnal provincial meeting of the Association."

The question of the proposed trust-deed having been taken into consideration, it was resolved, that it be referred to the Executive Committee to report thereon to the Council, and that a draft of the proposed trust deed be printed and circulated among the members of the Council prior to its final adoption.

On the motion of the Rev. R. SPEARS it was resolved: "That no resolution be brought forward at any meeting of the Council which does not appear on the agenda read by the Chairman at the beginning of the meeting."

On the motion of the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, seconded by the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, the committee were requested to consider the methods of nomination to the Council and to the committee, and to report to the next meeting of the Council.

The question of publications having been taken into consideration, some information was given respecting the new edition of Alger's "Critical History of the Doctrine of the Future Life," which it was hoped would be sold for eight shillings.

A proposition to print a new and cheap edition of "Priestley's History of Early Opinions Respecting Jesus Christ" was next the subject of a long and interesting discussion, and on the motion of the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, seconded by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, it was ultimately resolved that it is not desirable to reprint this work.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

prepared by the Rev. Dr. Vance Smith, was read by the Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, the Principal, as follows:—It is with much regret that I find myself unable to be present to take my part as one of your Visitors on this occasion. I fear also that I cannot look forward to future examinations with the hope that it will be in my power to attend them, and to discharge in person any little duty that might fall to me in that character. Such being the case, I can only lay down an office the claims of which I am so little likely to be able to meet.

Acquaintance with the Bible needful to the student.

Before doing so, however, I very gladly avail myself of the opportunity afforded to me by your committee of offering a few remarks, more especially to the students who are now present, and the subject to which, for a few minutes, I would ask their attention, is that of the importance to a student for the ministry of making himself familiar with the best and most recent literature relating to the Bible, its history, criticism, and interpretation; or, perhaps I should only say, with the conclusions of the principal modern writers on these subjects, including, of course, some knowledge of the grounds and evidences on which those conclusions rest. In urging this, I need scarcely explain that I do so from no mere assumption or one-sided feeling. As to the importance of the Bible as a book of religion for our times, I would speak simply from a regard to the position which it so obviously holds in the estimation of the various religious denominations of this country, and from a very lively sense of the practical evils which arise from wrong ideas of its character and the erroneous methods of treatment to which it is subjected. If we are to get rid of those evils, if we are to help the nation to get rid of them; if we are to assist in substituting just and rational views of religion for those which now prevail, it is of the highest importance that we should be possessed of ample and accurate knowledge about this Book of books, its origin, history, and contents, for it is only by virtue of such knowledge, faithfully and conscientiously used, that we can hope to induce those whom we would influence to listen to what we have to say to them on these subjects; it is only thus, by reasonable arguments based upon sound knowledge, that it will be possible for us to help forward the great cause of religious truth and sincerity in the nation of which we are members. I have thus put into a few words the leading purpose of what I wish to say on the present occasion, and with your permission I will endeavour, as briefly as may be, to unfold this theme a little more in detail.

The sectarian character of religion now.

The sectarian character of religion around us at this time I take to be a fact too obvious to require any elaborate description. The number of religious bodies, separately organised and provided with special standards of belief, is larger than I can attempt to enumerate. These standards are of various forms; but it is much to be feared that (with few exceptions) their common tendency is to create in those who accept them a narrow and bigotted feeling, more especially in reference to other persons who may lie under the suspicion of thinking too freely for themselves on the great questions of religion. For illustration, there is our national Establishment: its fundamental position is one not of wise and just comprehensiveness, but of intolerance and exclusion, a position to which it has only been too faithful from the old days of "Black Bartholomew" down to the latest instance of the denial by a High Churchman of the validity of Nonconformist baptism. The Church of England tells us distinctly, in so many words, that one who does not receive the faith of its creed shall "without doubt perish everlastingly." And this, I conceive, is the very incarnation of the sectarian spirit, although at the same time I gladly admit that this, the avowed spirit of the Church, as a Church, is often neutralised by the kindly and charitable feeling of individuals among its members and ministers. This assumed possession of the one true creed, in connection with the parliamentary position and privileges of the Church, naturally leads to the claim, expressed or implied, of superiority over all other religious bodies, in which again there is found fitting nutriment for spiritual pride and other uncomely sentiments inseparable from such pretensions. These I will not follow into their consequences, as seen in their influence upon our national life, although they are by no means incapable of description. I have probably suggested quite enough to justify the imputation of a strongly sectarian spirit to our national church Establishment, as it now exists; and to warrant me in saying that to its influence, directly or indirectly exercised, we owe some of the more objectionable features of our English life, especially in the way in which the Church has fostered and intensified party feeling and party divisions among us. When we turn from the Establishment to other sects we must, I fear, admit a very similar conclusion. Some of them, dealing with Christianity much as if it were their own private property, and assuming that they may define it as they deem right, tell us plainly that no one can be admitted to communion with them who does not hold their particular views as to the Christian teaching and doctrines. This I take to be the sectarian spirit again, manifested in a form in no way less offensive than that which is presented by the Establishment. Christ himself, indeed, left to the world a church open and free to all who will come in and worship God in spirit and in truth without any dogmatic limitation or restriction whatever. But to this generous liberty "wherewith Christianity hath made us free" these modern disciples virtually say, no; and they declare that they will have nothing to do with any who wish to stand on so simple a basis; who do not, in various points of disputed doctrine, think as they do! Is theirs, then, we may ask, a church of Christ, or is it some private establishment of their own, built up in the clauses of a trust deed and put before the world under false pretences? Of one thing at least I am sure, such a church is not destined to conquer the world. It may stand and even flourish for a time, because there are multitudes who are not yet able to rise up to any true conception of the "glorious liberty of the children of God;" but, as knowledge increases, and a higher and more Christ-like idea prevails of the principle of religious communion, increasing numbers will find that that could be no true church of Christ which has practically made the acceptance of a creed of its own devising the condition of membership, and that, by the nature of the case, such a church cannot endure. No man has the right to define a Christian belief for another, or to make the acceptance of his own form of belief the condition of another's admission into the Church; and they who do this are only exercising a usurped authority. They are using the name of Christ, and the pretence of Christianity for that which neither Christ nor Christianity really sanctions. They are doing this quite as truly and practically as either the Church of England with its Athanasian Creed, or the Church of Rome with its infallible Pope. I will not attempt to pursue these details in the case of other religious bodies that might be named. The narrow and dogmatic basis of many of them is too well known to all who are familiar with the present state of religious parties, whether in England or in Scotland. If, however, I were to go back to the past, even for a little way, I might easily find numerous examples of the serious evils arising from the same sectarian spirit. I might speak of the oppression of Roman Catholics by Protestants, and of Protestants by Roman Catholics; of the oppression of Jews by Christians, through long ages of the past, and even in some countries at the present time. I might speak of Test and Corporation Acts; of the opposition, hardly yet abandoned, of great religious bodies to national education; of the hostility so long shown to the opening of the universities; of the resistance at this moment to the reasonable claim of the Nonconformists to their share in the use of the national burial-grounds. I will not, however, dwell upon such particulars; but I proceed to ask—from what does this evil spirit itself arise? By what is it generated and nourished?

The Bible mis-read and mis-interpreted.

The answer to this question can only be that its source is in the Bible; its source is the Bible—not, however (be it observed), the Bible read and interpreted in the light of history, criticism, and reason, but most seriously mis-read and mis-interpreted. To each of the great sects, the Bible (as they tell us) is the "Word of God"—strangely unconscious, as they seem to be, of the profanity of attributing to the All-holy such a book, a book of which so large a portion evidently comes down to us from times of ignorance and semi-barbarism, and expresses the rude, imperfect thoughts and feelings of ignorant, passionate, evil-doing men. Such, however, being the character which, with little discrimination, is claimed for the Bible by the great religious sects, the book becomes to them at once a law-book, and a book of religious truth; a source from which authoritative rules of conduct may be drawn, as well as creeds to be believed, under the penalty of everlasting perdition. But, in truth, the Bible itself never claims to be either a code of laws for this nineteenth century, or an infallible source of religious doctrine. It speaks to us, quite simply and naturally, as the collective but fragmentary literature of an ancient people; containing, like all other literature, many different elements of good and ill, of knowledge and ignorance, of right and wrong feeling and conduct; shewing us, not by way of authoritative command, but of history and example only, what the ancient people among whom the book originated thought and said, in relation not only to religion but to many other subjects besides. The whole orthodox theory of the Bible, as a law or a creed, for our time and for all future time, is manifestly untrue, as it is wholly unwarranted by the book itself. Moreover, even those who speak and write as if they considered such a theory correct cannot really carry it out with any fair consistency, or when they attempt to do so they speedily find themselves in opposition to obvious necessities and conveniences of modern life, as in the case of Sabbatical observance. The perverted use of the Bible, to which I have just alluded, I must not attempt to describe in any detail. I will, therefore, only again repeat the assertion that the entire conception of the book as one of authoritative law, or authoritative theology, is a baseless conception. It falls to the ground, like a house of cards, at the first touch of serious examination. Indeed, to set up such a claim for the Bible is to do it a positive wrong, bringing it into endless conflict with reason, science, and history, and only preparing the way for its ultimate rejection as the enemy, and not the friend, of the spiritual welfare of mankind.

Our students free to restore the Bible to its rightful place.

If, then, this conception of the Bible be so baseless, the assumptions which are built upon it must be abandoned—that, for example, of one man or one church being in possession of a right faith, while another is without it; of one being possessed of a certain merit on account of his church connections, which another has not; of one being in the sacred line of apostolic succession and another excluded from it, and therefore unworthy to fill the ministerial office. These and many such mischievous assumptions fall to the ground, along with the erroneous conception on which they are built. And thus we come back to the position that it will be a good work to show, as largely and effectually and widely as we can, the true character of such ideas and assumptions. This we shall best do by destroying, as it were, the very source in which the sectarian spirit has its origin and finds its nutriment. And thus, again, in other words, we shall rescue the Bible from the false position into which it has fallen, and restore it to its rightful place among the ancient literature of the world. This, then, I would now earnestly plead, is a work which especially falls to the ministers of a communion like our own. It is one for which our students for the ministry may fitly be urged carefully to prepare themselves. This they will do by acquiring, with all care and diligence, the requisite acquaintance with the best accessible authorities of modern times on the subject of the Bible. The duty is one, we must bear in mind, which can be effectually done only by those who have obtained a full and accurate knowledge of these subjects—that is to say, a full and accurate knowledge of what has been written by the great European scholars of our time, who have treated of the various departments of Biblical history and criticism. I will not enter more minutely into particulars, for which indeed this is not the time or the place; but that this work should be kept steadily in view, and accomplished as effectually as possible, this I venture again to urge, not merely for its own sake, not merely for the sake of enforcing conclusions which we may individually think more in accordance with the truths of history and science than those which are commonly recognised, and not merely for the sake of any theological doctrine which we may hold to be true, but simply for the sake of the peace, the charity, the mutual toleration and kindliness which ought everywhere to be the distinction of Christian men. And further, let me observe, our own religious communion would seem to be emphatically called upon to keep in view this great work of delivering the Bible from the misuse which it now so largely experiences. For one thing, we are free to do it. We are not pledged to any antiquated orthodoxy whatever, whether of Nicene or mediæval creeds, or of Lutheran or Calvinistic Confessions, or of the statesmen and bishops of an Elizabeth or a Charles the Second, or even of a Wesley or a Congregational Union. We are free to speak, to examine, to discuss—to tell the world, if we will, what modern criticism has to say about the age of the Pentateuch or the authenticity of a Gospel, or the meaning of prophecies and psalms and ancient narratives of the creation, or the interpretation of apocalyptic books like Daniel and Revelation. We are free to explain the nature of Christian "faith" as presented in the New Testament, and to show that it does not mean the acceptance of the creeds and dogmas of churches, whether about the death of Christ, or anything else, but simply the belief that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, according to the idea of his own immediate followers. On these and numberless such topics we have the great and precious privilege of being able to pursue the truth, with free minds and in a free spirit, without regard to foregone conclusions of other men or other times. Our highest allegiance, in short, is simply to the God of truth. Thus we have the largest facilities in our hands for the prosecution of the work of which I have spoken; but then we must qualify ourselves for it by the requisite knowledge—by knowledge diligently gathered, and to be applied, I need not add, in a reverent spirit; to be used, not for any personal or party triumph, but for the truth's sake alone, to promote the growth of true religion in the land, and to free the churches of every name from the narrow dogmatism which so often sullies their fair fame and lessens their working power.

Ignorance and prejudice die hard.

And thinking of this great end and striving faithfully for its attainment, we need not be greatly deterred by the opposition which we are sure to encounter. To this, indeed, we are pretty well accustomed. Ignorance and prejudice (especially in theology) die very hard; but yet they do die in time, and we must not despair. We must have confidence in the right feeling and the intelligence of the great mass of our fellow-countrymen, and we must not grow weary of appealing again and again to their sense of justice and their love of truth. And surely I may add, sense and truth will win the battle in the end, even in theology. At any rate, we who are so free to seek the truth and make it known when we have found it, should be the last to lose heart, even before the hostility, the misunderstanding, the alienation from friends, the evil names, which are quite sure to meet us as we pass onward upon our course. For, even amidst these things, there will be some faithful souls ready to bid us welcome, if we only speak to them honestly and freely what we believe in our hearts to be right and true: and so whatever may betide, let us strive to do the part to which duty seems to call us in this service, nothing doubting but that the conscious peace and blessing of the Great Father of all will rest upon us, and give us the assurance that we are His faithful and obedient servants.

The Spirit of Christ the Spirit of Truth.

One word remains to be said before I conclude. There is, I believe, nothing in the preceding remarks which is in any way inconsistent with our position as disciples of the Christian Master. The spirit of Christ was the spirit of truth; and they who would follow the truth are most truly followers of Christ. By renouncing ancient theological errors we do not throw off our allegiance to the great teacher; yea, rather, we confess it and proclaim it anew; and we are very sure that, if Christ himself were here to speak to us, he would approve our deed, he would accept our service, and would welcome us into the number of those who have been deemed worthy to work and bear hardship in his cause. We do not therefore, I again say, forfeit our Christian allegiance, or our Christian name, by renouncing the ancient errors which have gathered around the confession of Christ; nor has any human being the right to condemn us for so doing. We call no man "Master," and our responsibility shall be, not to any human tribunal, but to our own consciences, and to Him who is the giver and the Lord of conscience. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS said he was well satisfied with the examinations to which he had listened. It appeared to him that he might say ditto to the report he presented last year. He then paid a fitting tribute to the memory of the late Rev. T. E. Poynting, who during the past year had passed away, and closed with a word of approbation of the sermons which the retiring students, Mr. E. Crooks and Mr. J. Moore, had preached to them.

The MAYOR then presented the prizes given by Mr. Saml. Sharpe, of London, namely, to Mr. Bowie and Mr. Harrison each £4 and a copy of Mr. Sharpe's book on Egypt, adding that the examiners considered them equal in excellence. To Mr. Saml. Thompson he presented the sum of £2 from the same gentleman, and also a copy of Mr. Sharpe's work on Egypt, for efficiency in theological studies.

The certificates were then presented to Mr. English Crooks and Mr. John Moore, the retiring students.

PRESENTATION PORTRAIT TO THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD OF THE LATE MR. POYNTING.

Mr. JOHN MOORE, the senior student, then said: Mr. Chairman, and friends, I have now a somewhat painful, yet at the same time pleasureable duty to perform, and that is to present to the committee of the Home Missionary Board a portrait of the late lamented tutor, the Rev. Thomas E. Poynting. The duty is painful in that it arouses in our minds afresh the sense of his absence. He was wont to be always among us on occasions of this kind. His fatherly spirit and genial friendship will never be forgotten by those who knew him, especially the students who came under his care; and so the duty I have to perform is pleasureable in that it brings back to our minds beautiful memories of him who taught us in a true spirit in these rooms, and moreover made his house an ever-welcome house to us. We who knew him well, whilst feeling that his spirit is still present with us, wished to preserve some memorial within these walls of one who lovingly did what he could for us, and whom now we can but truly reverence. I might say many things to his memory, but on this occasion I feel that whilst speech is silver, silence is golden. As senior student, on behalf of those students who came under his tuition I have pleasure in asking Mr. Rawson, as chairman of the Home Missionary Board, to accept this portrait of the late Rev. T. E. Poynting.

Mr. HARRY RAWSON, in reply, said: Mr. Moore, and students of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, when the committee received your kind proposal to present this portrait of your late reverend tutor they were indeed highly gratified, and unanimously agreed to place it in some suitable position in these rooms. At the same time they instructed me to accept it, on their behalf, at your hands, and to thank you for so marked an evidence of your appreciation of the services and character of their esteemed friend—their colleague in the work of this institution. And I should fail adequately to represent them, or myself, if I did not discharge this welcome duty in the most emphatic terms I can command. It is indeed highly creditable to the good feeling of yourself and fellow-students to project this graceful memorial; and the shape it has assumed bespeaks your judgment and taste. In doing honour to your late tutor, you reflect honour on yourselves. I suppose there are few relations of life more interesting and attractive than those which subsist between teachers and taught. When the latter are docile, assiduous, and receptive, mutual sympathies, tender and enduring, are evoked, which are enhanced only when the teacher is not alone wise, but loving as well. Such, in an eminent degree, was the characteristic excellence of your late theological tutor. His eulogium has been pronounced by his attached congregation, by the committee of this Board, and by many other bodies. You have added a testimony to his worth which to his gentle and affectionate spirit would have been peculiarly acceptable. Ere long you are yourselves to emerge from the position of learners to that of teachers, in your turn; and amongst the most cherished of the reminiscences of this place will be the grateful duty you have now discharged. It will be hereafter an encouragement and a satisfaction to you, as it is to your present tutors, to the committee, and to all the friends of the Board. On their behalf I thank you for, and willingly accept, this valuable memorial of departed worth. (Applause.)

A vote of thanks, on the motion of Mr. THOMAS DIGGLES, seconded by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, was then, amid acclamation, presented to the Mayor, after which the proceedings were closed by prayer by the Rev. William Mitchell, of Glasgow.

A VALEDICTORY ADDRESS was delivered to the two retiring students, Mr. John Moore and Mr. English Crooks, at seven o'clock on Wednesday evening, in Cross-street Chapel, by the Rev. Silas Farrington, when there was a good congregation. The address will be reported in next week's Herald.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

ON Wednesday afternoon, June 26th, the annual examination of the students was brought to a close by AN ADDRESS FROM THE REV. CHARLES BEARD.

He said that in thus appearing before them to say a few words of advice and encouragement, he did so, because the visitors had been unavoidably prevented from standing in their own place on that occasion. For twenty-one years he had served the College in a subordinate and undemonstrative capacity, which had the peculiar advantage that it did not separate him from the successive generations of students, so that, despite the repeated admonitions of advancing years, he had flattered himself that he too belonged to the younger generation, and that for him some possibility of growth and amendment yet remained. How rudely that had been dissipated, however, he need not say, and he should hardly have assumed his present function unless to relieve men whom he so much respected from unnecessary labour. At the same time, the peculiarity of his position to which he had alluded enabled him to speak to the students less like a master than with the persuasiveness of a friend. It did not seem so long since he himself sat on the bench at Manchester. One of his teachers was also theirs, while others rested from their labours—their remembrance impressing upon him as it, he trusted, did upon his hearers, that, unequal as they might be to their highest hopes and resolutions, they yet stood in the line of a true apostolic succession, that they had a work to do which the world needed, and which God would place in other hands should they prove faithless. He was not going to say anything regarding the intellectual character of the year's work. That he should leave to their teachers, who were better able to do justice to it. He might, however, be permitted to point out to them that there was a seed time of their intellectual life which, if passed over unused, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to recover. It was so easy to yield to the temptation of the passing hour, to prefer the flowery paths of literature to the steep and toilsome paths of scientific study. They ought now to be laying a sound foundation for scientific progress, and if they did not do so they would find it impossible in after time. As life wore on the very faculty of exact learning, if not sedulously cultivated, became impaired. It was thus that severe study at the present period of their lives was so useful to them. Possibly, were he speaking to another body of students than themselves, he should point out how much scientific culture was required in modern teachers of religion. He might even point out some of the scientific doubts and difficulties of the time which were not easy to be laid at rest, and he might add that they must be in sympathy with the men having such doubts and difficulties before they could effectually reason with them. The plan of their studies was encyclopædic in extent, and in the theological department they had ample room, having always been encouraged to follow the guidance of their own convictions. Their dangers lay in quite another direction. They were in danger of forgetting that their future work would be less intellectual than to show forth the religious character. The intellectual presentation of Christianity was much easier than the theoretical, while the latter was also easier than the spiritual. The teacher of religion had first to feel himself, and then to make others feel that God was besetting them always behind and before, and that eternity overlapped them round—to impart the contagious thrill of enthusiasm for all that was pure and lovely and of good repute—and that was difficult indeed; but yet it was the best part of their work, if not the only part, worth doing. A fainting soul here and there lifted out of despondency, a heart well inclined to the side of right—these, and such as these, were the salvation of souls in the true and living sense, and the salvation of souls was the object of the Christian ministry. That led naturally to the remark that the idea of a religious teacher was that of a student of men rather than of books. He felt that he should be justified in putting that before them only in the most general way, because their work was now probably much among books, but he threw it out as an idea likely to be useful to them when they went out into active service. He should consider it a gain if the sacerdotal character could be excluded from the Christian church, and that a preacher could speak to Christian people just as—what he was—one of themselves. The fact, indeed, that a preacher was generally considered as having a professional interest in the doctrines he taught, weakened his position. But the more they could live the lives of those to whom they preached, the better they could understand their trials and their doubts, and the more effective their career was likely to be. For himself, he had always found that there was more in men and women than was evident at the first glance. In one respect, Mr. Beard continued, the position of the students of that College was an unhappy one—their actual circumstances did not answer to the amplitude of the ideal of their church. Their numbers did not reach a score, and only a limited number of churches would accept of their services, and they would ultimately find themselves within the limits of a small and disliked sect. It was no wonder if, sometimes, their own position was too much for them when they compared their theoretical with their actual position. In such circumstances they ought to cultivate the kindness and seek the recognition of other denominations, and ultimately they would succeed in securing friendship and recognition by the body of the Christian church. He did not ask them to sacrifice any friendships they might take hence; but they must remember that a sect, no matter how wide its theoretical basis, would be a sect still if it lived its life apart. Let them go forth, therefore, into the world with the large spirit of the Apostle looking on all as one in Christ Jesus; and show, by the universality of their sympathies, that their alma mater was no narrow, theological seminary, but an institution in which men were trained to broad ends. He strongly recommended the study of religious biography. Neither theology nor ecclesiastical history would do so much for their religious growth. They would get from ecclesiastical biography something better than the opinions of the sects, and they would see from it that all Christians, whatever their external differences, were members of one family. Referring to an inscription upon a Silesian rathhaus to this effect, "that to do good was to be evil spoken of," Mr. Beard concluded by pointing out that this specially applied to those whom he addressed, and asked were they ready to take that burden upon themselves. To do good was their mission, and he could promise them too truly that they would be evilly as well as well spoken of. They would find their ministerial position a stumbling block. Yet they might be happy if those trifling troubles had the effect of turning them back for consolation upon their work itself, and they would receive that consolation just in proportion as they were able to give themselves a living sacrifice to God and to man.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

The annual meeting of the trustees was held at University Hall on Thursday; E. Enfield, Esq., president, in the chair. There were present D. Ainsworth, Esq., treasurer; the Rev. C. Beard B.A., and R. D. Darbishire, Esq., B.A., secretaries; the Rev. Dr. Martineau, principal; the Revs. J. Drummond, B.A., J. E. Carpenter, M.A., and C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., professors; the Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., chairman of committees, and eighteen other trustees.

It was stated that Dr. Martineau would give the address soon after the opening of the session in October.

The Principal read the usual reports in regard to the conduct and attainments of the students during the session. The new course of lectures by Professor Estlin Carpenter on Comparative Theology had been attended with satisfactory results, and the reports generally were unusually favourable.

The Rev. C. WICKSTEED moved: "That the trustees renew their grateful appreciation of the labours of the principal and professor, and that the thanks of the trustees be given to the visitors, and the Rev. Charles Beard for his address."

Mr. Wicksteed spoke in high terms of the results of the examinations in various departments, especially in Cicero, "De Natura," and in Aristotle. The motion was seconded, and carried unanimously.

The customary certificates were granted to Mr. Perry and Mr. Scott on the completion of their course, and the remaining students were admitted on the foundation for next session. Two new students were also admitted—Mr. W. J. Evans, formerly German scholar of Carmarthen College, and recently of Jesus College, Oxford; and Mr. Thomas Robinson, son of the Rev. W. Robinson, of Crewkerne.

The report of the Special Committee on Local Examinations was read as follows:—

Seventeen candidates who passed the examinations last year have presented themselves again this year, and have all passed, in every case, in the same branch as as that in which they were before examined. This is of much interest, as it shows that those examinations do much to encourage patient systematic study of some one study in theology.

Again your committee have it to report that the numbers presenting themselves for examination are a very small proportion of those who have reaped the benefit of the plan in systematic study. In every case many have attended the lectures delivered by the ministers to their classes, who for various reasons declined the examinations. And other ministers, whose names do not appear at all in the class-lists, have held numerous and regularly-attended classes on the subjects announced in this scheme.

The regulations for next year are submitted for approval. No alteration has been made in the rules, except in section 6, which has been defined somewhat more accurately, in order that the lecturers and candidates may know the exact course of reading the examiners require to be undertaken as preparation for the examinations.

Again must the committee tender their best thanks to the Principal and Professors of the College.

These examinations make a serious addition to the year's work, not only in the examination of the candidates, but also in the selection of subjects and text books. As it is to their labours that the success of these examinations is entirely due, your committee must most heartily congratulate both principal and professors upon the result of the year's work.

R. D. DARBISHIRE, } Secretaries.
CHARLES BEARD, }
CHAS. T. POYNTING, Secretary for the Local Theological Examinations.

The formal business was followed by a prolonged discussion on the College memorial to the Duke of Richmond. Mr. T. Ashton, of Hyde, took strong exception to the concluding words of the memorial, praying "that in revising the application of revenues in Oxford and Cambridge, and also in establishing hereafter any new teaching university, provision may be made for systematic instruction with examinations, degrees, and honours, in theological philosophy, history, and literature, conducted by professors unpledged in the university or out of it, by articles, creeds, or confessions of faith." It was objected that this involved the principle of asking the Government to interfere in religious instruction, in opposition to all the principles which we and our fathers have hitherto professed, and that they implied a covert hostility to the movement on behalf of Owens College for a charter as a northern university.

Mr. BEARD expressly desired to absolve Manchester New College from all opposition to Owens College in this matter.

Mr. DARBISHIRE gave further explanations respecting the action of the committee in drawing up the draft memorial and taking action about its presentation as quite in accordance with the intention of the last trustees' meeting, at which the sub-committee was appointed; and also disclaimed any opposition to the Owens College movement. He contended that Manchester New College was bound to come forward and take every opportunity of seeing that a new university should include every branch of knowledge in its teaching, not excepting theology.

Mr. ASHTON contended that it is impossible to teach theology in such a form as to be acceptable to men who regard creeds and articles as essential, and therefore it should not be taught at all in such a university as that proposed. The memorial practically asked that the Duke of Richmond should impose upon the governors of Owens College a condition which it is absolutely impossible for them to fulfil, and which would destroy the possibility of a new university. He moved: "That it be an instruction to the secretary to state clearly to the Duke of Richmond that in presenting this memorial there is no wish to impede in any way the granting a charter for the establishment of a university in the north of England."

Mr. JAMES WORTHINGTON seconded the motion.

Mr. W. SHAEN moved "the previous question," on the ground that the trustees had nothing to do with the question of granting, or otherwise, a charter to Owens College. He did not agree that we are not to declare a fundamental principle because it might, or might not, injure another institution. The time, he was afraid, had not come for the general reception of such principles as those laid down in the College memorial, but nevertheless it is still our duty to declare the principles in which we believe.

Mr. D. AINSWORTH seconded the amendment.

Mr. GAIR, in a long speech, expressed his concurrence in the resolution, and strongly criticised the action of the secretaries and committee in pledging the College to the memorial without laying it before the trustees.

Mr. DARBISHIRE appealed to the trustees not to let the interests of another institution override the declaration of the principles on which their own institution is founded.

Mr. ASHTON, who is one of the governors of Owens College, thought that this institution went out of its way to declare its principles in an inconvenient manner, and had adopted an unkind attitude in regard to Owens College.

The "previous question" was then put, and carried by 17 to 4, and the proceedings were brought to a close with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

A service, dedicating to the ministry the students of Manchester New College who now retire on the completion of their theological course, was held on Thursday evening, 27th June. These students are Mr. Charles J. Perry, B.A., minister elect of Hope-street Chapel, Liverpool, and Mr. Lawrence Scott. The congregation was very large. The introductory devotional service was conducted by the Rev. Prof. James Drummond, B.A., who read as his lesson Romans xii. The valedictory address was impressively and touchingly delivered by the principal, the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., and suitable replies to his kindly words were made by both of the retiring students. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., then uttered warm words of welcome to them on their entrance into the Christian ministry. The service was brought to a close by hymn and benediction.

STUDENTS' DINNER.

This very pleasant gathering of past and present alumni of Manchester New College, took place at the "London" on Wednesday evening. Thirty-seven were present, presided over by the Rev. Charles Beard, with his accustomed geniality. The speeches after dinner were full of wit and wisdom, and we understand that the present was regarded as one of the pleasantest of a long series of similar gatherings.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

ACCORDING to the custom of previous years, the annual meeting of this Conference was held in the Memorial Hall yesterday, and will be continued to-day (Friday), when two papers are to be read—one by the Rev. John Cuckson, of Birmingham, and another by the Rev. William Mellor, of Crewe.

At ten o'clock those present joined in the communion service.

The business of the Conference then commenced in the large hall, the Rev. HENRY WILLIAMSON in the chair. There were present Revs. E. W. Hopkinson, J. G. Slater, H. Williamson, A. Rush-ton, J. C. Street, Richard Pilcher, B.A., J. Towle Marriott, Andrew Chalmers, H. McKean, Alexander Webster, W. G. Cadman, E. Allen, J. C. Lunn, C. H. Osler, N. Green, W. Mitchell, Harold Rylett, John McDowell, W. S. Smith, D. Matts, George Fox, W. Matthews, T. B. Broadrick, W. Roger Smyth, G. Ride, J. Pollard, Messrs. Pierce Parry, J. Phillips, J. Miller, W. Shanks, D. Rees, H. V. Mills, E. Crooks.

TRAINING FOR THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

THE CHAIRMAN said: I am influenced, my brethren, in the important office of president of this Conference by the fact that it is a missionary organisation which has united us together. Any practical suggestion, or report of actual experience which may give us individually and collectively faith and hope in our work, must prove acceptable. Although our Conference has avoided the use of the term Unitarian Christian to distinguish it from other missionary conferences, I need not more than say I assume that we are all substantially in agreement as to the real nature of the remedy we possess for the evils of human society. There cannot be a doubt in any of our minds, I think, of the decided importance to the common good of mankind of our mission. Supposing we are single minded, sincere, and full of the enthusiasm of humanity, our concern will not be on account of our want of opportunity, but for the vast fields we have no time or skill to cultivate. I propose to introduce the rather delicate subject of the training of the religious teacher. That any one who takes up the position of guide and instructor in the Christian Church needs some help from those who have preceded him in the profession, is a statement no one will dispute. But it is obvious there may be differences of opinion in the minds of conscientious men as to what course would be most likely to lead to the end contemplated by Jesus Christ. It is simply impossible for any one mind to know all branches of knowledge. There was a time when, owing to the limited scope of science, history, and philosophy, a general acquaintance with things knowable seemed attainable. There must now be a selection of studies and practices arranged according to the intention of the student and the life he is to live. The work of the Christian minister and of the Christian missionary is that to which most of us have set our hands, and for which we have had some sort of preparatory training. Each one may naturally think his was the right one, and in some instance, great importance has been attached to the manner and form of the education designed to fit men otherwise capable for the work of the ministry. If we can learn with some degree of certainty what the work of the minister or missionary is to be, the question of how he should be trained becomes easy, or comparatively easy of solution. And it will appear that there is a place for the minister in the great hive of human activity; he can find room for the exercise of the talent he may possess, wherever there are men, women, children; and upon him rests the responsibility of discovering and using the means for the general good. There are two ways by which the profession of a Christian minister is attainable: in one case a man's parents and friends direct his early education and training to that end, and any one who is conscious of having devoted a large share of his life to studies reported to be fitted to make him a minister, may regard himself as in some degree privileged. Just as in the various handicrafts those which absorb considerable time in learning them are protected by combinations termed trades union societies; so the profession of the ministry is protected by other than moral and religious or theological restrictions. It must be considered important to test by observation and experience the real power and value of any theory relating to the general mission of Christianity. Any one looking over the list of studies required to be mastered—temporarily at least—to qualify for the "degree" which some consider so essential to the Christian minister, can hardly help the reflection that Jesus himself would have failed to have satisfied the modern scribes, as he did those of his own time. A young man feeling the impulse of self sacrifice and enthusiasm for the work of Christ is very much affected by the judgment and example of his elders, and so generation after generation of religious teachers come forth earning the titles of learned and cultured, and the aspect of the minister's position is that of profound book wisdom. He is a repository of a portion of ancient thought. He often appears effeminate, wanting in the vigour and up-to-time characteristics of men of trade and business. If in any way the Christian minister considered as a missionary is inefficient, holding on to the traditions and inherited privileges which are gradually losing their hold upon men's minds, it is certainly a most important question to consider what ought to be the training of those who, in the spirit of the heroic and generous Jesus, give themselves to the work of preventing human misery and sin, and of using means for saving those who are already lost. There are men and women at present sustaining acceptably the position, and performing the office of Christian ministers equal to any college-trained preachers who have entered the ministry, or have been driven into it by the force of circumstances and by the crying evils from which society suffers, and for which the Gospel of Jesus has claimed to provide remedies. Something can be said of the advantage derived from the early experience of one who has had to take his or her place side by side with the common lot of labour, who knows the patience required to submit to insult and contempt from wealth and office, who while others were at school was exposed to summer heat and winter's cold in a morotonous toil, where strength and endurance were demanded to hold out against contending influences. It is clear that from such a training a preacher must find himself able to sympathise intelligently and heartily, not with an air of condescension, but by association. There is undoubtedly danger to be avoided in those who rely upon a practical and experimental knowledge of the world of to-day, lest they should forget that God's relation to the world is constant and eternal, and an acquaintance with the past offers suggestions for the issue of present tendencies and acts. Between the high scholastic training arrived at in one case, and the assertion that a man's accidental or inherited endowments afford all that he needs to enter the Christian ministry, there are even in our small body a variety of positions, and it cannot but be of interest to all now engaged to contemplate how our successors will stand in relation to us compared with our connection with our forerunners whose work and traditions we have adopted; or whether as some claim, and tell us we represent the last flickerings of a light which once burned with strength and purity, but is now uncertain and fickle as Will-o-the-wisp. For my part I find myself constantly under the influence of a profound astonishment at the grand adaptation of the simple doctrine and life of Christ for the world of mankind, making as it does every natural affection and relation shine with divine beauty and joy; and, therefore, I look to the work of the Christian minister as one of the most important and essential aids to the elevation and progress of our race. One thing we may notice in connection with ministerial training is that it is manifestly definite, and in the scope of its ultimate application limited. Whatever talk there may be about breadth and power belonging to the Christian minister in the abstract, in reality he is pretty much confined. If he aims at making way by his pulpit sermons he is either too abstruse or too lengthened in his expositions. If he attempts an elaborate exegesis of what Paul or Peter may have thought, he is liable to hear of some one who shows an utter indifference to what those venerable teachers may have said or done. A leading layman of our body made the remark the other day that twenty minutes was a fair length for a sermon, with a leaning to mercy. Now when we consider that young men are being carefully trained in philosophy and in the literature of Greece and Rome, with other branches of knowledge difficult of attainment, and that their pulpit services will be looked upon possibly with a kind of good-natured indulgence, when they become the ministers of churches, it cannot but affect the stability of the whole system in our minds, and at the same time lead us to ask where the defect lies. Time will not permit me to more than briefly refer to points of interest, and I pass on to the consideration of how Christianity stands in regard to the world. Is its mission one of defence? Is it always to be planting and then pulling up to see if there is growth? A glance at the origin of the cause we have become identified with shows us that at the very foundation of the life and labours of Jesus and his Apostles was the conviction that they possessed the means of preventing and remedying human loss and woe. However much the philosopher and the sophist and the apologist may have succeeded in offering hungry souls words instead of faith, history warrants us in the belief that it was not to win a reputation for learning and accomplishments that Christ sent his disciples to their work. A very obvious difficulty is found in the relations of congregations and their ministers. A man is hired to preach to a fixed number of persons, many of whom are equal to himself—at least, in moral character and in religious experience. They tell him if his sermons are interesting, and perhaps in many ways affect him in all his work. He cannot stir often without the co-operation and support of those who have the means of depriving him of his office. It needs to be distinctly understood whether a minister is a servant of God or a servant of a church committee. I presume most thoughtful men would decline the responsibility of directing by positive statement the action of one who held the office of minister. Yet there are cases in which this has been done. We cannot hope, at present, to give the minister, where he is entitled to it, the advantage of that independence which would enable him to fulfil the mission of an evangelist; but no harm can come from having the fact mentioned that a Christian minister is responsible to another master than the organisation which finds him food and shelter. I see no good reason to offer against selecting a youth and giving him an opportunity of improving himself, with the view of the profession of minister. Mistakes, however, may occur. If the choice is made too early, the most critical period of a man's life, the turning point often for good or ill, falls in the midst of the course; and it is not always that a young man of twenty finds himself so enthusiastic for a life of self-sacrifice as he did at sixteen. The first requirement of a minister is character, and no examination can insure it. It seems to be a boast of some theological schools that the examination, into the intellectual attainments of candidates, is strict and severe. There will always be danger in such cases for persons to rely upon their passing what seems to be presented by the authorities as the most essential test of their fitness for the Christian ministry. They who undertake the office of doorkeeper of the Lord's vineyard, and reject or admit whom they will, certainly occupy a place of extreme responsibility, and in view of the condition of the masses of our nation, the practical heathenism which prevails, it is after all to be deplored if any man or woman longing to give honest labour in the Kingdom of Heaven should be rejected for ignorance of special topics of ancient learning. Mr. Huxley, in one of his papers (I quote from memory), remarks that he had abstained for a considerable time from calling attention to the errors in the training of young men, because he felt some hesitation in criticising what other men seemed to regard so essential, but he asserts that he would place little reliance upon an entrance examination, but would judge from the first year's progress whether the student possessed general qualifications for the profession he intended to follow. Another thing Mr. Huxley refers to is the mistake of expecting students preparing for a distinct kind of work attempting to get up a smattering of knowledge of subjects not connected with it. The same applies to the preparation for the ministry, if we take the purpose and work of the Christian teacher from example and word of Jesus. I cannot but believe there are good men kept out of the ministry who ought to be in it, and there are within it those who may rely more upon their intellectual qualifications than upon their single-minded desire to heal the spiritual diseases of the neglected and wandering children of men. The Christian ministry is not a select field of labour for those who satisfy themselves that they alone are the salt of the earth, it includes every form of Christ-like devotion to the work of human improvement; and many a Sunday-school teacher is doing a noble part in bringing in the kingdom of heaven. I consider it every way important that those who are to be public teachers and interpreters of the Gospel should have a time of rest from the responsibilities of office, and during which they may be aided by properly chosen instructors. We all know how difficult it is to retain untarnished the shrine of consecration which receives the first gift of self-sacrifice to God, 'mid the excitement and competition of college life; but those who make out the course of studies have it in their hands to see that the religious and practical duties of the students' future profession are always kept in view. Dr. Beard remarked that, in advocating the formation of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, "his intention was to make Christian ministers, and not schoolmasters." In one of his letters Dr. Channing refers to the training of ministers: "I wish there were a theological institution in which young men might be educated who have no taste for philosophy, and no great respect for a theology which must be dug out of lexicons and antiquities, but who desire to get into the heart of religion, and use it for the elevation of the people, for the redress of wrong." I have drawn attention to the responsibility resting upon us in regard to those who may follow us in our work; the signs of the times surely teach us that the ground is being cleared for a simple and human interpretation of the Gospel. It will be for us to show how, in our freedom, we can confess our hearty allegiance to Jesus, and how well fitted for all human experiences are the precepts of the Gospel. For this work we must have humble, willing workers. And if at present our systems of training ministers are not what they ought to be, a solemn duty rests upon us all to see to it that means are provided, so that no true disciple with the gifts of God shall be hindered from entering into the work.

THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT and the treasurer's statement were then taken as read.

In presenting their report for another year, it is with considerable pleasure your committee are able to say that the cause of Blackpool continues in a flourishing condition. The services are well attended all the year round, and the congregation of resident Unitarians keeps well together, and is full of hope and activity. Early in the present year a communication was received from the congregation urging that the time had arrived when steps should be taken for the appointment of a minister. The matter was fully considered by your committee, but the appointment of a minister by them being practically impossible, as they had not the means at their disposal, they could only advise the Blackpool friends in what direction to apply in order to gain assistance in raising a minister's salary. Subsequently a very generous offer was made by the committee of the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission to take over the Blackpool Mission, with a view to render it that effective assistance it required, and which the conference is not in a position to supply, and to settle a minister as soon as practicable. This offer has received attention, and in the firm conviction that its acceptance would be for the benefit of the congregation, they unanimously adopted the following resolution:—"That this committee recommend to the conference the transference of the Blackpool Mission to the care of the East Lancashire Mission." It now remains for the members to say whether they approve the recommendation.

Your committee deeply regret that their report respecting Barrow is of a very different kind. The Barrow Mission is no longer in existence. Through want of means your committee were compelled to retire from what they regarded a promising field of missionary labour. In accordance with a resolution of last annual conference, your committee took steps to obtain funds to enable them to continue the services. Circulars were sent to the members of the conference soliciting subscriptions, and an appeal was made to the Unitarian public in the columns of the denominational papers; but the response was extremely disappointing, and after a personal consultation with Rev. H. Ierson, and other members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association Committee, your committee were forced to inform the friends at Barrow that they could render them assistance no further. In the general financial statement a balance of £12. 1s. 1d. due to the Treasurer is shown on account of Barrow, and the committee recommend that it be paid out of the general account.

Your committee would again express their great obligation to S. Sharpe, Esq., of London, for his valuable aid to the missionary funds of the conference.

Your committee have devoted a good deal of time and thought to the recommendation from the last conference "to consider and report upon the mode of electing officers, and generally of conducting the annual meetings," and would suggest the following amendments and additions to the present rules:—

1. That in section II., rule 1, the words "to be given by ballot" be omitted.
2. That in section III., rule 1, the words "by ballot" be omitted.

3. That in the election of officers and committee there be an open nomination, and the voting be by voting paper, on which the names of all the members shall be printed.

4. That a vice-president be added to the list of officers, and that the retiring president be the vice-president of the following year.

After reciting the changes that had taken place in the settlement of ministers of the conference, the report stated that the Revs. W. Birks and D. Walmsley, B.A., have resigned.

During the past year the conference has sustained a severe loss in the death of two members—Revs. T. E. Poynting and F. Ashton. Mr. Poynting had been connected with the conference for a period of eleven years, and his words, weighted with matured scholarship and spiritual experience, ever received a respectful hearing from the members. Mr. Ashton had acted for two years upon the committee, and rendered great service in its business. Your committee record their decease with feelings of deep regret, and are sure their regret will be shared by every member of the conference.

The Rev. E. W. Hopkinson, the treasurer, submitted his financial statement, which leaves balances in hand at the beginning of the year of £43. 8s. 8d., receipts, £130. 11s. 5d.; total, £174. 0s. 1d.—the whole of which had been expended except the balance in hand, £3. 2s. 6½d.

The roll of members having been called, and the minutes of last Conference read and confirmed on the motion of the Rev. GEORGE RIDE, seconded by Mr. PIERCE PARRY,

The Rev. ALEXANDER WEBSTER moved the adoption of the report and financial statement, which was seconded by the Rev. T. B. BROADRICK.

The Rev. J. C. LUNN asked for information respecting Barrow, to which the SECRETARY replied that Barrow had been given up because means were not forthcoming to keep it open.

It was then agreed that the report and accounts should be passed. It was also agreed that the Blackpool Mission should be transferred to the East Lancashire Mission, and that the deficit in the Barrow accounts should be paid out of the general funds of the Conference.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

BIRMINGHAM DISTRICT PROTESTANT DISSENTING MINISTERS.

THE usual monthly meeting of the ministers of the above district was held at Whitechurch on Tuesday, June 25th. At twelve o'clock at noon divine service was held in the Free Christian Church. The devotional part of the service was taken by the Rev. E. H. Delf, Congregational minister, of Coventry. An anthem, "O, rest in the Lord!" was sung by Mrs. Heape, of Rochdale; and the sermon, from John, i., 38, was preached by the Rev. John Robberds, B.A., of Cheltenham. At the close of the service the ministers and friends adjourned to the Victoria Hotel, where an excellent luncheon was provided. The chair was occupied by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, and the vice-chair by Herbert New, Esq.

In proposing the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over," Mr. WALTERS said that there were still wanting some things before religious liberty should be complete. He did not look forward to the disestablishment of the Church, nor was he anxious for it if only it was found possible to widen its boundaries and make it really national. He approved of a State recognition of religion as the chief element in a nation's welfare, only he felt that all forms of a nation's religious thought should be mirrored in the National Church as all forms of political thought were in the National Parliament. He looked forward, however, to a speedy change in the burial laws, and a wider and fuller recognition of the brotherhood of all Christians.

The Rev. D. MACINNIS, of Stourbridge, responded.

The toast of the "Preacher and Supporter of the Day" was responded to by the Rev. E. H. Delf and the Rev. JOHN ROBBERDS. Mr. Delf, in an admirable speech, expressed his delight as a Congregationalist in being present at the meeting. He owed to two men, who differed widely from him in theological matters, more than he did to anyone else, and he could not but feel glad when he had an opportunity of meeting with his fellow-Christians who were not at one with him in matters of doctrine.

To the toast of the "Visitors," the Revs. J. HARDINGE MATTHEWS, of Nantwich, W. MELLOR, of Crewe, and C. H. WELLBELOVED, of York, replied.

The Rev. JOHN GORDON then proposed the health of the Rev. W. Carey Walters, coupling with it an expression of thanks to the congregation of the Free Christian Church for their kind hospitality.

In the evening a concert was held in the Assembly Room. A very large audience was present, and the concert gave the greatest satisfaction. Addresses were delivered by the Chairman, Herbert New, Esq., Rev. John Gordon, and Rev. E. H. Delf; and a musical programme was performed, in which Mrs. Heap, Misses Haines, Edith New, A. Rawson, and Messrs. Thomas Rawson and George Barker took part. It would be invidious to particularise, but it is necessary that a special acknowledgment should be made to Mr. Thomas Rawson, of Manchester, under whose superintendence the arrangements were successfully carried out, and who acted as pianist and conductor during the evening. The platform was profusely decorated with plants and flowers, and the floral decorations of the church, carried out by Mrs. Haines, were exceedingly beautiful. On Wednesday morning the ministers

DOING AND SAYING.

Mr. John Macgregor, writing to the Times, utters the following as a reason for girls learning to swim: "Mothers and sisters who can swim will not let their boys be unwashed when on land, or drowned when in the water."

The Hebrews of Melbourne are troubled on account of so many of their tribe having married Christian ladies, who wish to profess the faith of their husbands. As the Jewish religion is a matter of race, some of the influential Jews have entered a protest against these "conversions."

At the last meeting of the Royal Historical Society, under the presidency of Dr. B. W. Richardson, a most animated discussion was excited by a paper from the pen of Mr. James Heywood, F.R.S., formerly M.P. for North Lancashire. His subject was "The Historical Progress of Free Thought." Dr. Zerffi, Mr. Cornelius Walford, Dr. Charles Rogers, and others took part in the discussion.

Nottingham has spent nearly £30,000 on a museum, and last week the new institution was inaugurated by royalty. It is a hopeful sign to see that art galleries and museums are not so great a rarity as they were some years ago, and it is an indication of a taste for a higher kind of civilisation that some of the large towns in this kingdom have exhibited so much energy and enterprise in providing such places for the free use of the people.

Writing on the Pan-Anglican Synod now sitting, the Graphic is of opinion that "the day is long past when the word of a bishop carried with it more weight than that of any other educated man. . . . Scepticism has rarely prevailed to so large an extent as it does now. But a formal utterance is not the weapon with which it must be assailed. Sceptics must be met on their own ground: they must be dealt with by experts who have investigated the evidences for religion, and know how to present it in a skilful form. A mere ex cathedra proclamation is apt rather to excite their mirth than to allay their doubts. On the whole, therefore, it is to be hoped that the hundred bishops now assembled at Lambeth will not take the Synod too seriously, but regard it as a friendly gathering with which they themselves are most concerned."

The people of Geneva have been celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the death of their great citizen, John Jacques Rousseau. The Parisians are about to follow suit, and a committee of which M. Louis Blanc, M. de Girardin, and other eminent Frenchmen are members, has been formed. The fête at Geneva, though apparently very popular with the masses and warmly supported by the Government, was regarded (says a despatch to the Times) with great disfavour by the Catholics and the orthodox Protestants, who have no admiration either for the character or the writings of their celebrated townsman. "The Socialists, on the other hand, who abound in Geneva, have adopted Rousseau as their hero and idol. They compare him with Socrates, and even with Jesus Christ, claim him as the Messiah of Socialism, and demand that statues be erected in his honour and altars raised for his worship."

The celebration of the first anniversary of the Reformed Episcopal Church, in Christ Church, Westminster, of which the well-known Rev. Newnan Hall is minister, is quoted as an illustration of the success of Bishop Gregg's communion. Bishop Gregg has already held two series of ordinations, in the course of which he has admitted more than twenty gentlemen to the orders of deacon or presbyter, the last being the form, in common with the Irish Church, in which the Reformed Episcopal Church "writes large" the "priest" of the Church of England. The movement has also gained the adhesion of several of the benefited and other clergy of the English Church, belonging, of course, to the Evangelical section. Chief amongst these are the Rev. T. H. Paddon, M.A., Oxon, late vicar of High Wycombe; and the Rev. Nicholas R. Toke, B.A., Cantab, also until recently an Anglican incumbent.

Mr. James Howard, writing from Paris, in the Daily News, mentions a fact which, as he truly says, should teach tolerance to those who are striving to maintain the exclusion from the churchyards of England of all clergy or ministers not of the National Church. An English friend of Mr. Ward's, resident in Paris, has had the misfortune to lose his wife. Having resided some years in Normandy, he desired to bury his wife in the same ground in which one or two other members of his family had been interred, viz., the Roman Catholic churchyard of the village of Livet, near Lisieux, and where the burial took place on Wednesday in last week. Being a Protestant, he invited the Rev. A. B. Spaight, M.A., of the Marbœuf Church, Paris, to go down to officiate, and at the burial the Church of England service was read by this gentleman with just the same freedom as though he had been in an English churchyard. Mr. Ward naturally inquired whether an exception in this case had been made, his friend having formerly been an extensive employer of labour at Lisieux; but he learned, to his satisfaction, that when a Protestant is buried in a churchyard attached to a Roman Catholic Church, the choice of the officiating minister and the service are left entirely to the friends of the deceased. Surely the time cannot be far distant when Englishmen shall in this respect enjoy the same freedom as the French.

A frontier town in Russian Poland, Kalisch, has been the scene of a serious outburst of fanaticism against the Jews on the part of Roman Catholics. The Jews themselves seem to have been the inciting party, for a good deal of bitterness has been shown in consequence of the Russian authorities having interfered with one of their peculiar customs. This was the planting of stakes round their houses, and the enclosure of the same by wires on the Sabbath, to denote that no one might pass out or in. The Russian authorities ordered the removal of these stakes, and the Jews complained that public demonstrations of the Romanists were not equally forbidden. The ill-feeling came to a height on Corpus Christi Day, when altars were set up at the corners of the streets, and the processions went round the town. One of these altars was overturned and broken, it was said, by a Jew, and the fanatic mob broke out into riot. Arming themselves with pitchforks, flails, and scythes, they cut down all the Jews they met in the streets, broke into the synagogue, demolished the pulpit and altar, tore down the tabernacle and the scrolls of the law, and made the place a wreck. The Jews fled, and barricaded themselves in their houses, and before order was restored it is said that twelve persons were killed, and damage to buildings done to the extent of 200,000 roubles. Over 200 persons are in custody, among whom are said to be ten priests.

The Vicar of Rainhall, near Liverpool, has recently given emphatic and eloquent utterance against the now almost universally-condemned doctrine of eternal punishment, and has no less forcibly expressed his faith in ultimate universal redemption and restoration. Preaching in the Parish Church, from the text, Psalm xxxvi, 7, "How excellent is Thy loving kindness, &c.," as reported in the St. Helen's and Prescott Standard, the Vicar said:—"Without the belief that the love of the Father and of Christ for human souls is an undying, unchangeable, unwearying love, which eternally seeks and saves, which punishes only to purify, and consumes only with the fire of that wrath which is hatred to the sin, but cleansing and salvation to the sinner,—without this belief confessed and cherished, serious doubts and misgivings must cross the mind of any thoughtful Christian man or woman who meditates upon the exclamation—'How excellent is Thy loving kindness, O God! Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wings.' For God's loving kindness is emphatically not excellent if that representation of His dealings be true which makes heaven narrow and scantily populated, and hell capacious and densely thronged: His loving kindness is emphatically not excellent if even one single soul which he has created and sustains in life is to be abandoned by Him to rebellion and misery for ever and ever. However mysterious the ways of His wisdom may be, however little of His righteous will and loving desire that 'all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth,' may be clearly displayed in this present life, we are bound to believe that tender mercy and goodness are the guiding principles of the Divine government, and will finally triumph over all moral darkness and evil. If we entertain any other persuasion while we confess that God is perfect in wisdom, and holiness, and power, then we must conclude that the Almighty and All-wise One is baffled and beaten by something in His own workmanship contrary to His own will and nature. . . . We cannot believe that anything proceeds from Him, or flows from His creative acts, which will finally and for ever thwart His aims, or hinder the complete accomplishment of His designs. The present existence of sin and evil is no conclusive argument, and indeed no valid argument at all, for the everlasting continuance of sin and evil, and Christian men would never use it as an argument if bondage to a traditional crotchet did not adulterate their faith in the Divine goodness. There are indications in the history of mankind quite sufficient to strengthen and establish the conviction that God's general method is advancement through lower to higher stages, through evil up to good. This method He will pursue until evil is extinguished and good victorious."

SCOTTISH NOTES.

PROFESSOR SMITH'S CASE: WHAT WILL COME OF IT?

THE Smith case will be again proceeded with in September in the Presbytery of Aberdeen. Practically there are just two strongly marked parties in the Free Church in this connection. In the first place, there are those who are thick and thin supporters of the Professor. They want him to be not merely cleared of all charge of heresy, but to be reinstated triumphantly in his chair as an entirely trustworthy teacher. Those who are of this mind are doing their best to make out that the General Assembly meant to give a hearty verdict in his favour, and that, in fact, there is at this moment no more honoured man in the Church than Mr. Smith. The other party have no wish to proceed to extremity against Professor Smith. They admire him as a genius, and look to his doing good service in the cause of Biblical criticism. But they feel that the question is now being put afresh to them, whether he is the sort of man whom it would be wise and prudent to entrust with the difficult and delicate business of the training of the ministry, and on that head they have made up their minds in the negative. Professor Smith's rate of speed is much too great for a slow-going coach like the Free Church. His use of the whip is much too reckless, and those inside would be in constant dread of his going over the precipice. The point in dispute, then, is narrowed to one of a vote of confidence in his fitness to be a Free Church professor. Is it likely that that question will ultimately be settled in the negative?

DR. STORY ON DISESTABLISHMENT.

SPEAKING the other night at the annual soirée of the Skelmorlie Parish Church, Dr. Story, of Rosneath, stumbled in the course of his remarks upon the presently greatly vexed question of disestablishment. He said: "They were constantly told that if the establishment were disestablished it would necessarily result in a great union of the Scottish Presbyterian churches. He would like to have that on authority on which he could rely. They were always told by the Free Church and the U. P. Church that if they were disestablished they would unite with them at once. He did not see that at all. He was on very good terms with the Free Church and the U. P. Church; but if they were to turn him from his manse and deprive him of his stipend, it would require a great deal more, he suspected, of the Christian attribute of charity than he was afraid he possessed, not only to maintain his feelings of regard for them, but also to love them so much that he would immediately fall on their necks and kiss them, and unite with them as his nearest and dearest friends. He did not believe in that sort of union. He would rather believe in the American view of it, in the union of absorption, by which one body became absorbed into another. The Yankee, when told that the day would come when the lion would lie down with the lamb, said, 'Well, I calculate when that day comes the lamb will lie down inside the lion.' And he believed that if he was so absorbed into the Free or the U. P. Church he would so disagree with the church absorbing him that he would be very soon treated as Jonah was by the whale. If disestablishment came, and they were forced to look for new connections, he was free to say, for his own part, and he was sure he spoke for many others, that it would not be in the direction of those who had assisted in bringing about disestablishment that they would look, but in other directions altogether." What does this very pointed tail of Dr. Story's speech mean? Is it that they will come honestly forward in their true colours, after being released from the golden chains of the State, and proclaim on the housetops, so to speak, that heresy which up to this time they have but whispered in the corners of the vineyard? If so, then in the interest of all concerned we cannot have disestablishment a day too soon.

HOW THE WIND IS BLOWING.

THE Scottish correspondent of the Nonconformist remarks that whether a dissolution is near or no, the constituencies in the North are everywhere bestirring themselves to meet the contingency when it comes. Among the first to feel the influence of the coming storm is the county of Fife. From its central position it has always attracted a good deal of public attention, and of late more than usual interest has been felt in its prospects, in consequence of its having as its representative one who is personally very popular, who is in many respects a most reliable Liberal, but who has been withal almost reckless in his defence of the Established Church. What will happen to Sir Robert Anstruther? has been a pet political conundrum. Everybody believed he would be opposed; but nobody felt any confidence in predicting the result. A majority, however, were of opinion that the issue would be the return of a Conservative, and there is consequently great satisfaction felt in the resolution to which Sir Robert has come to resign his seat. The incident is a straw which shows how the wind is blowing. One of the ablest and most popular Scotch county members feels that he has little chance of retaining his seat, simply and solely because he is not in favour of disestablishment. It is impossible not to attach a very serious significance to the circumstance. People may talk as they like about disestablishment not being ripe; this, at least, is manifest, that it has made of late such progress as to be well entitled to be treated as a pressing political question. This view is confirmed by the fact that the man who, in all probability, will be accepted as the Liberal candidate when the seat becomes vacant has professed himself to be in favour of disestablishment. The expected candidate is the Hon. Preston Bruce, a son of the late, and a brother of the present, Earl of Elgin. More than that, the other day a Fife Liberal—a man of position and influence in the county, and an elder of the Established Church to boot—stated that he had no objection whatever to the disestablishment views of Mr. Bruce. The straw moves. More and more are people becoming familiarised with the idea of the State being separate from the Church, and something extraordinary will happen if at the next general election a considerably larger number of Scotch members than formerly are not prepared to vote for such motions as Mr. Miall's.

CHORLEY.—Two sermons were preached here on June 30th, on behalf of the Sunday school, after which collections were made amounting to £11. 10s. 3d.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

The chief article in the Congregationalist (Hodder and Stoughton) is a carefully written and thoughtful essay by the Rev. T. C. Finlayson, of Manchester, on "The Practical Uses of the Imagination." Ecclesiastical subjects occupy a good deal of space. The third paper on "The Parochial System" is on the Parish in the Auction Mart, and is full of most useful facts. The debate in the House of Commons on the Scotch Establishment is well summarised, and pithily commented upon.

In the Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner just issued, a fact is related with reference to Thomas Carlyle's contributions to the Edinburgh Review, which is, we believe, new to most readers. Sumner asked Jeffrey how he explained the fact that Mr. Carlyle's fine article on the life of Burns, which was his first contribution to the Edinburgh Review, differed so much in style from his later productions. "Oh!" said Jeffrey, because I altered it, and Carlyle was vexed at my 'interference'."

Whittier's name is said to be a corruption of Whitechurch, the name of an old parish town near London. The name of the family came from the town, and that of the town from a white church. George Whitechurch was the publisher of the Bible under King Henry the Eighth. The final "ch" was dropped on account of the Puritan prejudices of the family. Since then the name has been spelled in thirty-two different ways; among them Whiteyear, Whitur, Whitcur, Whicher, Whitcher, Whitter.

"Philip Phosphor," in Sermons Never Preached, just published by Trübner and Co., denounces the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed as an offence against God, against Scripture, against man, in the following vigorous and practical style:—"I would as soon believe the British Government capable of condemning a man to penal servitude for life because he was not able to square the circle, or refused to believe that two and two made five, as that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ would damn a man to all eternity for not subscribing to the Athanasian Creed. And yet I have stood in church and watched complacent, well-to-do old gentlemen, and amiable British matrons, carolling away these fearful sentences, not one of which they understood, and announcing, in more or less harmonious cadences, the cool anathema which caps them. . . . They would have joined in chanting the enunciation of any one of Euclid's propositions, had it been included in the Liturgy, with equal fervour, and quite as much intelligence."

The Theological Review for July is an excellent combination of scholarly and popular articles: of the former kind are Mr. Russell Martineau's critical dissertation on Dr. Kalisch's Balaam, and the Rev. Alexander Gordon's masterly account of Servetus. All lovers of Servetus who read Mr. Gordon's article will be thankful to him for this interesting monograph. The general demand for "something popular" is met by the Rev. Charles Beard, and the Rev. W. C. Smith. Mr. Beard graphically reviews the memorable debate on the Congregational Union on the Leicester Conference, and ably discusses the terms of religious communion. Mr. Beard thinks that there are practical limits to religious communion in habitual worship between persons of different theological beliefs, but believes some such movement as that aimed at by the Leicester Conference holds the secret of future church organisation in England. Mr. Walter C. Smith, in an article on "Religious Freedom in Scotland," tells again, and in a pithy, vigorous way, the story of the Declaratory Statement and the Fergus Ferguson case in the U. P. Synod, and that of Professor Smith in the Free Church Assembly. Mr. Smith evidently looks to a settlement of the controversy in favour of liberty, and in that case predicts a great future for the Free Church. As it is, the writer testifies that all over Scotland Professor Smith has given a new impulse to liberal ideas.

The Athenæum has a notice of the issue of the first instalment of the "Speaker's Commentary on the New Testament," which comprises the synoptical gospels. It says, "Compared with others of British origin it presents a decided advance. Along with the marks of good sense and fair judgment it shows the use of recent critical literature bearing upon the gospels. The notes are not of undue length; they are clearly expressed, and adapted to the text. They are pitched in a key suited to the average clerical mind. The work must therefore benefit students and ministers of the gospel, giving them such satisfaction as they desire, and confirming previous impressions." Regarded in the light of criticism the book, he thinks, "is behind the time. On crucial questions it limps and fails." The general introduction is described by the reviewer as showing a "determination to uphold in every possible way views which are certainly antiquated," and of some other important matters he says the author "neither adduces evidence of what he says, nor can he." The notice is closed in these words, "It is impossible to acquiesce in the summary way in which Dr. Thomson (the Archbishop of York, we presume) disposes of difficult questions. He has thrown no light on the synoptics. He slurs over the crucial points in their composition. His method of reasoning is easy and sweeping. He does not like quieta movere. Accordingly he disposes of modern science very much as he does the gospels:—"Modern science has not made the belief in miracles one whit more difficult; the Pantheist and Materialist cannot accept them, and they never could, for one makes the world his God, and the other instead of a God, takes the 'laws of nature' for his fetish. But now as always, the believer in God can believe in miracles, for this last belief is only the tenet that God is free to work in his own world." "This," the reviewer adds, "is a short and easy method with philosophers, which has the merit of saving trouble."

Just for gladness! just for gladness!
Sing the little birds to-day;
Sing their merry roundelay;
Dropping not a note of sadness
Down upon our human way.

Just for pleasure! just for pleasure!
Bud and blossom seek the light;
Lift their glowing faces bright;
Smiling, glad to add their treasure
To the joy of mortal sight.

Just for sweetness! just for sweetness
Breathes the soft and perfumed air;
Breathes its cadence low and rare;
Rounding into calm completeness
Summer day so royal fair.

Just for beauty! just for beauty!
Shine the hills so far and fair;
Gleam across the radiant air;
Sentinels that smile in duty,
'Neath the cloud-wrought crowns they wear.

Just for blessing! just for blessing!
Sits my soul amid it all;
Drops her cares and burdens small;
Feels the touch of mute caressing
Soft in benediction fall.

WALKING WITH WISE MEN.

A MAN is not only known by the company he keeps, but he himself in due time comes to resemble those with whom he most intimately associates. Unconsciously he absorbs their ideas, imitates their manners, treasures up their words, adopts their way of thinking, and his whole moral and mental nature is moulded and shadowed by the companions with whom he spends his time. The man who chooses as his associates the learned, the intelligent, the courageous and the honorable, will find the atmosphere of intelligence and intellectual and moral improvement surrounding him on every side. The better powers of his nature will develop themselves, while that which is base and inharmonious will sink from sight. On the contrary, the man who chooses as his companions the ribald, dissolute, godless, and profane, may find in due time that he himself has become polluted and defiled by them; or rather the evil elements which led him to affiliate with them will grow and strengthen till they possess his whole soul. He imbibes the ideas of his companions. He finds himself subject to the same passions and appetites which rule and sway his ungodly associates. His thoughts are reduced to the level of their thinking, his aims are identical with theirs. Their scoffs at everything noble, pure, and good, are not without their influence upon him; and he comes to hate righteousness and love iniquity. He keeps the company of the vicious until he learns the ways of vice; he follows in the path of the thriftless until he becomes as thriftless as they. He consorts with those who waste their substance in riot and in revelry; he joins in the revel, and shares at last the poverty and pain in which it ends.

Let every man choose as his associates those whose course and whose end commends itself to his purest and noblest thoughts. When a young lady gave her heart and hand to a humble but godly minister, to those who complained that he had no pedigree, that "no one knew where he came from," she answered, she knew where he was going, and was content to be his companion. And if we, turning from the companionship of the sinful and the debased, seek out the good and the gracious, those of sound judgment and good understanding, we shall find in our course through life, that while we have honoured, virtue and purity in others we have also cultivated it in ourselves; and we shall prove at last the truth of that word of wisdom, "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed."—The Christian.

POWER OF A LITTLE CHILD.

RECENTLY, two men engaged in an angry dispute on the street, during which one shook his fist beneath the other's nose, and appeared to have worked himself up to a fever-heat of passion. Just then a little girl, almost an infant, was going by, but stopped, apparently paralyzed by the man's fury, moved quite close to him, and, looking up into his face, inquired:—

"What makes you so tross, mister?"

It was so unexpected that the man evidently felt a complete revolution of feeling. Gradually his countenance cleared, and finally lit up with a smile, as he patted the little peacemaker's head, and remarked, as he moved away, ignoring the other man altogether:—

"I guess you're right, little pet."—Christian Register.

THE HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

VALEDICTORY ADDRESS.

[ADDRESS to the retiring students, delivered in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, July 3rd, by Rev. SILAS FARRINGTON.]

There comes a grave moment in the experience, I suppose, of nearly every household, when the youth, hitherto sheltered and guarded by the tenderness of home, is about to venture forth from that charmed circle and try his strength and measure his resources in the wider world. However careful has been their training, however favourable the conditions of the new experiment, however fair his promise, what deep and tender solicitudes now arise and fill his parents' hearts! Now they see with a strange vividness the dangers that attend his forward movement, the difficulties that will hem him in, the temptations that will allure. Memories of their own illusions, their own disappointments, their own failures, come crowding in upon them. Could they but forewarn and forearm their son setting out so gaily on his career against its certain perils; could they but transfer to him their own dearly bought experience! How inadequate seem all their counsels hitherto, how imperfect their best advice; how they reproach themselves with neglected opportunity, how they cast about for some fitting summary of all the earnest direction, the warning, the encouragement, they long to pour into their child's heart; for some word which shall be a lamp to his feet and a light upon his path! Ah, what can they say? What words can hold such a weight of tender fears, hopes, sympathy, guidance; such yearnings that cannot be uttered, as they would now press into expression! At last the parting moment comes—"God bless you," cries the father, as he grasps his son's hand, "keep a brave heart." "Be good my child" says the mother, between her kisses, "always love us." Simple and homely words, said over ten thousand times, in every human language, since before the hour when Isaac blessed his son, and sent him away to Padan-aram; but they serve us still. Better than special maxims, better than elaborate details, better than scientific disquisitions. Courage and aspiration and love are talisman enough. He who keeps hold of them will find a safe, and even a victorious path through this vast, tangled, invincible seeming world.

I do not dare to hope that what I may say to you this evening can approach in power or pathos words spoken in such a crisis; but I do wish at least, that it may be like them in simplicity and seriousness. This, too, must be a grave and touching moment to those who date from it their entrance into their life's chosen work, who reckon from it the close of their exclusive period of preparation—the beginning of their independent practice, the handling of what they have learned. And to us who look back now, through an experience of years, to the time when we first trod these paths, the recollection of our own ignorance, of our own mistakes, of our own shortsightedness, comes stirring us to a warmer interest, a keener wish, that these others might escape our errors. Yet what can we say? We can only fall back on the simple primitive counsels that hold so much. We turn, as the father and mother do, to the homely old words that enclose the kernel of all. We cannot give you a detailed chart of your way. Each new generation finds a new set of difficulties; each new position brings its peculiar demands. Our guide book, which we printed day by day as we came along, is already out of date—superfluous to the young pioneers who intend to explore their own route. No matter. The root of all our mistakes we see at last to be one, and the remedy one also; and this so open, so plain, so palpable, that we cannot make it seem, when we put it in words, in the least original or profound. Has it not been said already a thousand times? Nevertheless, we will say it once more. The condensed sum and substance of all such counsel, such warning, such encouragement as one longs to give in an hour like this, is—be real.

To be real is much more than to be sincere. People may be, people are, sincere enough in all sorts of unrealities, in all sorts of illusions, and the more sincere they are in them, so much the more fatal the result. They are sincere enough in all manner of illusions respecting themselves and their capacities, respecting other people and their relations to them; respecting this world and other worlds.

To be real is to stand on what is, to see what is, to work with what is, to use what is—to live, move, and have our being in reality. And all our failures and impotences and mischiefs spring out of, and extend so far as, we are not thus rooted and grounded; so far as we try to work with, and work upon what does not exist; so far as we try to handle faculties that are not ours; so far as we take notions for things.

We ministers share, first of all, in the commonplace illusions which beset everybody. We are haunted by our own spectre magnified through the morning mist. This imposing gigantic form confronting us, in whom all our ordinary motions and movements seem large, heroic, impressive—this is ourself. Our vague imaginings, our appreciations of what is admirable, our longings, our power of following,—in the sanguine prime of youth, in the exhilaration of its mountain air, seem solid to us, seem actual power, and, in our inexperience, we take the usual and ordinary for the extraordinary and majestic. We take the spectre for the man. Our imperfect attainments look like scholarship, our crude solutions of the problems that vex the mind of man look like philosophy, our declamation looks like eloquence. Alas! the sun rises, and the immense projection of ourselves vanishes with the mist on which it was thrown. We are not the poets, the metaphysicians, the scholars we fancied. We are just ordinary men with limited knowledge, limited power. We can reach our arm's length; no more. Never mind; with that arm you can lift, reach, pull, at least. With that spectral arm—wide as was its apparent sweep, and dignified as was its apparent motion, you could not have lifted a feather. Our effectiveness begins just where we find our limits. And the sad side of it is, not that our powers are small and feeble, but that such as they are, we never find them out and handle them, but are always trying to use those which do not belong to us—to be what we are not. We get out of our depth. We affect an originality, a profoundness, a breadth, a learning not properly our own. Are all scholars then? Are all metaphysicians? Are all critics? Are all men of genius? By no means; nor is it necessary. We each have some power of seeing, some power of acting, some power of influencing, and to lay hold of these, to work with them in our own vocation is the secret of all human wisdom and success. Sincerity, independence, perseverance, these are nothing to any man; they do but land him deeper in the mire, unless he is really working from himself, upon his own line, with his proper faculties.

But there are, further, special unrealities presented to us by our profession itself. I do not wish to be understood as saying that our profession is exceptional in this. The law presents unrealities. Medicine presents unrealities. Politics present unrealities. Business, and so-called practical life, present unrealities, sometimes it seems as if they presented most of all. In all departments we but slowly disengage ourselves from the imperfect report our senses first make to us, and the mistaken inferences drawn therefrom. But here, to-night, we are concerned with those which grow out of our own calling.

We find ourselves embarrassed by the unreal theories which have accumulated along the path of the soul, by the unreal functions attributed to us, by the unreal nature of many of our implements. I know very well that we suppose we have extricated ourselves from the theological debris of the past; but in truth the man who is occupied with refuting theological unrealities is as much encumbered by them as he who is occupied in maintaining them. Only consider how much of our reading, thinking, preaching is about notions, theories, speculations, matters which, if you cease to look at them, have no longer any existence. It is trying to generate fictitious interests, to induce fictitious emotions. It is trying to build on a hypothesis—to balance ourselves on an "if." And this puts us at an immense disadvantage in a world whose actual forces are in manifest operation, whose keen interests crowd and jostle and contend with one another for the body and the mind of man; where vivid emotions press in upon the heart, and drive us this way and that; where things and the desires and impressions they excite are so terribly real. We are like a man blowing his bellows in the face of the wind. What we say seems thin, remote, vague, abstract, and I am afraid it often is so. People give us credit for learning, for depth, for philosophy; but, after all, they find us dry. They are conscious of the wrench they must give their minds to bring them into a state of attention, and of the ease with which they slip back again into a less strained attitude. They feel, that we are moving in an artificial world, a theological world, or a metaphysical world, in which they are not at home; where the landmarks are all unfamiliar, where human beings look somewhat phantasmal, and their relations unreal.

What is this world we are too apt to dwell in as ministers? A world of books, of study, of hypotheses, of hypotheses about man, of hypotheses about God, hypotheses about their relations and its consequences, of dogmas which repose on conceptions of the universe now impossible to us, of critical interpretations, of historical researches, of fine distinctions, of metaphysical explanations.

What is this world we actually live in as men? A world of sense, of passion, of emotion; a world where things count for nearly all, and theories about things count for very little; where dispositions are of vastly more consequence than opinions; a world of concrete forces, not of abstract notions. This world includes the other, and how much besides. It is in this world that our business lies, with these living, breathing, fellow-creatures; not with simulacra or propositions. And our erudition, our critical ingenuity, our metaphysical acuteness, our doctrinal discrimination do not necessarily help us here any more than they help an artist or a poet in his work. In truth they may hinder us when we take them for our principal and proper business. They are good as gymnastic apparatus, as training, as mental practice; good so far as we get results of wider acquaintance with the ways of the human spirit through them; good so far as we learn to distinguish more clearly, and reason more accurately through them; but to bring them out, raw and crude, as the implements of spiritual culture—it is as if the farmer, instead of sowing his fields in March, should go forth and swing his dumbbells over them! His feats might indeed be of the most astonishing and graceful kind; nevertheless to get his seed into the ground, though in the rudest and most ordinary fashion, would tell more upon the harvest in September.

These speculative puzzles, these theological problems, about which we vex our souls, do not agitate so many as we think. The intellectual unrest of our age is, no doubt, comparatively widespread, but it is only active in a limited circle. It does not torment the mass of our fellow-creatures very profoundly. They turn it over to a leisure hour, and, not caring much about the problem, how should they care much about the solution? "Well, but let us show them the problem, and point out to them how important it is." Ah, no! Think how many problems experience thrusts upon them to solve, and insists imperatively on some sort of solution. How to get a living? How to make their life fairly useful and worthy? How to steer through the complicated, and often perplexed, relations with others? How to reconcile their contradictory desires? How to get some sweetness and satisfaction out of this tangled experience? Think how worried, harassed, anxious, uncertain, how easily tempted, how unequal apparently to the conditions of their task! What do they want most? Light; but light on their path, not on some remote corner of space. They, too, have their illusions. They are constantly taking the small for the great, and the great for the small. They, too, are taking shadows for substances. Help them to distinguish. Show them over and over again the things they will certainly find to be true. Help them to see and recognise the irresistible forces that shape or crush all things. You need not go searching height or depth for them (though they pervade height and depth also), still less need you draw them out of syllogisms or intuitions. They are here—lodged in experience. Help them to discriminate between the base and the noble, between the trivial and the worthy. Amid the cross purposes that fill their lives, the mingled discord of desires, impulses, motives that distract them, let them feel your voice as a constant reinforcement of their best self. Help, establish their wavering will. Help them to know and love goodness.

One becomes very indifferent to theories when thus dealing with things. Unity or Trinity: which is the correct formula for God? We scrutinise the text, we study the Fathers, we prove, and we disprove. Unity or Trinity, does it matter which so long as we do not know that awful presence interposed through all, that other than ourself who is yet best known in ourself—the Unnameable? If we know Him, does it matter which?

But is this mysterious being a Person? Prove on this side that he is, prove on that side that he cannot be, what does it matter? If you can feel that ineffable Presence, you can afford to postpone discussions about his Personality, and no discussions will help you to feel Him!

But is man a dual being, soul and body? And is man immortal? Now the tide of speculation runs this way, now that. Ah! if man does not realise that he is a spiritual power now; if he does not see that what we call matter, is on its other side spirit—of what use to him are fine theories respecting the origin and destiny of some unknown quantity he calls a soul? Help him to recognise his soul—his inward, truest, best self. Help him to possess it, to act from it. Then he can wait with patience for a few years to solve the great question of immortality. Rather, with that eternal life abiding in him, he will feel his union with it too profoundly to distress himself about the question.

But is Christianity natural or supernatural? And how, in an age like this, are we to defend the faith once delivered to the saints? By exemplifying it—by applying it. So long as you do not so present it as to engage men's hearts, and win them to its practice, it is not of the slightest consequence whether you call it natural or supernatural. And if you can prevail on them to apply it, it will do them just as much good whichever they call it.

But how shall we act upon other men unless we can bring them first to accept, at least, some preliminary theories of nature and life? Friends, behind all theories stands a man—stands a common nature. That is what we want to find; that is what we want to address. And it is very much alike in all men—orthodox and heterodox, Christian and secularist, theist and atheist. There is no theory so poor and shallow but that it is capable of being pushed into some vital fruit. There is no theory so sound and accurate but that it will stifle you if you shut yourself up in it. Let the theory alone, and reach the man.

I have often heard the counsel given to young ministers that they should consider their office, its solemn responsibilities and claims upon them, its gravity, its dignity; and from one point of view this is just. Yet I would rather say, do not think much about your office. There is imminent danger that in the sincerest way you will come thus to be acting a part—a good part, perhaps; a useful part, perhaps—but still not quite simple, not quite real. But think much about the actual world around; about the actual conditions under which you must work; about the real ends you are working for. Hold them clearly and firmly before you, and you will not fail in sufficient incentives to earnestness, diligence, and sobriety.

Happily we have fallen here not only on the true method of our work, but on that also which will give it ease and zest. One easily exhausts all the changes possible on a set of propositions, but the suggestions of life are inexhaustible. A learned man—a doctor of divinity and head of a university—once assured a friend of mine that the entire Bible contained precisely 347 subjects for sermons, no more. I have never tried to verify this, though I believe, indeed, that the number of subjects for sermons the Bible contains is limited only by the capacity of the mind for receiving suggestions from it. But I am sure of this—every fresh observation, every struggle, every temptation, every hope, every juncture of circumstances, every interlocking of human relations affords endless suggestion for sermons. Our weariness and ennui, our emptiness, come just from our working, or attempting to work, with unrealities. Nothing is so fatiguing as to toss one's arms about in a vacuum. Why? There is no resistance there. That is precisely the reason. There is no resistance, therefore no reaction, no support. But when we work with realities we are in a medium that supports us. There is some pleasure, some satisfaction in dealing with real difficulties, real obstacles, even with real opposition. But what is discouraging and ruinous is to be always fighting phantoms that swarm back upon you just when you thought them laid.

All day long they have been hacked and hewed,
But all at night return to Odin's hall woundless and fresh.

We work too much in a vacuum. We work too much in a professional, artificial, fictitious realm. So but a few can care for what we do; so we are left alone; so we fail to rouse, about equally, interest or opposition. Our adversaries, our weapons, are alike unreal; therefore we are exhausted. Nothing seems to have freshness or purpose. We are tired of accomplishing nothing. Well, the remedy is ever in his own hands, who will use it. If we worked with real forces, if we accomplished something, we should not be so tired. Refreshment, variety, joy would visit us. We should not need to rack our brains for far-fetched, striking, paradoxical things. The simple and straightforward would serve our purpose. We should be striking enough by simply being accurate, original enough by being true, effective enough by being in contact with the actual. We should no longer be of those who "walk in a vain show, and disquiet themselves in vain." We should grasp substance. We should run and not be weary, walk and not faint.

Endeavour thus to live, these rules regard,
These helps solicit, and a steadfast seat
Shall then be yours among the happy few
Who dwell on earth, yet breathe ethereal air:
Sons of the morning!

Distribution of Prizes, &c.

On Thursday afternoon there was a large attendance in the library to witness the distribution of prizes. The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL presided.

The CHAIRMAN said it was exactly twenty-five years ago since he first came down as a representative of the Board. And as he looked around him he saw some almost as old as himself, whom then he had examined for admission to the College. Among the men that would ever be remembered with veneration in connection with that College were Dr. Lloyd, Mr. Davies, of Panteg, and Dr. Davison. It was a matter of more than ordinary satisfaction to himself that he had been privileged to take part in the appointment of all the Professors now connected with the College. He was secretary to the Board at the time the late venerated Stephenson Hunter was appointed, and he had partly been the means of inducing his friend Dr. Vance Smith to accept the post he held at present, to which he brought a reputation of which any man might be proud.

Dr. VANCE SMITH said they had carefully gone over the work done during the session, and the prizes had been distributed according to diligence, to work and attendance, as well as the results of the examination.

The CHAIRMAN then distributed the prizes as follows:—

Fourth Year.—J. C. Thomas, first prize, £3; J. Davies and W. Parry, equal for the second prize, £1 and books; W. Powell, books; D. Williams, general diligence, books.

Third Year.—Esau Jones, first prize, £3; W. Thomas, second prize, £2; John T. Davies, Evan T. Jenkins, John Richards, W. H. Williams, John Hughes, and W. R. Williams, books.

Second Year.—Josiah Jones, first prize, £3; F. W. Morgan and D. Williams, equal for second prize, £1 each; Idrys Jones, Howell Lewis, Howell Powell, David Morgan, and John Evans, books.

First Year.—D. Jones, first prize, £3; T. Rees Williams, second prize, £2; J. Darwood, special mention; T. Evans, Evan I. Thomas, and T. Miles Evans, books.

Mr. J. C. A. SCOTT referred to the competitions for the Berman scholarships. On this occasion there were three candidates for the Berman scholarships, William Jones, from Llandysul Grammar School, and David Jones and Evan Davies, both from Towyn Grammar School, and with Dr. Vance Smith's permission they had been admitted into the College. He might say that William Joseph stands first, having 837 marks; David Jones was next, with 702 marks; and Evan Davis had 457 marks. He should recommend that each be awarded a scholarship of £25 a year for two years.

Mr. N. M. TAYLER said he had been better pleased with the examinations than he expected; he should be able to carry back a tolerably good report.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING pleaded with the students not to throw away their Hebrew Bibles when they left college, and when in college that they should not leave college work undone whilst going in for other examinations. He argued that they would be more able to influence men if they studied the ancient classics, languages, and the humanities, than if they studied science alone.

Dr. VANCE SMITH, in awarding the Sharpe prizes, said the answers were given very fully. But they had little difficulty in judging as to merits of the papers. There was a sum of £10 given by Samuel Sharpe, Esq., of London, and this was divided into three prizes. The first prize of £4 was awarded to J. T. Thomas, and the remaining £6 was divided equally between John Davies and Thomas Parry.

The Rev. KILSBY JONES, who was received with loud cheers, urged upon the Presbyterian Board, the Principal of the institution, and the professors, the necessity of making the English language a leading branch of study here, for Welshmen had now discovered that English was the language of white bread, of roast beef, and of a great literature.

The proceedings closed with prayer by the Rev. T. DAVIES, of Carmarthen.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. J. C. Lunn has accepted a unanimous invitation from the Unitarian congregation at Loughborough to become their minister.

BLACKPOOL.—The Unitarian Free Church here, having been transferred from the Missionary Conference to the East Lancashire Mission, the Rev. A. B. Camm has received a very hearty and unanimous invitation from the church and congregation to become the minister, and has accepted the same. Mr. Camm began his duties last Sunday, and preached to good congregations. In the morning the discourse was founded on the words, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in Thy likeness," and the preacher showed that there was a divine discontent in the minds of the progressive spirits in every age; not finding their heaven in the actual and realised, they aspired after the ideal and unseen. Reference was made to the letters that had appeared in the Christian World from young ministers who were outgrowing the dogmas they were pledged to preach, and the correspondence read like a ministers' "agony column." Mr. Camm expressed a wish that many who linger in the churches that have ceased to be a spiritual house could feel that Unitarianism is a sphere of freedom with no creed, an elastic organisation, and a broad basis of communion for fellowship in worship and work.

THE SHEPHERD'S SABBATH SONG.

(From the German of Ludwig Uhland. Translated by J. T. M.)

God's Sabbath day has come ;
I am alone in pastures wide,
One morning bell—and all beside Afar and near is dumb.

To Him I bend the knee ;
O sweet alarm, and secret thrill—
How many are there here that kneel,
Unseen, and pray with me !

Near and afar, the dome
Of sky is clear and bright above,
As if 'twould open wide with love;
God's Sabbath day has come.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND FREE THEOLOGICAL TEACHING.

BUT for the intrinsic gravity of the subject, the reply of the President of the Privy Council to the recent deputation which waited on him from Manchester New College, would be highly provocative of hilarity. There is an almost irresistible drollery in the absolute ignorance of the question which was displayed by the Duke of RICHMOND and GORDON. It was a veritable Chinese puzzle to his Grace; and he evidently regarded his interviewers in the light of unaccountable mystics, or denizens of some asylum from which their keepers had unfortunately allowed them a temporary escape. Had they proposed to lay before him some question within the range of his mental activities, such as the application of a new agricultural agent, he might have credited them with a certain degree of common-sense, and their arguments would have found access, more or less rapidly, to his ducal mind. It may be supposed, too, that his unacquaintance with the personnel of the deputation was on a par with his indifference to the prayer of their memorial. He would readily have recognised the names of the successful horses for the last twenty years at Goodwood; but, to him, "Martineau" and "Beard" and "Drummond" were vox et preterea nihil. That he should be impatient in listening and curt in reply was not, under these conditions, much to be marvelled at. But in the interests of free learning and of scientific truth it is indeed to be regretted that by the mere accident of his office, so vital a question should necessarily fall into his unfamiliar, not to say incompetent hands. It was perhaps to be expected that he should refer to Dr. Martineau as "the gentleman who spoke first," and that he should be utterly unable to understand what was meant "by the professor of theology summing up as a judge before a jury of students." We trust, however, that the ill-success of this wise and consistent effort on the part of Manchester New College will not be taken too much to heart by its promoters. It is much to be regretted that considerations pertaining to the proposed charter for Owens College have been mixed up with the very important question at issue. We earnestly hope that ere long a university may be established in Manchester, as we believe an enormous stimulus would thus be given to the higher education of this district and of the North of England. But altogether apart from this, it was surely a natural development,—a step along the line of the grand traditions of untrammelled research and unprejudiced teaching and learning—that a representative institution like Manchester New College should seek to extend the application of its most honourable and characteristic principle. Either theology is, or it is not, worthy the name of a science. If it is, how can the claim be gainsayed that it should be expounded by teachers unpledged to anything beyond fidelity to their own convictions, and be studied by learners uncommitted to any conclusions but such as are supported by adequate evidence? If, in lecturing on geology, truth be the only good of teacher and pupil, why should not languages, chronology, ethnology, and every branch of inquiry that bears on the science of religion, be allowed the same free course, and be pursued under the conditions regarded as essential in the pursuit of other departments of knowledge? There is, in fact, no tenable argument against a principle so manifestly sound and just. It may require prolonged agitation to command due respect for it from prejudiced or ducal minds; but it will eventually win a triumphant, if tardy, recognition from a sagacious and instructed people.

DR. VANCE SMITH ON THE SECOND ADVENT AND THE CHURCH QUESTION.

THE current number of the Nineteenth Century contains an article by Dr. VANCE SMITH on the Second Advent and the Church Question. On the expressions of the New Testament touching the expectation that CHRIST would come again, Dr. VANCE SMITH says: "No fair interpretation of such language can make it mean anything else but a visible return within no distant period to assume the office of the Messianic King. The efforts of some expounders to put into such words the destruction of Jerusalem, or the outpouring of the Spirit, or the future triumphs of the Gospel, could not be tolerated except in obedience to the dictation of an established orthodoxy."

While observing that the characteristic and wide-spread belief respecting the Second Coming held by the early Church, and by the New Testament writers in particular, has not been fulfilled, Dr. SMITH sees in the Messianic idea, both in its growth and at its height, "an element of great power. Thus may we understand," he says, "that the old Messianic idea, while it was destined in one sense to fall into oblivion and be no more, was yet capable of being the temporary vehicle, the efficient medium, by which much of the highest spiritual teaching should be published among men and conveyed to distant ages. It lent a vast motive power to the words of CHRIST. It has been the means of preserving for the world his high Example, and his admirable thoughts respecting God's relation to man and man's relation to God, respecting the divine will and human duty, and the providential care and goodness of the Heavenly Father. The substance of CHRIST's teaching, thus transmitted to our times and made the permanent possession of multitudes, may be summed up in two words—the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man. These, therefore, we may hold fast, even while we dismiss from our thoughts much besides. And clinging to these, the primitive and permanent in the Christianity of Christ, we are CHRISTIANS in the only sense in which the name is worth retaining. And happy shall it be for the cause of Truth and Right, and for the world at large, when all Christian men shall at length rise up to the practical acceptance of these great ideas, and shall have learnt at last truly to put on the grace and beauty of the Christlike character."

Dr. SMITH's more immediate purpose, in the present essay, is to unfold the argument urged by Professor JOWETT in his Epistles of St. Paul, that such expectations of a second advent as were held by the writers of the New Testament were "inconsistent with an established ecclesiastical order. A succession of bishops could have no meaning in a world that was to vanish away." What is called the CHURCH, in its organised development, was a kind of after-thought, worked out in the course of time, by post-apostolic men. It is no disparagement to the Church to point out that its origin was of this almost accidental character; but it is important, in view of questions of present interest, to observe "how largely Erastian in their beginnings were the great Christian Churches which now exist in the world." The practical conclusion to which we are led is that "what has been done in past times, and by our ordinary human methods of proceeding, in the way of founding, reforming, and regulating the Church, may properly be done again and now, so far as required." The essay is, in fact, a refutation of the claim to a divine right on behalf of the Church. No basis for such a claim can be found in that primitive Society which lived in almost daily expectation of the end of the world. The subsequent history of Church legislation, particularly in England, was the action not of the Church by itself, but of the nation through its representatives.

The national or political power, therefore, is but exercising its legitimate privilege in regulating and controlling ecclesiastical arrangements and institutions as it may deem best for the interest of the whole nation and the promotion of national unity, peace, and religion. But Dr. VANCE SMITH does not stop here. His final aim is to render possible the adaptation of the Church to the wants of the people at the present day, so that it might be fitted to include the great mass of the population. He looks for something better than disestablishment. He thinks that one great and comprehensive Church, organised by the nation itself, "would be a better and a grander thing than a multitude of sects separately organised, sometimes meanly administered, too frequently in want of money, and perpetually competing with one another for popular favour." Once adandon the idea of Divine Right, and the question of comprehension is open. "A united and common national Establishment for all might be within our reach."

We would only point out here that comprehension of diverse churches under one system of State support would not fulfil the idea of one great Church; while, on the other hand, to realise the idea of one great Church, so long as diversity of belief exists, would mean the carrying out of the principle of the Leicester Conference. After the summary rejection of that principle by a body that might seem to have been so specially prepared for it by circumstances, old and new, as the Congregational Union, what is to be expected of the straiter sects of our British Christianity? If the Congregationalist would cease from his sectional union, the Methodist from his conference, and the Episcopalian from his convocation, and if they and others, as the people of England, should determine to carry out their religious arrangements through the ordinary channels of national action, then certainly a truly National Church would be possible. The moment they were ready for this, a National Church would, in effect, already exist. But that moment is not yet. The vision, we may venture to prophesy, will be a vision for many days.

But Dr. VANCE SMITH's thoughtful essay, in all its parts, will be read and pondered by a wide circle of readers of all types of opinion, among whom its unprejudiced reasoning will have an influence for good, and may do not a little to hasten the coming of a day of better things.

CHURCHES BY THE SEA.

WE publish to-day a report of the meeting held at Scarborough, on Tuesday, to welcome the Rev. DENDY AGATE as the minister of Westborough Chapel. It may fitly serve as suggestive of some words on the importance to the cause of liberal religion of the churches of which the new church at Scarborough is the latest and one of the best specimens—churches by the sea. The thoughtful listener to the proceedings of a meeting like that of Tuesday may find in what he hears proof of a determination on the part of the friends of liberal and real religion to adapt any congregational system to which they have been accustomed to the changing needs of a time of great changes, when to be indifferent to the changes which are going on, and slow to recognise the duties involved in them, is to condemn ourselves to a place in the rear of the great rush which characterises our movement now. Everybody goes to the sea, for days or weeks. Many people live at the sea-side, and run in by train to business, and the consequence is that a dispersion of our churches is constantly going on. Settled and well-organised congregations find first one family and then another retiring from them, and settling where health may be found, till, as it has been in some of our large towns, by the mere shifting of population, congregations disappear, and our duty of providing for them in fresh quarters becomes pressing. That it is a pressing duty—a duty of the self-preserving kind—is what we wish to urge on our readers just now. We must provide for the spiritual views of the refugees from our town congregations, or we certainly shall lose them as members of our liberal churches. How is it, we would ask our readers to consider—how is it that the net result of all our mission work of every kind seems to be so small?—that course of lectures succeeds to course of lectures, and campaign against the enemies of free thought in religion to campaign, and yet, in the end, the number of adherents of the free churches remains very much the same that it has been for the last fifty years? It is that the gains made by argument and example are lost by neglect. We are fairly skilled in catching, but ignorant of the art of keeping adherents to our cause. If this should be thought to be too strong a statement, let it be said that we are but just awaking to the necessity that there is for making houses of faith for those who join our religious families. It was not a compliment which was paid to the young ladies of a certain society when they were described as skilful in making nets, but bad at making cages. We can pass the compliment, such as it is, to some of our societies, and apply it to ourselves. It is a method of retention that we need to seek now more even than plans for securing converts to our views. And, when we come to study the secret of our losses, do we not find—does not every minister of a town congregation know, by an experience which is at least to him a sad one—that it is for want of churches by the sea, like that which our Scarborough friends have founded, that much of our loss of numbers comes?

How often is a minister of a Manchester, or Leeds, or Sheffield church obliged to tell himself some such tale as this: A family, on which he has learned to depend for help in all his congregational affairs, for attendance, and advice, and help in the congregational work, is obliged, by the failure of health of some of its members, to take a house at the sea-side. They have no intention of turning their back on their old faith and practice; but gradually, and in consequence of the very qualities which had made them useful members of a congregation, they are led to do so. They have learned to depend on attendance on public worship, and as Sunday comes round they go to church or chapel, and gradually become accustomed to the creeds and the opinions from which they once shrank away. They have been taught that they ought to work for others, to visit the sick and help the poor; but at the sea-side they find that, except as members of some organisation, they cannot carry on the work. The clergyman is glad to enlist them as teachers in his Sunday school, or the Independent minister welcomes them to his class. They find themselves much at home with those whose ways and thoughts once seemed strange to them: now it is the church of liberal thought which has grown to seem strange and unwelcome like. They were lost to its cause. It is in view of facts of this kind that it has at last been learned that some of our best and truest work may be done, not in the manufacturing town and comely village, but at the sea-side, that energy has to "flit" with "flitting" families, and that churches must be founded in the new centres to which the needs of health and recreation attract so many people now. The success of our church at Southport—a success which was manifest at the beginning of the attempt, and which has known no check—should encourage those who are founding churches at Scarborough and at Blackpool now.

At Southport the Portland-street Chapel has become the spiritual home of many who, if no chapel had been built in Southport, would have fallen away into Methodism or Churchism, leaving the church of their early years. It would not be far wrong, too, to say that by a single sea-side church, with its attraction for those who belong to orthodox churches, who if they were at home would never enter its doors, but at the sea-side, in the general detachment from old habits, venture "just to see what this Unitarianism is like," more converts to our cause are made than we count on as the fruits of many mission centres and long and frequent lecture courses.

We commend these thoughts about the work of our sea-side churches to our readers, adding by way of practical suggestion, that if it be true that it is of importance to our cause that churches like those of Scarborough, Blackpool, and Southport should be in existence, then it becomes a clear duty of all of us to forward their work so far as we can, by attending their services when we visit the sea-side resorts in which they are found, by contributing to their funds gifts which shall in some handsome way represent our estimate of the importance to our cause of the work which they undertake. It is no less than a work of gathering some of our sheep, who, without them, would surely be lost in the large folds of our orthodox rivals.

A JEWISH CONFERENCE.

OUR contemporary, the Jewish World, announces that during the month of August a conference will meet at Paris, at which representatives of the most important Jewish societies in Europe will be present. Convened by the Alliance Israelite Universelle, the aims of this conference will be the improvement of the condition of the Jews all over the known world, and the debates which will take place will most probably be extremely interesting and valuable. The object will be not only the domestic amelioration of the lot of the Jews living in uncivilised States, but also legislative reform in such countries as Spain, Sweden, Norway, and Eastern Europe, where the Statute Books are still disgraced by illiberal laws. It must be remembered that in agitating for such repeal, the Conference will only ask that the Jew shall be recognised as a man like his fellows, with an equal right, as VOLTAIRE has observed, à la liberté, à la protection des lois et à la propriété des biens. The Jewish World says that "the Conference, if well attended, will be able to effect much good. The extension of the Alliance and its educational establishments will undoubtedly be very beneficial, and we are glad to see that the improvement of the condition of the Eastern Jews by means of agricultural and industrial employment will also be discussed. . . . It is interesting to observe that statistical questions will receive some attention, and we must say that altogether not only do we anticipate much substantial benefit to the Jewish community from this conference, but we hope to receive from its deliberations information of an enduring value."

I do not see what a nation loses in reputation or in safety by keeping its conduct in its own power.—Burke.

Truth is the most powerful thing in the world, since fiction can only please by its resemblance to it.—Shaftesbury.

"Thou shalt not get found out" is not one of God's commandments, and no man can be saved by trying to keep it.—Leonard Bacon.

No author can foresee the influence his works will have, either for good or for evil, for they excite every species of mind, and kindle the inflammable.—Richter.

There is a species of cactus, from whose outer bark, if torn by an ignorant person, exudes a poisonous liquid; but the natives, who know the plant, strike to the core, and there find a sweet refreshing juice that renews their strength.—Margaret Fuller.

Be up and doing, fill up every hour, leaving no crevice of craving for a remorse or a repentance to creep through afterwards. Let not the mind brood on self; save it from speculation, from those stagnant moments in which the awful teachings of the Spirit grope into the unfathomable unknown, and the heart torments itself with questions which are insoluble except to an active life. For the awful future becomes intelligible only in the light of a felt and active present.—F. W. Robertson.

When you happen to be ruffled and put out of humour by any cross accident, retire immediately into your reason, and do not suffer your passion to overrule you a moment; for the sooner you recover yourself now, the better you will be able to guard yourself for the future.—Defoe.

Any increase of the sum of our enjoyments almost invariably produces a wish to communicate them. An over-indulged human being is ruined by being taught to think of nobody but himself, but a human being, at once gratified and made to think of others, learns to add to his very pleasures in the act of diminishing them.—Leigh Hunt.

It is told of Brutus, that when he fell on his sword, after the battle of Philippi, he quoted a line of Euripides: "O virtue! I have followed thee through life, and I find thee at last but a shade." I doubt not the hero is slandered by this report. The heroic soul does not sell its justice and its nobleness. It does not ask to dine nicely, and to sleep warm. The essence of greatness is the perception that virtue is enough. Poverty is its ornament. It does not need plenty, and can very well abide its loss.—Emerson.

As a king of Bactria, so runs the Eastern story, was pursuing the chase one day, he felt hungry, and sat down to eat. And while he was eating, a bee came, seized a morsel of bread, and flew slowly away with it. Wondering thereat, the king followed the bee, which led him to where sat on a bough a sparrow blind of both eyes, which opened its beak wide so soon as it heard the bee's humming. And the bee broke the bread into three pieces, fed the bird with them, and then flew away. When the king saw this wondrous work of God, he renounced all earthly ties, and gave himself up to the All-true.—Indian Mirror.

THE BEARD MEMORIAL UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Beard Memorial Union was held on Thursday evening, July 4th, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., in the chair. The hall was filled in every part.

Mr. W. C. BOWIE (hon. secretary) read the report for the year, which stated that the Union had been in existence 14 months, and its success had been greater than many of its most ardent promoters anticipated. At the meeting held in July, 1877, there were 77 members on the roll who had subscribed, or who had promised subscriptions. Seventeen new members have been added during the year; and on the whole they had been very successful. The committee hoped that members will endeavour to inform their friends respecting its true nature and object. Its position in Manchester is unique; there is no other association formed on its basis. Its aim is to become a kind of Social Union, in which ministers, students, lady and gentlemen members, those who belong to any church or no church, may meet and discuss questions relating to all that concerns intellectual, moral, social, and spiritual welfare.

Mr. E. GOLLAND (hon. treasurer) stated that the balance sheet showed excess of expenditure of £1. 1s. 11d. over the income.

On the motion of Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON, seconded by Mr. WILLIAM ROSS, the report and balance sheet were adopted.

On the motion of Mr. JOHN THOMAS, the officers were appointed.

Rev. HAROLD RYLETT moved, and E. C. HARDING, Esq., seconded, the following resolution: "That the Beard Memorial Union profoundly regrets that its first annual meeting should be saddened by the absence of one of its honorary vice presidents—the Rev. T. E. Poynting—whose warm sympathy contributed so largely to the establishment of the Union, and who, by the catholicity of his spirit and the richness of his intellect, assisted so much to realise the primary object of the Union, and by the simplicity and truthfulness of his personal character, served to encourage the young and sustain the old in the arduous work of living noble lives." The resolution was adopted, and it was ordered to be forwarded to Mrs. Poynting.

At the instance of Rev. J. BLACK, M.A., a vote of thanks was given to the trustees of the Memorial Hall for their kindness in allowing the Union to meet in the building.

The Rev. WM. GASKELL, M.A. (president), occupied the remainder of the evening with "A Talk upon the Lancashire Dialect." He rapidly traced the origin of the dialect, showing its relation to the primitive stock of languages, and illustrating the different points by examples taken from various writings and from the ordinary talk of Lancashire people. He told many amusing anecdotes derived from his own experience and from his wide acquaintance with the writers of the district, from whom he read several extracts. The audience seemed quite delighted with the treat provided for them by the president.

On the motion of Rev. G. RIDE, seconded by Mr. HOLLAND, a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Gaskell.

At the close of the meeting several new members joined the Union.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

This Conference was continued on Thursday and Friday last, the Rev. HENRY WILLIAMSON in the chair.

The following resolution, moved by the Rev. J. C. STREET, and seconded by the Rev. A. CHALMERS, was passed unanimously:—"That we deplore the loss which the Conference has sustained during the past year in the deaths of the Revs. T. E. Poynting and F. Ashton. The former had been actively associated with the Conference from the date of its establishment, and had largely contributed to its usefulness by his wise, reverent, and judicious counsels; and the latter had recently identified himself with it, and given evidence of being a valuable co-worker in its operations. That we record our deep sense of the beauty and religious sweetness of their lives, and our gratitude to Almighty God for having raised up among us men whose example is our inspiration, and whose memory will survive to enrich and bless our churches. In the remembrance that they have passed on to the more immediate presence of the infinite and loving God, we would go forth in their spirit to the duty which lies before us."

A novel feature in the Conference was the admission of a lady, for the first time, to membership. This was Mrs. Caroline A. Soule, Universalist evangelist, whose presence added no little to the interest and pleasantness of the meeting.

Mrs. SOULE, in response to a call from the President, said that she had to form a church in the town of Elizabeth, in New Jersey, which they in America called a foreign country because it was so much behind the times, for it was one of the most Conservative towns in New Jersey. In that town the Presbyterians were the aristocratic party, but the preaching was exceedingly narrow. It happened in 1877 that a few people became so dissatisfied with the narrow sermons to which they were obliged to listen that they determined to form themselves into a little association for the purpose of having broader preaching. There were only about 32 such persons in all to be found in the city, and amongst them there were Unitarians, Universalists and Broad Church, and one Swedenborgian, one Episcopalian, one Presbyterian, one Baptist. They called themselves the United Liberal Christian Association—they didn't pretend to be a church or parish, they simply wanted preaching and worship that didn't offend them. She had a small confession of faith or creed consisting of three little articles of agreement, which were drawn up to the effect that they all believed in one God and Father, and that they made the Bible the standard of their faith, and believed in the future life, and associated themselves for mutual worship. They had ministers from New York, and, she added, I went to preach regularly on Sunday evenings (according to request) in December; but I told them I could not afford to get up two sermons each week for what they paid me. They wished me to preach what would do them good, and I read them sermons of various preachers. I preached ethical sermons, the basis of which was Liberal Christianity. It was remarkable for New Jersey to have a woman coming to the town, and it was an equally dreadful thing to have this Liberal Christian Association in Elizabeth. One man met me as I came from the pulpit, and asked me if I had read what St. Paul said, and I said "Yes, shut up your Testament, I know what St. Paul meant better than you do." We had a great variety of opinion, but nevertheless, united ourselves socially and spiritually, and were all the better for these services. We sometimes met together afterwards to discuss the various points of difference, but always in a most Christian spirit. Mrs. Soule was therefore satisfied that there was a basis of religious fellowship, though perhaps it was difficult to find; but we should not find it until we could strip religion of those uncouth garments with which men had covered it, and array it in the seamless robe in which Christ arrayed it. Religion became simpler to her every day as she dressed it in the original words as they were given to us by Christ, and in them she felt that she should find a basis of religious thought.

The other new members were Revs. John Moore, English Crooks, Richard Pilcher, B.A., and William Mitchell. On behalf of the Conference, a cordial welcome was extended to them by Rev. J. McDowell.

The following officers were appointed for the ensuing year:—President, Rev. J. C. Lunn; Treasurer, Rev. E. W. Hopkinson; Secretary, Rev. J. G. Slater; Auditor, Mr. J. Phillips; Committee, Revs. J. Black, N. Green, J. McDowell, W. G. Cadman, and J. T. Marriott.

After a discussion on the question of continuing missionary operations, it was moved and carried "That the committee be desired to consider the advisability of undertaking fresh missionary operations in some suitable locality."

On Friday, after prayer by the Rev. J. C. Lunn, the President asked the Rev. WM. MELLOR to read a paper on "The Basis of Religious Fellowship," which will appear in an early number of the Herald.

A lively discussion followed, in which the speakers were Revs. J. C. Street, W. Mitchell, A. Chalmers, C. H. Osler, G. Ride, J. C. Lunn, and Mrs. Soule. Rev. Wm. Mellor was called on to reply, and then

Rev. JOHN CUCKSON read a paper on THEISM: THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL, Introduction.

The age in which we live is remarkable for its intellectual activity. In all branches of study, research was never more extensive in its scope, or more thorough in its processes. No department of thought is sheltered from fearless criticism. And in theology the time is passed, or is rapidly passing for respecting in argument or utterance dogmas which rest altogether upon tradition, or upon the mere assurance of privileged persons. Claims to infallibility of judgment are treated as idle presumptions, and the plea that certain subjects in no sense come within the province of reason, or are too sacred for inquiry, has lost its power over the more robust intellects of our time. It may be said that the 19th century has no respect for assumptions. Moreover, it is not contented with the discussion of what may be called secondary questions, but pushes its investigations beyond and probes to their very roots those primary truths upon which vast systems of religious doctrine have been built, as upon a sure foundation. Matters which once formed the subjects of serious controversy have sunk into utter insignificance and have ceased to possess any interest for vigorous minds, and if one thing more than another indicates the power and grasp of the modern intellect, it is the nature of the truths upon which it fastens its observation. Doctrines which once excited fierce debate are now spent forces, and subjects of deeper moment have taken their place. The trinity or unity of persons in the Godhead, the transubstantiation or consubstantiation of the body and blood of Christ in the bread and wine of the Eucharist; the fallibility or infallibility of scripture; these were the topics which engaged the attention of the best thinkers and scholars years ago. Now they are seldom noticed except by the small champions of sectarian orthodoxy or heresy. The intellectual conflicts of the present hour are waged without compromise over ideas and principles of far deeper value. They affect questions which involve the existence of religion. Science is questioning theology in a fashion which enforces attention and demands a reply. "Tell us truly," men say, "Do you know anything about God? Is there any evidence in physical nature, or in human history to establish the conviction that an intelligent and moral being lives in the one and directs the other? We do not want high-flown spiritualism, or low grovelling dogmatism on the subject, theology furnishes both in abundance; but give us some solid ground upon which we can stand and say, this is accurate, scientific, conclusive testimony to the soundness and reality of the fundamental truths of religion." These and similar questions are being presented with great force and skill, not merely by the metaphysician and the natural philosopher, but also by clear-headed and devout thinkers in the less cultivated ranks of society, and the theologian can no more dispute the right to put such questions than he can escape them when they are put to him; for if there is much of the scepticism of modern thought that is light and captious, there is much also that is grave and earnest. The former may be treated with indifference, but the latter is of a nature to command respect. It is the fashion just now to make logical apologies for the existence of religious truths, and the opinion is widely spread that the idea of God does not admit of being proved. Even theologians readily assent to this admission, deprecate argument in defence of this important truth, and imagine that in so doing they are taking steps to protect the faith. "But," says Professor Flint in the Baird Lecture for 1876, "True and weighty seem to me these words of one of the most distinguished of living German philosophers; 'the proofs for the existence of God coincide with the grounds for the belief in God; they are simply the real grounds of the belief established and expounded in a scientific manner. If there be no such proofs, there are also no such grounds; and a belief which has no ground, if possible at all, can be no proper belief, but an arbitrary, self-made, subjective opinion. Yes, religious belief must sink to the level of the mere illusion or fixed idea of a mind which is insane, if contradicted by all reality, all facts scientifically established and the theory of the universe which such facts support and justify.' It is surely a confession of weakness to assume or to allow it to be inferred, that religious ideas rest upon mere hypothesis, and not upon natural and ascertainable fact. The religious thinker eschews all hypothesis as scrupulously as the good man eschews evil. He is far from doing all his business on credit, from speculating on fictitious capital; he must have facts, good substantial facts, as the foundation of his beliefs. He does not undertake to manufacture truth, nor does he profess to have any means of discovering it which are not equally within the reach of every man who will but use his faculties to advantage. Theism is nothing more than a theory of the universe which answers to the facts of the universe so far as those facts are known. It is of necessity imperfect, and is for ever open to amendment, but it may be very true in substance notwithstanding, far truer even from the scientific standpoint than the materialistic theory, which some would substitute for it. We have neither the facts nor the faculties for the elaboration of a theory of the world and of life, which shall cover and explain all phenomena, answer every doubt, and allay every fear. The worlds of matter and of man are the data on which the theist reasons, and sensible of the vastness of the field of observation, and conscious of the limits of his own power, he is contented with that view of the universe which interprets the largest number of facts, and which at the same time best meets the intellectual and moral necessities of his own nature. The phenomena of life are the same to him as to the Atheist and to the Agnostic, the processes of investigation are similar, but the conclusions are different, and the thoughtful must judge as to the respective value of the conflicting theories.

It will be my object to present to you within the time allotted to me, such a view of the theistic argument as will serve to show the place it occupies in the controversies of our time. We will review the subject under the following heads:

1. The Design argument in support of Theism; the argument which is based on the essential properties and relations of things.
2. The Moral and Religious argument—the theistic reasoning which is established upon the recognition of a moral will in the universe, upon a distinct sense of moral accountability in man, and upon the existence and requirements of a religious sentiment.
3. The efficiency of Theism as an intellectual interpretation of the universe; as an authority in morals, as the basis of practical religion.

The Design Argument.

It is not necessary in addressing an audience such as I have the honour to speak to, to enter upon an examination of the relative worth of the different modes in which the arguments for the existence of God proceed. They are commonly of two kinds—the a priori and the a posteriori. The metaphysical or a priori argument rests on conclusions deduced from axioms and definitions, abstract relations, on premises arbitrarily assumed, and whatever cogency there may be in this method of reasoning, it is not that which appeals with most force to the popular mind, nor is it that which yields the deepest satisfaction. Indeed there is much truth in the couplet from Pope's Dunciad, which declares that he who takes

The high priori road
Will reason downward till he doubts of God.

The a posteriori or inductive method has the merit of being more easily apprehended and more conclusive, although it has been the fashion among metaphysicians to set little value upon it. In this argument everything depends upon our idea of the nature of things and of the relations in which they stand one to another. The universe may be defined as an organism with life and direction outside it, or as an organism with life and direction within. Whichever view be taken, it is first of all necessary that we should determine whether the organism, in its nature and properties, is wholly material, or whether it is in a sense dualistic, the form being material, the force being mental and moral. Here it seems to me lies the gist of the controversy between the two great schools of thought. Is the universe resolvable into physical atoms and their properties and all life into atomic motion? or is there behind the visible organism, the material bodies and forms of life an inherent force whose properties are intelligence and will? The idea that the universe is a vast machine upon which the inventor or contriver looks from a distance, and with which he is occasionally concerned has lost its hold upon thoughtful minds, but the other idea that the universe is an organism full of intellectual and moral energy is being held with ever-growing clearness and tenacity, and held too as science not less than as theology. Even science cannot dissociate mind from matter, or relinquish belief in a Reality which is not ourselves. It is compelled to recognise the existence and the action of energies entirely different from those classed as material. And the scientific theologian treads on secure ground when he asserts that the vital force which underlies all life is psychical and not molecular, and that a psychical force is the only force equal to the production and maintenance of the universe as we find it. On every hand investigation is bound to supplement the physical mechanism by the recognition of an inherent entity, which uses it. Physical phenomena are wholly inexplicable without it. The amusing story related by Professor Tyndall of a German peasant who in the early days was taken to see the performance of a locomotive, and puzzled to find the secret of its motion exclaimed, "Es müssen doch Pferde darin sein," "there must be horses inside," illustrates a deep-lying truth. More than one philosopher facing the great problem of the universe has ventured a conjecture quite as amusing. The force with which the peasant was most familiar was horse-power; the force with which not a few philosophers are best acquainted is molecular power, and to my mind the peasant's supposition that the locomotive was moved by a horse from the inside is quite as reasonable in its way as the supposition that an atom, or any combination of atoms is equal to the production and maintenance of the universe.

But beyond the recognition in nature and life of a Power which is not ourselves science does not go. Not a few of the foremost scientists are Agnostics. They start from the axiom that causes are unknowable, only effects being knowable, and they urge that whatever may be the nature of the vital force or the psychical principle there is no occasion for science to moot the question. The phenomena are alone cognisable; it is with them alone that science concerns itself, leaving to ontology the phantom-search after causes. Our search should not be after the unknown X, but its known functions. The validity of this reasoning rests entirely upon the soundness of its axiom that effects do not predicate causes. Is this true? If the ordinary methods of thought have any authority it cannot be, for in nearly all our intellectual and moral judgments, in the deductions of science and in our estimates of the nature of intellectual and moral things, we adopt an entirely different axiom. The man of science busied with research among material phenomena and ignoring entirely the unphenomenal in life, fails to find any cause at all, or postulates a cause in every respect akin to the phenomena which are supposed to be its effects. Devoted entirely to the pursuit of physical science, to the study of the earth's strata; of the combinations of the elements, or of the structure and action of muscular fibres and nerve cells, he finds no pulse of spiritual life and he interprets the connection of thought with nerve as an identity of thought and nerve. What is this but arguing the nature of a cause from the nature of its effects? The theologian does nothing more. The difference between the two lies here, that while the one develops an interest in things that lie at the base of existence, the other is concerned with the glorious things which are its crown and ornament. The conviction that the world had an intelligent author is as simple, direct and valid as that any statue, painting, or book had an intelligent author. But further, effects not only predicate the existence but the nature of causes. Our thoughts and actions are not merely the effects of a psychical power within us, but they are evidence also of the nature and properties of that power. How do we judge of the extent and quality of Shakespeare's genius except by a study of his immortal tragedies and comedies? How do we determine the character of inventive skill except by an examination of its productions? Consciously or unconsciously we are perpetually arguing from effects to causes. Are we not justified, then, in inferring from the order and adaptations which everywhere abound in the universe, from the nature of things, and from the intellectual relations in which they stand, the existence of a power equal to the production of its own phenomena? Mind alone is sufficient to account for order, proportion, and law, for the co-ordination of parts into a whole, and the adaptation of means to an end. If we refer them to anything else, the reference is essentially contrary to reason, and altogether inadequate. To execute a purpose, to fulfil an evident design, implies the existence of an intelligent, forecasting mind; and, if the facts of the universe conspire to prove the existence of such a mind, then the world ceases to be the theatre in which mechanical forces exercise unspiritual functions, and becomes the realised thought of God. The universe is a divine thought-plan, organised in matter, and published through all the infinitudes of space. Atom is held to atom, and star to star in a tissue of thought-created and intellectual relations; and we see throughout a flow of intelligent force, a tide of advancing power, which makes for wisdom, beauty, and righteousness, a stream of ever-rising tendency, disclosing from first to last the existence and action of a constant forecasting, progressive, and realising purpose.

The form we give to a Being so vast will of necessity be largely determined by two things—the point of view from which we take our observation, and the mood and temper of our own minds. It is impossible to frame a definition of such a Being that shall fully represent all our thought. God is manifold, and his nature is too vast to be compressed within any terms, however comprehensive. Even when we stand on the highest point of observation we see him but in part. Our knowledge must of necessity be inadequate, but it does not follow that it is not true as far as it goes. If we may not comprehend God, there is no reason why we should not apprehend him. Who can comprehend space and time? There are heights in each of these which we can never climb. Stretch your conceptions to the utmost you are still at the centre, and not at the circumference. Yet our ideas of space and time are true, distinct, and clear—though not including the whole of either, they yet include nothing that is not space and time. So of all other things, and so of God. What space is we know, what time is we know, and the element of infinitude does not change their nature. In like manner, though we may not comprehend God's omnipotence, we may realise it from our knowledge of his power; and though we cannot grasp his omniscience, we may apprehend his intelligence; though we may not comprehend his omnipresence, we may realise it by his presence. How different in magnitude is the star in the lake from its original in the sky; yet the resemblance is real—the water reflects the form mirrored upon it, does not twist, misshape, or distort it; and so the various images which help us to a conception of God are in their degree faithful reflectors of his nature and ways. Take, for instance, the ideas of personality and impersonality. They are both true as applied to God. There are points of view from which the idea of God's personality is entirely lost, but there are other points from which it is most prominent. Fix your eye on the vast, the boundless in nature, and it is almost impossible to associate the idea of personality with the scene. When God is apprehended by the artist as the life and beauty of the world, or by the scientist as an all-pervading force, or by the poet as an omnipresent and invisible spirit; whenever, in fact, men contemplate the unoutlined and indefinite, the idea of personality sinks entirely from view. The materialistic pantheism of the man of science, and the spiritualistic pantheism of the poet, such as is found in Shelley's "Adonais" and "Alastor," are very natural, and almost inevitable. There are moments in the experience of most men when such views possess a peculiar charm, when the individual loses self-consciousness, and becomes

"As one that in a vision floats
Obedient to the sweep of odorous winds
Upon resplendent clouds."

But let the view be changed, and for the boundless and mysterious universe substitute the wants, struggles, hopes, and sorrows of mankind, and then self-consciousness returns, and with it the conception of a personal and sympathetic God. Religion in any sense characteristically distinct from philosophy, poetry, or art, is impossible, except upon the recognition of the element of truth which lies in the conception of God's personality. Men would not long appeal to empty space, or waste Godward thoughts upon unsympathising power. Our nature demands a pledge of divine communication between the soul and the Supreme—a responsive relation, a real spiritual intercourse between mind and mind. And this it experiences in meditation and in prayer, in a sudden inspiration quickening the mind, or a sudden peace descending on the heart in reply to the soul's aspiration and appeal, in a new strengthening of the will, in the advent of fresh courage and the birth of new hopes. These are experiences which irresistibly compel the recognition of a personal Being in nature and in life. Meditate upon the goodness that diffuses blessings through so many channels; reflect upon the wisdom which directs steps that sometimes seem undirected; search the heart and have commerce with holy thoughts and emotions; try to interpret human necessities, human joys and sorrows, and it is impossible to escape the conviction of a personal

God, or to avoid the sentiment and language of devotion.

There sometimes comes to soul and sense
The feeling which is evidence
That very near about us lies
The realm of spiritual mysteries.
The sphere of the supernal powers
Impinges on this world of ours;
The low and dark horizon lifts
To light, the scenic terror shifts.
The breath of a diviner air
Blows down the answer of a prayer:
That all our sorrow, pain, and doubt
A great compassion clasps about.
And law and goodness, love and force,
Are wedded fast beyond divorce.
With smile of trust and folded hands
The passive soul in waiting stands
To feel as flowers the sun and dew
The one true life its own renew.

The Moral and Religious Argument.

But there is more in the universe than intellectual force and order: there is force which admits only of a moral interpretation. If the physical facts of nature refer us back to a Being invested with intelligence equal to the production and maintenance of all phenomena, so the moral facts lead us to the recognition of a primary moral agent. The reign of order extends beyond the domain of physical nature; it pushes its authority over the fields of human history. It is apprehended by conscience. In and through an awakened and active conscience men seize the moral relations in which they stand. And the first conviction that grows out of our moral experience is the conviction that there are great moral laws which we did not make, and cannot unmake. Keeping them we act with the scheme and tendency of things, and are blessed: transgressing them, we act against the scheme and moral constitution of things, and are rebuked and punished. There is a moral will outside us of which conscience is a delegated authority. The human conscience does not pretend to give a law of its own, but is contented to interpret and apply a higher law, from which it derives all its authority. Through our own moral nature we apprehend the existence and the supremacy of a moral will above us. "Without a moral nature of our own," says Professor Flint, "we could not recognise the moral character and government of God. We might tremble before his power, or we might admire his skill; but his righteousness would be hidden from us, his moral laws would be meaningless to us, and their sanctions would be merely a series of physical advantages and physical disasters." The human will and its law are felt to be distinct and separate; they are often in antagonism the one to the other; and all our moral emotions spring from their harmony or their opposition. But we do not stop at the recognition of a moral law in life. Neither our satisfaction at right-doing nor our remorse at wrong-doing is intelligible, if we regard the foundation of righteousness as a mere impersonal law. All our moral emotions pre-suppose the existence and cognisance of a personal will invested with moral attributes. In his "Grammar of Assent" Dr. Newman says: "Inanimate things cannot stir our affections; these are correlative with persons. If, as is the case, we feel responsibility, are ashamed, are frightened, at transgressing the voice of conscience, this implies that there is One to whom we are responsible, before whom we are ashamed, whose claim upon us we fear. If, on doing wrong, we feel the same tearful, broken-hearted sorrow which overwhelms us on hurting a mother; if, on doing right, we enjoy the same seeming serenity of mind, the same soothing satisfactory delight which follows on our receiving praise from a father—we certainly have within us the image of some person to whom our love and veneration look, in whose smile we find our happiness, for whom we yearn, towards whom we direct our pleadings, in whose anger we are troubled and waste away. These feelings in us are such as require for their exciting cause an intelligent being; we are not affectionate towards a stone, nor do we feel shame before a horse or a dog; we have no remorse or compunction in breaking mere human law; yet, so it is, conscience excites all these painful emotions, confusion, foreboding, self-condemnation; and, on the other hand, it sheds upon us a deep peace, a sense of security, a resignation, and a hope which there is no sensible, no earthly object to elicit." In this argument the premisses are indisputable. There are no facts more common than the moral, and the method by which the argument proceeds is the inductive, that which is commonly adopted in the investigations of science. Given the moral nature of man and all its manifestations, and the personal righteousness of God seems to follow inevitably.

But do the phenomena of nature and the experiences of mankind confirm this moral induction? In answering this question it must not be forgotten that at best we are very incompetent critics of a system so vast as the universe.

Earth's number scale is near us set;
The total God alone can see;
But each some fraction.

Of one thing we may assure ourselves, that however apparently unmeaning and inscrutable some events may be, they have in every case a reason and a cause. We may not always be able at once to detect the cause or to discern the reason, but we need not therefore doubt their existence. In a universe grounded in reason, and pervaded by law, there can be nothing which in the last resort has not an explanation in reason and in law. No one can deny the existence of striking anomalies in the universe—things that do not harmonise with our sense of perfection and proportion, but we may well ask ourselves before we pronounce judgment on these things whether they indicate defects in Providence, or defects in our knowledge and apprehension of the ways of Providence. They are the exceptions, and not the rule; and it will be found that they exist in those departments of life with which the human mind is least acquainted. Few will deny that the balance of evidence goes to show that the cosmic laws and forces of the universe, so far as we may be said to understand them, are in their normal office and essential aspect beneficent and beautiful. Water, which sometimes drowns, is one of the most marvellously-gifted and fruitful in benefit of all the creatures of God. Fire, which scorches and blasts, and which, uncontrolled, is terrible, is yet in its normal function rich in benefit and bountiful in service. The sea, for every ship it wrecks, conveys thousands in safety. Nor are the earthquake and volcano, the hurricane and cyclone, occasions only of hurt and loss—they are sources of indispensable and incalculable good; they keep the balance of the earth, and maintain the sweetness and freshness of the air. "Teeth," says Paley, "are contrived to eat, not to ache; their aching now and then is incidental to the contrivance, not the object of it. No anatomist ever discovered a system of organisation calculated to produce pain or disease, or in explaining the parts of the human body said 'this is to irritate; this to inflame; this duct to convey gravel to the kidneys, this gland to secrete the humours which form the gout.' The evil, if evil there be in connexion with the laws of nature, does not seem to belong to the essential nature of the laws themselves, but to come out of our relations thereto. He who knows what men are, and what the world is, cannot suppose that it would be better for us if disasters never befel us. Accidents and mishaps of the more serious and fatal sorts arise from our work being weak when it should be strong, or unwise and thoughtless when it should be full of wisdom and discretion, or based upon ignorance and fancy when it should be grounded in knowledge and fact. And it is surely better for us in the end that God should disallow our work—render it a source of loss and discomfort to us, till we learn to make it strong and wise and true to match his own—than that he should take from the strength and wisdom and truth of his work that it might meet and harmonise with the weakness and unwisdom of ours. If the gales had tolerated and the seas had borne in safety any sort of tub man might choose to put upon them, we should have had no stately shipping, no world-wide commerce. If the storms had dealt gently with the primitive hut, in all probability we should have been living in huts to-day. If nature tolerated thoughtlessness and thriftlessness, where would have been mankind's skill and endeavour? Our science and industry, our progress and improvement are entirely founded upon the stability and constancy of the great natural laws. And from a moral point of view, it is far preferable that we should provisionally suffer through our ignorance of them, or disobedience to them, than that they should be constituted unstable and inconstant. And it will throw a broad shaft of light upon this dark region of our life if we remember that it is evidently not quantity so much as quality of life for which the Maker and Providence of the world has most regard. The amount is held subordinate to the perfection. That, according to modern science, is the sovereign law of Providence, in the animal kingdom and in the human too. Abundance and continuance of physical life, a vast population is something; but the enrichment, growth, and ennoblement of intellectual and moral life, a wise and virtuous population is more; and Providence has little hesitation in sacrificing the one to the other, and pledging the victory to endurance and foresight, thought and skill, resource and character. The unskilful, incapable, unprogressive, whether races, nations, or men, yield place to the progressive, capable, and skilful. It is hard, but it is well, painful to the individual and for the moment, but working out far more exceeding and eternal insight of glory for the whole and in the end. Moral evil is not so easily explained, though it does admit of some sort of explanation. On the supposition that man is a mere automaton, subject to a power whose will he cannot in any way resist or defy, moral evil is utterly inexplicable, but if he is found to be a creature with faculties which left him above the automaton, possessed of moral volition which he may exercise within a margin, gifted with the power of selecting this motive or that out of the many motives which at any given point present themselves for approval, then evil is not the ugly thing it seems. It indicates defect in human nature, but not defect in the divine; and it is impossible to conceive of the existence of man morally dowered as he is without evil. Why did not God make a moral being who would be certain never to oppose his will, and therefore certain never to suffer or to err? is a question which may be asked but not answered. The enigma involved in such a question seems to me to be speculatively incapable of solution, and practically of not the slightest importance. Sin does enter into human life, and its existence there seems to be tolerated by God and allowed for no other reason that we can see than this—that virtue in the truest sense, conscious and spontaneous obedience to the Divine will, is a thing impossible without the option of disobedience and sin. It is enough for us to do our utmost to interpret life as it is, without wasting our strength in trying to solve the enigmas of an imaginary universe in which reason has no data. But though we cannot altogether determine the why and the wherefore of evil, it is not difficult to perceive that even it is made subservient to the attainment of great ends. If my conduct be sound and true, it is a benefit to others as well or even more than to myself. If it be unsound and untrue, it is to others a sorrow and a hurt. We are all helped and furthered by others' thoughtfulness and virtue, and injured and harmed by their thoughtlessness and vice. But then, what if it were otherwise—if man could isolate himself from man, and class from class, and nation from nation, if round each person, class, or nation there were thrown inviolable barriers, and if each generation had to start right from the beginning unhelped by the inheritance of the discoveries and experiences of those who had gone before? There would be no play of mutual interest, no reciprocation of sympathy, no advancement and progress. How little of the material or spiritual good which makes life worth the living has been invented by any man for himself; how vast the heritage of welfare which has come to all of us from the intimacy and closeness of our relations to the race. It is well, therefore, that the results of wisdom and virtue are not restricted to the wise and virtuous, but help and bless the unwise and vicious too. Nor is it ill that the consequences of vice and folly are not confined to the vicious and foolish, but impede and impair also the virtuous and wise. It gives each an interest in the other, makes the welfare of each dependent upon the welfare of all, and the liability to suffer from others' weakness and folly is, after all, only the obverse side of that law by which we receive benefit from their wisdom and strength. But even supposing no explanation could be given of life's anomalies, it does not follow that the ideas of the perfect wisdom and goodness of God are not essentially true. The denial of these does not lighten the darkness or solve the problems of life; it deepens the darkness and multiplies the enigmas. If we cannot justify the ways of God to man, humility would suggest that the fault is ours.

We have not wings, we cannot soar;
But we have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.

The Religious Argument.

Time will not permit me to do more than refer briefly to the evidence of God's nature, which is to be found in the religious constitution and properties of the human mind. There are religious phenomena, wants, aspirations, affections, and emotions which have no meaning except in the conviction that God is, and that he communes with men. The feelings of dependence, awe, reverence, worship, which rise spontaneous in the human soul, are a vision and a prophecy. There are men, who, absorbed in the physical and outward aspects of existence, grow insensible to its inner and spiritual aspects. Show them a new set of fossil bones and weeds, a new type of insect, a new specimen of a beetle, and these are grand discoveries—momentous facts upon which they erect vast generalisations. But show them things not less real, and of far deeper interest to mankind—the faith, the trusts, the hopes, the hungers and aspirations of human souls, and they are incredulous, sometimes disdainful. As we know, the division of labour in the mechanical sphere has many anomalous results. It develops one capability in a man at the cost of all the others, makes him an expert at the doing of this or that, but leaves him unpractised and unskilled at anything else. And the division of labour in the intellectual sphere has like effects. And the way in which many a man of science will doff his hat at a new sample of a reptile or an ape, and turn away in avowed disrelish from everything which pertains to mind and spirit, may be fairly regarded as among the many strange examples of a one-sided development of mind. To the philosophic thinker, religious phenomena, wherever they are manifested and whatever be their worth, are rich in significance, and the religions of the world must be recognised and their authority admitted when an attempt is made to interpret nature and life. To formulate a theory of the universe that shuts out some of the truest and most reliable facts of the universe is the surest road to error, and the theory thus formed cannot be other than fragmentary and defective. The idea of God is broad-based upon knowledge of the world and of life, of the laws of physical nature, and the constitution and history of mankind, and though never perfect and adequate, it yet rests upon a solid foundation, and affords satisfaction to the intellect, the conscience, and the religious emotions.

Sufficiency of Theism.

One would think that, granted the existence of God and of the human soul as ascertainable facts, the sufficiency of Theism would be proved. These two truths admitted, and along with them the certainty of communion and fellowship between God and man, and all that has appeared as religion is accounted for. These facts suggest direct relations between God and the soul, and imply the possibility of man's immediate intercourse with his Maker, without mediator and without priest. But, according to the language and ritual of all the churches, this is not so. Ecclesiastical theology has created a sort of partnership in heaven on the limited liability principle, apparently forgetting that such a partnership is a confession of the incapacity of those who form it. Limited liability companies practically confess that united the members can do what individually they are unable to do. And so in the traditional theology the functions of Deity have been divided among several persons, and the more important of them have devolved upon Jesus Christ. It is Christ who creates, sustains, redeems, and judges, and one cannot but ask, if Christ does all this, what is the use and function of God? As under Pagan mythology Chronos was succeeded by Zeus, and Saturn by Jupiter, so under the Christian mythology the Father is superseded by the Son. But this is not all. Jesus Christ has been regarded as a sort of fixture between God and man. Men have thought of the Father as unapproachable, inaccessible, afar, and as needing to be approached by an intercessor. The intercession of Christ has become as indispensable to the Protestant as the mediation of the Virgin and saints was to the Catholic. He dare not pray in his own name—thinks the Father would not hear him if he did—and fears to trust himself to God's spontaneous and unpurchased love.

Even in our free churches, where better ideas of God might be expected to prevail, and where the language of obsolete doctrine has ceased to have any meaning, men habitually pray to God "through Christ," as though communion were impossible without intercession. The phrases "for the sake of Christ" and "through Jesus Christ our Lord," coming at the end of every prayer and at grace before and after meat, seem to me to indicate an imperfect conception of God's character. The reason, motive, and source of all God's activity ought surely to be sought for in God himself. If he answers a man's prayer, or saves his soul, or bestows any blessing upon him, it is not "through Christ," nor is it "for Christ's sake," but for his own goodness' sake. He does good because he is essential goodness himself, and he acts kindly because the law of his nature is a law of kindness. To suppose, therefore, that in consequence of what Christ was, or said, or did, God is better, gentler, kinder than otherwise he would be, is to suppose that, apart from Christ, God is not a perfect God, and that he whose essence is wisdom, love, and goodness needs inducements and persuasions to be loving and good. God did great things by Christ, and is even doing them now, but that he should perpetually act by deputy and delegate his paternal functions to another, is a notion altogether incompatible with philosophical and devout theism. Our relations to God are direct and personal; they rest not upon any accidents of emotion, feeling, or experience, but upon the eternal nature and benignant character of God himself. The needle turns not more promptly to the pole than the sympathising God to the aspiring man.

So the All-great is the All-loving too,
So through life and nature comes a voice Saying, "O heart! I made, a heart beats here;
Face my hands fashioned, see it in myself;
Thou hast no force, nor can'st conceive of mind,
But love I gave thee, with myself to love."

This paper was also followed by an interesting discussion, in which Revs. G. Ride, W. Mitchell, A. Chalmers, J. C. Street, and J. Freeston took part. Mr. Cuckson replied; and votes of thanks having been passed to the readers of the papers, the trustees of the Memorial Hall, and to the president, prayer was offered by Rev. George Fox, and the members adjourned to the committee-room, where a collation was provided. Brief and pointed speeches were delivered by the retiring and new presidents, Rev. H. Williamson and J. C. Lunn, and Rev. E. W. Hopkinson. Rev. J. G. Slater spoke on the "Missionary Conference," Mrs. Soule on the "Liberal Churches Abroad," Rev. J. T. Marriott on "Religious Comprehension," Rev. J. C. Street on "Civil and Religious Liberty," Rev. R. Pilcher on "Our Divinity Schools," and Rev. S. Farrington replied to "Our Visitors."

The Conference was well attended each day, and the proceedings were throughout of a highly interesting character.

SCARBOROUGH.

WELCOME TO THE REV. DENDY AGATE, B.A.

On Tuesday last a meeting of the congregation of Westborough Church was held, to give a cordial welcome to the Rev. D. Agate. There was a good attendance both of members of the congregation and of friends from other congregations. The room and tea tables were tastefully decorated with flowers, and the general tone of the meeting was bright and cheerful.

At seven o'clock, JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., J.P., of Leeds, took the chair, and after explaining the reasons for the absence of several friends whom the committee had hoped to see, spoke of the growth of the congregation, of his own deep interest in its welfare, and of his good wishes for the new minister.

EDWARD WURTZBURG, Esq., after referring to the various stages in the congregational history since the first summer services were held eight years ago, and to the opposition which the Rev. J. C. Hirst had met with, assured Mr. Agate of the cordiality of the welcome which he gave.

Mr. T. P. WHITTAKER supported the "welcome," and was listened to with great interest. He explained that he was not a member of the congregation, though as often as he was able he attended the services. He had been educated in the strictest form of orthodoxy, and having ceased to believe that, did not wish to wander about from sect to sect, as many people do, connecting themselves first with one church and then with another; but wished to be sure of his ground before formally connecting himself again with any church. He added that he liked Unitarian services, because people who came were not asked any questions about their belief, and because the preachers did not end their sermons with a threat against those who differed from them, like an orthodox minister whom he had heard, who, after drawing wise lessons from the conduct of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, in refusing to bow down to the image which the king had set up, threatened all with a fiery furnace who did not bow down to his particular image.

The Rev. F. E. MILLSON, of Halifax, gave expression on behalf of the ministers of the district to their feeling of friendship for Mr. Agate, and "their hope that he would be greatly successful in his work," and the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., of Padiham, speaking as one of Mr. Agate's fellow-students, drew encouragement from some of his own experiences at Padiham.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, of Leeds, followed with an address upon the greatness of the work which Mr. Agate had undertaken, and after speaking of some of the discouragements which our ministers met with, particularly the neglectfulness of other teachers of religion and Christian churches,—a neglect which he considered worse even than the opposition of which Mr. Wurtzburg had spoken—went on to point out that our great strength as a religious body, and as religious teachers, lies in the fact that we extend our sympathy to all honest and good men, though some refuse it to us, and that in this way we have the truth on our side. In responding to the welcome accorded to him,

Mr. AGATE said he felt how much too generously his friends estimated him, but that it was a great help to begin his work, as he knew he did begin it, secure from the first of kindness and consideration on the part of those who had chosen him for their minister. His ministry he knew would have the defects resulting from his comparative youth and his limited experience, but he desired to do his best. He should always look upon the members of the congregation as fellow-workers, and mentioned some of the ways in which the services and other parts of the Church's occupations might be made more effective. He asked them not to let him work in the dark, if it occurred to them to make any suggestion likely to be helpful to him in the performance of his own pulpit or other duties, or to congregational activity generally. He expressed his hope that the Sunday school would increase, and, with regard to any who might hereafter come to them from any church or from no church, wished to say how entirely he desired to impress upon them that there was no compulsion in our faith, but that we asked from men and women only intellectual honesty and uprightness of life. He was anxious, too, to do his part in all good work in the town, and concluded by expressing again his thanks for the welcome accorded to him, and his belief that the work to which he and his friends had set their hands would not fail.

The Rev. ELI FAY, of Sheffield, delivered an address on the "Duties of the Congregation to their Minister," and was heard with great pleasure. We hope to give this address in a future number.

Votes of thanks—first, to the ladies who had provided the tea, and to the members of the choir who had sung several songs in the course of the evening, and, secondly, to the chairman—were unanimously adopted, the Rev. John Sutcliffe, of Malton, the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, of Hunslet, and Mr. George Padley speaking to the resolutions; and the meeting closed shortly before ten o'clock with a hymn and the benediction.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

MANCHESTER UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held on Monday evening, in the Memorial Hall, Albert Square; Mr. John Heys, the president, occupying the chair.

The Hon. Secretary (Mr. D. Thompson) read the 19th annual report, for the past year. Eight united teachers' meetings had been held on Sunday afternoons, and at these meetings there was an aggregate attendance of 665, being an average attendance of 83. In the nine schools in Union there were 113 male teachers, being a decrease of four on the previous year, and 85 female teachers, an increase of 14. The scholars numbered—male, 866, an increase of 132; female, 672, being an increase of 76. Total average attendance, 1,068, an increase of 148. As compared with the previous year there had been an increase of one school in connection with the Union. At the Whit Sunday festival 16 schools were represented.—A statement read by the Treasurer (Mr. W. H. Mellor) showed there was a balance in the bank of £3. 8. 10½d., but on the Whit Sunday festival a loss of £3.

The report and statement of accounts were adopted, and the committee and officers for the ensuing year were elected, the Rev. J. Towle Marriott being elected president, and Mr. W. H. Mellor secretary, a vote of thanks being passed to the Mr. David Thompson for his three years' service. Mr. Nettlefold's offer of part payment of an order for 50 books from the London Association was urged upon the attention of the teachers. A resolution to hold the Whit Sunday festival in Cross-street chapel instead of the Free Trade Hall, was lost, 20 voting against it and 9 for it. A vote of thanks to the Chairman for presiding terminated the proceedings.

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

CROFT.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. Joseph Pollard, of Belfast, officiating. The collections realised upwards of £14. On Monday, the annual tea party for teachers, scholars, and parents, was held in the schoolroom, after which all went to a field kindly lent for the occasion, and a most enjoyable day was spent.

GELLIONEN.—The annual meetings of the Unitarians of South Wales were held on Wednesday and Thursday, the 26th and 28th ult., at the above place. Ministers present were: Revs. D. Evans, B.A., T. Thomas, E. W. Lloyd, W. Rees, R. J. Jones, M.A., J. E. Manning, M.A., J. Hathren Davies, and J. Evans. There were also present at some of the meetings the Rev. J. Jones (Independent), Carmel, and Rev. Mr. Jones (Independent), Tyncoed. On Wednesday, at 7 p.m., Revs. Hathren Davies and R. J. Jones preached, the former from Luke, xii., 27; and the latter from Luke, xv., 18. On Thursday morning, at 10.30, the Rev. J. Thomas went through the devotional part of the service, and the Rev. J. E. Manning delivered an excellent discourse (English) from the I. Cor. xii., 16. The preacher of the day, who is appointed twelve months beforehand (the Rev. D. Evans), discoursed from the words in Luke iii., 9. The chapel, which is tolerably large, was quite full, and the sermon was attentively listened to. Rev. E. W. Lloyd read a paper on the question of the conference, viz., "Is the Doctrine of Eternal Torments Consistent with the Character of God as a Father?" The speakers upon the whole agreed with the sentiments set forth in the paper. The Revs. R. J. Jones and W. Rees preached splendid sermons. There were services again at 6.30, when Revs. E. W. Lloyd and T. Thomas preached, the former from Acts xvi., 31; and the latter from Matthews vii., 24, 27, to a larger congregation than in the afternoon. Their sermons were greatly commended by all parties. We believe that there have never been more successful meetings among the Unitarians in South Wales than these in point of attendance and discourses, and we hope in beneficial results.

HINCKLEY.—The chapel at this place, which has been closed for several months, has recently been reopened for regular service. The Rev. J. J. Wright, of the Free Christian Church, Leicester, has arranged to give a morning service there for the present. It is to be hoped that this temporary arrangement will be so far successful as to enable the congregation speedily to engage the services of a settled minister, and release Mr. Wright, whose valuable work can ill be spared at Leicester.

LONDON: CLARENCE ROAD (KENTISH TOWN) SUNDAY SCHOOL.—Should there be anyone still left who is labouring under the delusion that Sunday schools have done their work, and that ministers may now cease from troubling and the teachers be at rest, a visit to such a school as this might possibly act as a restorative. One of the quarterly services for the children, which have now become customary, was held in the church last Sunday, and the occasion was rendered more impressive than usual even by the recent death of one of the elder scholars, several touching little incidents in whose character and conduct were related by Mr. Allen, the superintendent, who gave the address. If the Sunday school did not wholly mould the lad's life, it helped to give it grace and spiritual development. The hymns and reading and prayers of the service all bore upon the subject, of which every heart seemed full. He appears to have been passionately fond of flowers, and was seldom seen on a Sunday without one in his coat. One Sunday Mr. Allen was surprised to find a box of nice plants, roots and all, in the school when he came to open it for the morning service. It was simply addressed to the superintendent. The lad must have come early, got over the gate, and left them in the garden, and then gone away saying nothing about it to anyone. Somebody had, however, seen him place them there, and told Mr. Allen. The flowers were planted in the garden beside the walk leading into the chapel, and there they are growing now, and will henceforth be known as "George's flowers." Whilst in the hospital consciousness for a short time returned to him, and the first word he spoke was "Mother!"—his father had died just before he was born—and the next the superintendent's name. The latter was there at his bedside ready to whisper words of comfort, courage, and immortal hope. The service ended with the hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and an impressive benediction; and then the children, evidently deeply touched, moved quietly away whilst the organ played the "Dead March in Saul." Many of the parents and friends of the children were present, who appeared to feel with them the simple beauty and impressiveness of the service.

MOSSLEY.—On Sunday last, July 7th, the services in the Free Christian Church were conducted in the afternoon and evening by Mrs. Caroline A. Soule, Universalist Evangelist. The subjects of the sermons were "Saving that which is lost," and "Coveting the best things," and they were treated in a most able and interesting manner. There was a good attendance on each occasion, and Mrs. Soule's services were warmly appreciated by the congregation.

MANSFIELD: FLOWER SERVICE.—On Sunday afternoon the annual Sunday scholars' flower service was held at the Unitarian Chapel, Stockwell-gate. The building was very neatly decorated with flowers and evergreens. The Communion table presented a nice appearance, it bearing several glasses of choice roses, and above it honeysuckles and other flowers were prettily arranged. Some fine plants and ferns in pots also contributed to the beauty of the display. The Rev. J. W. Worthington gave a very interesting and appropriate address on flowers. There was a good congregation at the service.

NEWCASTLE: STAFFORDSHIRE.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday last, morning and evening, by the Rev. J. C. Williams, the minister. The congregations were good, and the collections for the church funds about £1 in advance of last year.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The Sunday schools of the Church of Divine Unity had their annual excursion to Sheepwark, Choppington, on Wednesday, June 26, and a large number of friends joined the trip. The teachers had invited the Choppington Sunday school to a free tea, which was cordially accepted. Upwards of 270 took tea, every provision having been made for the amusement of the children. The Choppington school was delighted with the kind feeling towards them.

RAWTENSTALL.—On Sunday afternoon last a choral service of praise was given by the choir. The sacred songs and choruses were exceedingly well rendered. The readings were given by the Rev. H. Hill, minister, and were taken from the "Sayings of Christ," as found in the gospels. The pulpit and the communion-table were tastefully decorated with beautiful flowers, bouquets, and plants by the ladies of the congregation. There was a large and respectable audience present, and a good collection at the close.

SCARBOROUGH.—From the annual report of this congregation, dated June 4th, we learn that there are 49 registered members, being 13 over the previous year. The congregations, however, are frequently made up of residents in Scarborough who have not yet formally joined the church. Since the opening of the new church the average attendance has been—morning, 58; evening, 61. The offertory last year realised £118. 3s. 6d., being £22. 11s. 4d. over the previous year. On the treasurer's account for the present year there is a deficiency of £23. 19s. 9d., which it is hoped to avoid in future, a guarantee fund amounting to £40. 4s. 6d. having been secured. The committee tender their thanks to Mr. C. E. Wurtzburg for his services as treasurer, for the active-part he took in the formation of the congregation, and in connection with the building fund. Recently a ladies' sewing society has been formed. Towards a new organ, Mr. Cuddeford, of Croydon, has made a present of £5. 5s.

STOCKPORT.—The church at St. Peter's gate presented on Sunday afternoon week a charming sight. Looking towards the pulpit the eye rested upon a bank of foliage and bloom. Large and handsome hothouse plants were arranged in tiers against the wall, forming a rich and effective background to the bright and choice cut flowers with which the pulpit and reading-desk were decorated. At the opposite end of the chapel a very neat piece of floral ornamentation was seen on the front of the organ gallery, hanging baskets filled with moss and ferns being introduced here to great advantage. The occasion of this rich display was the children's midsummer floral festival. A very numerous congregation filled the pews, overflowing into the aisles. The service was of a very pleasing and enjoyable kind. It was a choral service, compiled by Mr. O. E. Heys, entitled "Summer Song," and opening with an organ voluntary. An address was given by the Rev. J. J. Wright, who related several interesting stories, and commanded the same wrapt attention that marked his address at the same place on a similar occasion twelve months ago. The address was succeeded by a German hymn, "O God, my Shepherd!" and the service was shortly afterwards brought to a close, having occupied about an hour and a half. As the congregation left the chapel the people had an opportunity afforded them of helping to defray the expenses of the festival. The collection amounted to £5. 10s. 9d.

SUNDERLAND.—On Thursday, June 27th, the scholars, teachers, and friends went to Dawdon Dene, a beautiful spot surrounded by wood and stream. The party numbered 85. Games in great variety were freely indulged in. The tea was set out upon the green, and all enjoyed the ample fare provided, which was supplemented by fruits. Special hymns were heartily sung by the children. The excursion was, in every respect, a most enjoyable one. The Rev. W. Elliott spoke a few words, pointing to the sweet friendships which such gatherings tend to foster.

TAVISTOCK.—On Sunday last the Sunday school children had their festival, and sang their hymns well. In the evening there was a large congregation. The sermons were preached by the Rev. Lindsay Badcock, after which collections were made in aid of the school.

DOING AND SAYING.

In St. Petersburg there are only twelve newsvendors, and the busiest of them sell but 250 copies of the newspaper every day. What is the intelligence of the people?

The slave trade at Zanzibar is almost extinct as regards the transport of slaves by sea, Her Majesty's cruisers, cordially seconded by the Sultan, having well-nigh put an end to the traffic.

The Jewish World, in an article last week on "The Future of Judaism," says: We dare not venture to suppose that the world will ever become, nominally and ceremonially, Jews; but, if a universal religion is one day to dawn we are perfectly confident that it will not be Christianity, but that it will at least embody the fundamental principles on which Judaism is based.

Archdeacon Denison is very much incensed against the Irish Intermediate Education Bill for a double reason, first, because it proposes to make some use of the surplus obtained from the sacrilege of Irish Disestablishment; next, because it renders new homage to that fanatic zeal for education which he regards as the idolatry of our spurious age. "Church money seized by the strong hand always does burn the seizer's pocket." When the English Church is disestablished, says the Archdeacon, "God will be robbed again," and "the joyful ratepayer will lead the triumph," when he contemplates the relief to his pocket also.

In Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice" Portia, as the judge, is importuned to curb the devilish propensities of the Jew by doing a "little wrong." But the legal answer is—it must not be; and the reflection is added—'twill be cited as a precedent. The editor of the Herald of Peace does not believe in the moral and legal philosophy of Shakspeare. He believes in doing not only a little, but a great wrong, to feed "the susceptibilities of his readers." In the April number of the Truthseeker there appeared a sermon by the Rev. John Page Hopps on "The spirit of war incompatible with the Spirit of Christ." It took the fancy of the editor of the Herald of Peace—but then, it was not orthodox. So the editor set to work, and "cooked" it orthodox. For instance, "O Jesus, our brother," was made to read "O Lord Jesus our Redeemer." Other doctrinal modifications were made, and the sermon, thus altered, was published as "By the Rev. John Page Hopps," in the Herald of Peace of July 1st. The alterations, we are assured, were deliberately made. What can be said of this conduct? Is it not "simply horrible?" No! not even in the cause of peace should this be done without indignant reprobation!

At the annual meeting of the Turkish Missions Society, one of the speakers was the Rev. Hagop Aborhayatian. He is a native of Armenia, educated in Germany for ten years, and for nine he has been an Evangelical pastor in Ur of the Chaldees, his native place. He stated that the mission began in Turkey twenty years ago, when the first American Evangelical church was established in 1848. Now they had in Turkey five British, five American, and one German church, all Evangelical societies. They had nearly 200 foreign missionaries and 600 native pastors, teachers and readers. Thirty years ago they had not a single Protestant school, now they had more than 500, with nearly 25,000 Protestant children. They had 500 places of worship and 30,000 or 40,000 Protestant Christians and 8,000 church members. Thirty years ago they had only three Bibles amongst 1,500 Armenian Christian people. Now more than 4,000 New Testaments in all languages had been circulated, and 10,000 different tracts and books especially in the Armenian languages. They found Bibles and colporteurs in every city. In his native city of Ur of the Chaldees he had a congregation of 1,000 Protestants and 250 communicants, together with four schools for girls and boys containing 270. So far had their work been successful that they now paid for their own pastors and for their school teachers, who were connected with the American mission.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

A NEW POLITICAL PARTY.

ONE would think it rather difficult now-a-days to found a new political party, but, well-founded reports are to be believed, such a scheme is really afoot. The new movement is politico-religious, and Dr. Begg its leading champion. Protestantism has been chosen as the watchword of the new party, and it is said that a beginning is to be made in this second reformation by putting forward Parliamentary candidates for Edinburgh and Glasgow. Dr. Regg has been asked to fight the battle of the party in the Scottish metropolis; and although he is said to have mildly declined the honour, confident hopes are entertained that he will yet consent. His friends are calculating too much if they expect that a city so identified with Liberalism will be hoodwinked at last by religious Toryism. The hopes of these Latter-day Protestants are also pretty high in regard to Glasgow, as the Orange vote there is very numerous. As for the programme of the new party, it has not yet been formally put before the public, but it is believed that the maintenance of the Scottish Establishment will be an essential point in it. A doom, however, if certain reports be true, has been pronounced upon the English Establishment, whose continued existence as a feeder of Popery is highly dangerous in the eyes of the leaders of the new movement, as well as in those of the bulk of Liberationists.

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

ADAPTED SENTENCES.

[A LESSON read at the Home Missionary Board Valedictory Service, held in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, July 3rd, 1878, by the Rev. SILAS FARRINGTON.]

In the degree you conceive the perfect excellence, and carry it into practice, you will approximate to the glory of the Son of God.

The true way is exceeding plain, but the great danger is that you may be beguiled into some one of the many cross-paths.

If you wish to be above the people so as to save them, you must crucify your selfishness, and keep below the people in a divine and sympathetic wisdom that will often seem but foolishness to them. He who wishes to be before the people must in person keep behind them; thus, while in position over the people, they do not feel his weight.

The good I would meet with goodness; the not-good I would meet with goodness also. Virtue is goodness. The faithful I would meet with faithfulness; the not-faithful I would meet with faithfulness also. Virtue is faithfulness. Give—and freely—a quick and tender sympathy to all. The perfect excellence has but one method—when it would save a man it encircles him with compassion. Keep to the perfect excellence.

It is necessary to watch incessantly over oneself, for heaven has an intelligence which nothing escapes, and decrees that are without appeal. Yet, in all its awfulness, heaven helps the earnest and the sincere. O, early and late, never be but earnest and sincere.

Say not, "Heaven is so high and so far above us that it scarcely may be known." It is neither high nor far. The height, and the abyss profound, of heaven are within. Seek its glory there.

It is not hard to know God, provided one will not force oneself to define Him. Have we not discerned the Spirit He is? Have we not known the secret and inexplicable power of holy souls—a wondrous grace and truth—a sweetness diffusing itself from manifold virtues—a marvellous combination of precious qualities, many, yet blending in one strength—intelligence all ruling—wisdom enlightening all—counsel governing in all—reverence and gentleness making itself the beloved servant of all—energy and majesty divine yet dovelike to woo the heart—an eternal goodness—an unconquerable and immortal love?

This is God. He manifests himself in the flesh. He is his own witness. In all ages entering into holy souls, and purifying them for their helpful work. Save as He comes to us in our loftier brothers we have not seen God at any time. Only in the human is His spirit in its fulness and beauty revealed. In the perfected soul the kingdom of heaven—God himself—becomes visible. In the highest, holiest manhood we have the Son of God. Outwardly, our nearest approach to the divine is through the human; to the Holy Spirit, through its manifest offspring and child. We lose God only when we disregard His human son. "Divide from the divine glory the softness and warmth of human colour; subtract from the divine the human presence; subdue all refraction to the white absolute light; and that light is no longer as the sun's is, warm with heat of life and liberal of good gifts, but foul with overmuch purity, sick with disease of excellence, unclean through exceeding cleanness, like the skin of a leper, as white as snow."

Be ready to do everything, even the smallest, with a recollection of the bond which unites the divine and the human to one another. For neither wilt thou do anything well which pertains to man without at the same time having a reference to things divine; nor the contrary.

If thou workest at that which is before thee, following the perfect excellence seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, keeping thy divine part pure, the light of thy whole body; if thou doest this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with such activity, both thou and thy life's work will be blest. And there is no man who is able to prevent this!

Since God has put such life in thine own power—since there is none of higher virtue or value—strive, with single eye and humble heart, toward this, even if it make thee quiet, obscure, and of no reputation.

CHARLIE'S STORY.

I WAS sitting in the twilight,
With my Charlie on my knee,
(Little two-year-old forever Teasing, "Talk a 'tory, p'ease, to me").
"Now," I said, "talk me a 'tory."
"Well," reflectively, "I'll mence.
Mamma, I did see a kitty,
Great—big—kitty, on the fence."
Mamma smiles. Five little fingers
Cover up her laughing lips.
"Is oo laughing?" "Yes," I tell him,
But I kiss the finger-tips,
And I say, "Now tell another."
"Well," (all smiles), "now I will 'mence.
Mamma, I did see a doggie,
Great—big—doggie, on the fence."
"Rather similar—your stories,— Aren't they, dear?" A sober look
Swept across the pretty forehead;
Then he sudden courage took.
"But I know a nice, new 'tory
Plendid, mamma! Hear me 'mence.
Mamma, I—did—see—a—elfunt,
Great—big—elfunt, on the fence!"

CURIOSITIES.

Irate Young Lady: Mr. Cox, I declare your machines are the worst I ever saw; there's not even a looking-glass! Proprietor of bathing machines: "Why, Miss, if there was looking-glasses, we shouldn't get you ladies out of them 'ere machines for howers and howers!"

An Englishman was accosted thus: "What would you take to stand all night in the tower of St. Paul's?" "A beefsteak and a pint of beer," was the frank reply. The next one thus accosted was a Scotchman. Says Sandy, "What'll ye gie?" Lastly came along Patrick, and when asked what he would take to stand all night in the tower of St. Paul's, he wittily answered, "An' suré an' I'd be apt to take a bad cowl."

In the General Assembly, during a discussion as to the better training of students, Mr. Douglas MacLagan said the Assembly would know the necessity there was for more stringency if they could see some of the papers handed in by the students in the preliminary examinations they are required to pass in literature and mathematics. A question, for instance, was put as to the meaning of the word "hypothesis." One candidate answered that it was "a machine for raising water." Another said it was "something that happened to a man after death." In answer to the requirement, "Give some account of Galileo and Copernicus," one student replied that Galileo was a man who had committed five murders; another, that Galileo and Copernicus were two classical heroes who had fallen together in some battle. A third student said that Copernicus was "a compound of two metals."

ECCENTRICITIES OF EMINENT MEN.

Cowper kept hares and made birdcages. Swift, in his old age, was avaricious, and had an absolute terror of visitors.

Henri Quatre delighted to go about in disguise among the peasantry.

Shelley delighted in floating paper boats on any water he chanced to be near.

Sir Richard Steele, Fielding, and Sterne shared the prevailing taste for hard drinking.

Oliver Cromwell would sometimes play at blindman's-buff with his daughters and attendants.

Lord Bacon is a melancholy instance of the dominion obtained by avarice over a great mind.

Thomas Warton, the poetical antiquary, used to associate with the schoolboys while visiting his brother.

Charles II. amused himself by feeding ducks in St. James' Park, and in rearing numbers of beautiful spaniels.

Thomson had his garden at Richmond, where he ate preaches off the trees with his hands in his pockets.

Dr. Johnson was so fond of his cat, that he would even go out himself to buy oysters for Puss' because his servant was too proud to do so.

Paley, the author of Natural Theology, was so much given to angling that he had his portrait painted with a rod and line in his hand.

Dr. Johnson had a voracious liking for a leg of mutton. "At my Aunt Ford's," he said "I ate so much of a leg of mutton that she used to talk of it."

Cato the Censor, on his return from Spain, was so parsimonious that he sold his field-horse, to save the expense of conveying the animal by sea to Italy.

Pope's self love was so great, that, according to Johnson, he "had been flattered till he thought himself one of the moving powers in the system of life."

Attillus Regulus, at the period of his greatest glory in Africa, entreated permission to return home to the management of his estate, which consisted but of seven acres.

Shelley was for many years a vegetarian; and in the notes to his earliest edition of Queen Mab speaks with enthusiasm of a dinner of greens, potatoes, and turnips.

Beethoven would splash in cold water at all times of the day, till his chamber was swamped. MOZART, whose light hair was of a fine quality, wore it very long and flowing down between his shoulders, with a tie of coloured ribbon confining it at the neck.

Pope, who was somewhat of an epicure, when staying at the house of his friend Lord Bolingbroke, would lie in bed for days together, unless he heard there was to be stewed lampreys for dinner, when he would forthwith arise, and make his appearance at table.

Handel ate enormously; and Dr. Kitchener relates of him, that whenever he dined at a tavern, he ordered dinner for three. On being told that all was ready as soon as the company should arrive, he would exclaim "Den pring up de dinner prestissimo—I am de combany!"

CIRENCESTER.—On Sunday last the annual chapel services were conducted by the Rev. D. Matts, of Ballymoney. The congregations were much larger than any for years past, in the evening about 200 persons being present. Two animating discourses were delivered, and five special anthems sung by a choir of 30 voices. The ancient building was adorned with choicest flowers.

DENTON.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A UNITARIAN MISSION ROOM AND SCHOOL.

ON Saturday last our friends at Denton had a most interesting day. Starting in 1875 a Unitarian Mission cause in the Co-operative Hall, and a school, they have gone on hopefully till a feeling has grown strong enough to impress them with the need of a building sufficiently commodious for the work they have laid out for themselves. The trade and population of the place have for some years now been growing. Half a century ago it was a Lancashire centre of the felt hatting trade. That declined, the silk hat manufactory putting it in the back ground, but in recent years a new form of the felt hat trade has sprung up, and this, combined with the silk hat trade and a cotton mill or two, has given a push to the business of the district which has resulted in a large increase of cottage property and population, and here it is that the East Cheshire Association has planted the standard of undogmatic Christianity.

At three o'clock the friends mustered at the Co-operative Hall, which is on the road from Denton to Hooley Hill, and a procession was formed, preceded by the Denton Old Band, numbering from five to six hundred people. A few minutes before four o'clock they arrived, after perambulating a portion of the streets, at the site of the new Mission Room, in Wilton-street, where there were present Richard Peacock, Esq., of Gorton Hall, Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (sub-treasurer of the East Cheshire Mission), P. M. Higginson, M.A. (secretary), G. H. Wells, M.A., Noah Green, J. G. Slater, Alexander Ashworth, William Harrison, F. H. Jones, B.A., Messrs. Thomas Thornely, Thomas Ashton, John Brooks, Thomas Barlow, John Phillips, Cropper Brierley, Z. Smith, John Oldham, Thomas Cook (Blackley), Charles Hibbert, Robert Kenyon, Dr. Marcus, W. N. Knowles, and R. S. Robinson. A short service having been held

Mr. ROBT. KENYON then, on behalf of the congregation, presented to Mr. Richd. Peacock a handsome engraved silver trowel, a mallet, and a neat square, with which to lay the foundation stone, and the work having been well done

Mr. PEACOCK said: Ladies and gentlemen,—I am informed that in the winter of 1875, a few thoughtful residents of this district—foremost amongst whom may be mentioned Mr. R. S. Redfern and Mr. Robert Kenyon—took the initiative in causing a series of lectures to be given, under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. During the delivery of this course it was seen that a number of persons attended whose sympathies were evidently in favour of the doctrines taught, and it was thought that if a few of these congenial minds could be brought together, they might perhaps form the germ of a future congregation. Upon the matter being brought before the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes, it was decided to take the Co-operative Hall for holding Sunday evening services, and these were commenced about Christmas 1875. The undertaking seemed to bear such a promise of future success, that a few of the congregation determined to try the experiment of a Sunday school, and one was opened on the 20th February, 1876, with about 15 scholars. These have continued to increase up to the present time, and the school now has 80 scholars, and 15 teachers, with every prospect of a further increase when better accommodation can be had. (Hear, hear.) This question of better and more accommodation being required is the cause of our meeting here this day, to lay the foundation stone of a building to be called the Unitarian Mission Room and Sunday School, to be used in furtherance of the objects the few truthseekers and freethinkers had in view when they modestly conceived the idea of opening a Sunday school with 15 scholars, and to infuse into the minds of their children the rational doctrines and religious opinions set forth in the series of lectures already alluded to. (Applause.) Let us hope that the broad and liberal views entertained by those worshipping under the name of Unitarian will take root in the new soil they have now found, and that the tree we have this day planted may prove to be a tree of knowledge, and that it will grow and flourish, and bring forth good and wholesome fruit in abundance for the happiness of man here and hereafter, and for the glorification of God everlastingly. (Hear, hear.) We all know that the question of religion has created great interest and more controversy in the minds of men than any other subject in the world. More differences of opinion exist, greater sums of money are spent, and larger quantities of blood have been spilt over this question than any other. And why? Because man's inhumanity to man is such that he cannot bear to see his neighbour look for any other track to heaven than the one he himself has selected; and yet men call themselves Christians. But what did Christ teach?—Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you. Fear God, and love your neighbours as yourselves. We need more charity, more toleration, less prejudice, less bigotry, and then we may hope for more friendship, more love for one another, and greater freedom in religion, and in all other things wherever we need it. (Applause.)

The hymn, "This stone to Thee in faith we lay," was then sung, and the choir of Gee Cross Chapel chanted the Lord's Prayer, after which the Rev. G. H. Wells pronounced the benediction.

The building is to be erected from plans and specifications prepared by Mr. A. Chorlton, of Stalybridge, who is also the contractor. It is to be of Gothic design, one storey high, to be built of brick simply relieved with stone dressings. It will contain a large room, 54ft. by 27ft., kitchen fitted with arrangements necessary for tea party and cleaning purposes, and a vestry or minister's retiring-room, together with the usual outbuildings. The roof will be of pitch pine, constructed upon the hammer-beam principle, and will consist of four principals of 27ft. space, springing from moulded stone corbels. The collar-beams, purlins, and rafters will be visible in the room to a height of 22ft., the whole of which will be stained and varnished at completion. A pitch pine screen will be erected around the front entrance, forming a vestibule, having a door to the right and left. It is contemplated to erect a rostrum, and other fittings, necessary for holding Sunday services. The large room will be capable of seating 300 people. The estimated cost of the whole building, including furnishing and boundary wall, is £800.

was held in the Co-operative Hall, when a large number took tea together, the Rev. H. E. Dowson occupying the chair.

Dr. MARCUS first addressed the meeting, and said he was anxious to show his interest in the cause at Denton, where he was not a stranger, having several times preached there on the Sunday; and he could assure them he had a deep and earnest interest in that day's proceedings. He trusted that there would be no "scamping work" in putting up the material building, but with that they must not be content. They had to build the spiritual temple, and that too must be well done, or the outcome of their day's proceedings would be poor indeed. He would therefore conclude by expressing the hope that they would carefully keep before them the duty of building up that spiritual temple as a means of producing a nobler, a higher, a better, and a purer life, and that the inhabitants generally might feel that what they had done that day was a good thing for Denton. (Applause.)

The Rev. F. H. JONES reminded the friends present of their indebtedness to Oldham for one of their most active labourers—one of the superintendents of their Oldham Sunday school, who had never ceased to take an active interest in the cause at Denton. He alluded to Mr. Robert Kenyon, who was at the centre of the life of the work they were doing. (Applause.) He then urged all the Denton friends to be loyal to the cause they had taken in hand; and while they were punctual in their attendance at worship, and trained up their children to be so too, not to let their Christianity degenerate into a mere matter of form, but to show itself in lives of practical usefulness.

The CHAIRMAN then read letters, including donations to the building fund, from Messrs. R. N. Phillips, M.P., John Grundy, of Summerseat, Joseph Broome and John Ashton, of Manchester, and Henry Greg, making up a sum of £275, and added that the collection on the ground had realised £15. 6s. He then said that some time ago various persons having settled down in Denton, now a rising place, from neighbouring congregations, application was made to the East Cheshire Christian Union for help in opening a place of worship. The Union did not then feel justified in acceding to the request as their hands were full, and they had no means, the cause at Glossop having only just been started. In June, 1875, the new chapel at Glossop was opened; Mr. Ashton was settled there, and the work prospered. Then they felt at liberty to begin the work at Denton. By a grant from the British and Foreign Association they began a course of lectures in that Hall, and he had the honour of giving the first lecture, Mr. Clay being in the chair. They met with a little opposition. The result was the cause grew, and they had a Sunday school of 80 children, in which rested their hope. But they had learned that they could not well prosper in lodgings—for lodgers were looked upon as waifs and strays—and so they now looked forward to a home of their own. (Applause.) Their tenancy, moreover, in that room might not be of long duration, as it was expected to be, shortly needed for trade purposes, besides they wanted a place in which to carry on their work at any time in the week; hence if they wished to thrive they must build a house for themselves—(hear, hear)—and so their proceedings that day had been brought about. Toward their new building he had promised to raise for them £200, and he was greatly rejoiced that he had got so far on the road towards raising that sum. They would see, therefore, that their intention was to stick to the movement in Denton. (Hear, hear.) A word then as to the kind of work to be done. The word Unitarian was not one that he cared much about, but it was the one by which they stood before the world—but he wished it to be understood not in any sectarian sense. (Hear, hear.) They did not come to convert the Roman Catholics or the Methodists. They rejoiced in every form of Christian work. They came to preach the Gospel of a practical religion—(hear, hear)—especially to those who neither go to church nor chapel. Their hope was to make Denton the better for their having come into it, and that by their efforts many a man and woman might grow, in their new church, as the home of their religious life, into useful citizens. (Applause.)

Mr. R. S. ROBINSON then gave a narrative of the work they had done in the past, and bore his testimony to the assiduous efforts of Mr. Kenyon and his family in sustaining their cause, after which Mr. Buckley, as a resident who had never been attached to any church, expressed his approval of the movement because of its undogmatic character. Then came the Rev. P. M. Higginson, who urged diligent attention to Sunday school work, and he was followed by the Rev. Noah Green, in a short and effective speech, after which the meeting was brought to a close.

During the evening the choir from the chapel at Gee Cross sang well several pieces of music.

LYE.—On Sunday last the annual Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Carey Walters, of Whitchurch. The collections amounted to £12. 14s. 6½d.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE PURPOSE OF RELIGION.

It is not the purpose of religion to teach men to be quick of intellect, capable of riddling all the secrets of this wide universe. It is well to have men so taught to use their minds, but it is not the direct and foremost work of religion. Into true religion right reasoning and clear thinking will enter as necessary constituents, but as aids, and not as the great end sought.

Morality alone does not constitute religion; the obeying of the conscience is one of the foremost elements of religion, but does not lead to the highest possibility open to the soul. There can be no true religion without morality, but yet it includes other elements and rises to nobler heights.

Religion is the setting of the life of man towards God in reverence, trust and love, and with the one supreme desire to be like Him. It is the reaching out of the imperfect towards the perfect in the natural desire of man to be at one with himself and in harmony with all about him.

The object of religion is to perfect man, and not in one but in all directions. Whatever cultivates man in the right sense is religious. Whatsoever lifts him from the gross and sensual, whatsoever puts new and better purposes into his life, whatsoever causes him to think more clearly, to live more truly, to have a higher moral rule of action is religious. All these are aids to religion, not to be despised, but to ever be made use of in their proper time and place. Religion is incomplete without right thinking and without right living, and when it is distinguished from these it is the quickening of the whole life with a mighty purpose to be in harmony with the All-Perfect, to do His will, think His thought and live His life. In having these desires, and in making every noble endeavour to realise them, we enter into the spirit and purpose of religion, and become religious. A life of outward beauty follows in consequence.

Religion is a force which enters into the life, attuning it to itself and with everything outward to itself. Life is its true expression, though it may try through other methods to realise something of that which it seeks. Ecclesiasticisms are its clothes, and symbols its ornaments. All life will clothe itself in some fashion: even Free Religion wears its loose robe. The clothes should, of course, be for comfort and made with view to ease of movement. Symbols are the ribbons and jewellery of the religious dress, pleasing to the taste, necessary to artistic effect, but not constituting an essential part of the dress.

It is not the dress, but that which it clothes, which constitutes religion. Let us ever bear this in mind. It would often save much confusion if we did. For a healthy life there must be proper food. There must be fresh air and vigorous exercise. Growth is the result: growth towards the All-Beauty, the All-Soul, and the All-Perfect. Nothing is religious in which this result is not ultimately found. The object of religion therefore is to produce unity between the human and the divine life.

THEOPHILUS.

GOD'S LIVING CHURCH.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER.

I TAKE this "Definition of Religious Life" to be as good and true as any we can get: pure morality, spiritual emotions, inwardness or the communion of the soul with God, and self-sacrifice. And then I say, with perfect confidence, that a church made up of such men and women is a church of the living God—or, rather, I would say that such men and women all the world over become the church of the living God, no matter what is their name exactly, as those who possess this four-fold power in a political and patriotic sense compose the American nationality, while the rest, by comparison, are only dry sticks, whose end is to be burned. For such a church there is continuance then, as there is for such a nation. It is bound with gold chains about the feet of God. It belongs to the primal truth He sent into the world by the prophets, the seers, and by His dearly beloved Son.

It has a share in His sovereignty, and sits down with him on His throne, while it is plastic to His hand, taking new shapes and blooming out into new surprises of worth and beauty and grace. Nothing is final with it but pure morals, spiritual fervour, inwardness and self-sacrifice, and these only as the grain of mustard seed is primal to the plant. This is the true secret of the success of any movement through which men and women are drawn together into a church of the living God to-day, in which they seek to tell His truth and to live the truth they tell. If in the heart of what they want to do there is this quality that fastens them to the throne of the Eternal, and in their own heart a high moral purpose, spiritual fervour, inwardness, and self-sacrifice, there can be no fear about the result any more than there can be about the result of the sun in summer.

But, once more, there can be no greater mistake than to suppose that there must be either unanimity of opinion or a standard of doctrine before there can be any true fellowship in this church for which I plead. If what I have said is true about the four-fold condition on our human side, opinions and doctrines are no more at the best than means to this end. And as now and then you light on some hapless man or woman, who, if following a standard book of cookery, will serve you the most atrocious messes that can be put on a table, while some Aunt Dinah, who does not know her alphabet, will set before you food fit for a king, and say, when you ask how she did it, "Why, honey, I took a pinch of this and a cup of that, and then there was the other things, you know, and the flour just right, and the baking," so it is with the Bread of Life, of which those who eat shall never hunger.

The late Rev. David Griffith.

ON several recent occasions it has been our sad duty to notice in these columns the departure of worthy and efficient ministers from spheres of labour which cannot but sorely miss them. It seems but yesterday that we had to mourn, with no common regret, the withdrawals of Thomas Elford Poynting and of Frederick Ashton, and now, to the sorrow of his attached congregation at Cheltenham, and of all who were privileged to share his friendship or his work, the name of David Griffith must be added to the list of those whose memories remind us that here we have no continuing city. Seeking rest and renewal of strength at St. Leonards-on-Sea, when the requirements of his health, never at any time, alas! too strong, demanded alike a mental and physical respite from his ministerial duties, an attack of illness, as unlooked for as it was brief, closed on Saturday last a gentle and a cultured career over which there seemed to rest, as his friends and brother ministers might with such apparently good reason hope, the promise of rich usefulness to others, and large happiness to himself, and to those who entered into the nearer circle of his intimacy. By the event, however, which has thus intervened, there falls upon us the solemn duty of retrospection of the life of him whose loss we so justly deplore.

David Griffith was born in 1826, on the banks of the Teivi, in South Wales; and, Welsh as he was by birth, his attachment to the traditions of his country continued undiminished to the end. He was educated for the ministry at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen; and from his studies there entered upon the work of the ministry at Aberdeen. From this, his first charge, whence he bore with him the testimonials of all friendly regard and good wishes, he was invited to Wareham, in Dorset, where his acceptable services were followed, if we mistake not, by those of the Rev. Maxwell Davidson. Another change found him, in the year 1856, as the minister of the Old Abbey Chapel, at Tavistock, and there amongst the people whom he publicly served, and the poor whom in simple secrecy he so effectually helped, his memory stands, and will long stand yet, begirt with the gratitude and the affection which his ministerial and pastoral work inspired. After a ten years' sojourn at Tavistock, a cordial invitation from the Bays-hill congregation at Cheltenham called him thither. He went, and the memorials of his work in this the last post wherein he faithfully served what he believed to be the claims of divine truth, are found in a united, an increasing, but now, alas! a sorrowing congregation; and in the new schoolroom which his devoted wife—a daughter of the late George Filliter, Esq., of Wareham, now left to mourn his loss—and himself endeavoured so earnestly and so successfully to raise. Not alone to his own congregation were his services loyally dedicated. In whatever concerned the prospects of our household of faith throughout the western district, he ever took an earnest and active interest; whilst one of the great secrets of his acceptance with those who trusted him in the congregation with which he was connected, was to be found in his identification of himself with the public interests of the localities in which he dwelt, and of this fact his services in connection with the Mechanics' Institute at Tavistock afford sufficient testimony. Again, in his duties as a minister he was ever known by those marks of culture and refinement with which a ministry such as ours can never afford to part with impunity; and whether we have regard to his position as a minister, or to his generous work as a pastor, wherein his left hand knew not what his right hand did, the loss of his departure and the extent of his friends' sorrow are alike great. Long will be the memory of his twelve years' faithful service at Cheltenham, where the brotherly and efficient succour of the Rev. John Robberds, B.A., so generously aided him in his work, when he was himself physically unequal to the demands upon it. Ill can such advocates be spared from the cause they served. But their very memory changes to an inspiration, and bids us who linger yet to be faithful in our day and generation, as were the men who served the Master and caught the Spirit of his message, like him who has thus passed on before us.

At the bi-monthly meeting of the committee of the Western Unitarian and Free Christian Union, held on Monday, July 15th, 1878, at Lewin's Mead Vestry, Bristol (the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., in the chair), it was moved by the chairman, seconded by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and agreed to in solemn silence: "That this committee learns with unaffected regret and sorrow of the death of the Rev. David Griffith, of Cheltenham; that it gratefully remembers his brotherly co-operation in its work, and his consistent and cultured advocacy of the principles of Liberal Christianity in the West of England; and that it hereby tenders to his bereaved congregation, and to her who must most truly mourn his loss, its deepest and most respectful sympathy."

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

BURNLEY.

WELCOME TO REV. THOMAS LEYLAND.

THE members of the Trafalgar-street Church assembled on Saturday evening, July 6th to welcome the Rev. Thomas Leyland as their minister. After tea a public meeting was held, and many friends were present from the neighbouring congregations.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Walter Blezard) expressed the great pleasure he had in presiding over the meeting on the settlement of a minister amongst them. Mr. Leyland had made a sacrifice in coming to them, but he trusted that they would rally round him and make him feel that they were all determined that liberal Christianity should make its way in their town.

Mr. ALEXANDER MACKIE, one of the oldest members of the church, gave the welcome to Mr. Leyland on behalf of the congregation. They had known Mr. Leyland a long time, never having lost sight of him since he preached for them as a student ten years ago. Without much hope that he would come they had invited him to be their minister, and were all proud that he had acceded to their desire, though they had little to offer him but hard work, and he hoped their hearty co-operation.

Mr. JOHN S. MACKIE, the superintendent of the Sunday school, then gave a hearty welcome on behalf of the teachers.

The Rev. H. S. SOLLY, of Padiham, welcomed Mr. Leyland on behalf of the District Missionary Association. In the course of his address Mr. Solly said it was pleasant to know that all the pulpits in their mission district were now supplied with ministers, and Mr. Leyland would not find himself so isolated as in Ireland, for their congregations were near together and there were many of them.

The CHAIRMAN said that at Burnley the Unitarians were few in number, but he was glad to say that they were united.

The Rev. W. MATTHEWS, of Colne, welcomed Mr. Leyland into the district on behalf of the Sunday School Union. He believed there was a grand future for liberal Christianity. If they put their energies into the work as the early Methodists did he believed their success would be as great.

The Rev. HY. HILL, of Rawtenstall, and the Rev. E. W. HOPKINSON, of Accrington, accorded the right hand of welcome on behalf of the ministers of the district.

The Rev. THOS. LEYLAND, in the course of his response to the various words of welcome accorded to him, said: After a ministry of nine years, six of which have been spent on Tyneside, and three in Ireland, he had a peculiar pleasure in responding to the welcome of the Burnley congregation, for with many in that congregation he had formed a lasting intimacy during his student days. In those days there were not so many of them, and they worshipped together in a far less ornate and less pleasant building than now. He well remembered the well-nigh inaccessible upper room over a manufactory which sent up odours, making the air seem incense laden. But they had happy times together then, and he looked forward to their having happy times together with their improved circumstances in the coming days. The earnest-hearted superintendent of their Sunday school had welcomed him to his department of work, and to that he could most heartily respond, because he felt that the school was the source of life for the church, and he would do all he could in any way the teachers and committee thought best for its interests. To the welcome of the East Lancashire Mission he felt it no little honour to respond, for that mission had stood forth as an example to all our other missions of the empire in its earnestness, patience and faithfulness, and he was proud to enter within its borders. The District Sunday School Union had accorded him a kindly greeting, and if the first meeting of its delegates he had attended that day was a fair sample of its doings, he counted upon a useful time with them. To the hearty words of the ministers who spoke on behalf of the ministers of that district he could heartily respond, for he had worked side by side with some of them in the good cause, and he expected to find amongst them all that ready sympathy and co-operation which he had failed to find among the so-called non-subscribers of Ireland. It had been said that he had made a sacrifice in leaving a large and established congregation such as Moneyrea was, to enter upon missionary work in Burnley. That depended, however, he thought, upon how the matter was looked at. For his part he could see little difference between a congregation helped by an endowment and a congregation helped by a mission committee. If there was any advantage he considered the mission had it, for there was generally a more earnest life in the mission church, and then it could always aim after self-support, whereas the endowed society had no such incentive to progress. He had begun as a minister of a mission, and had such respect and love for mission work that he was willing that his three years sojourn as minister of a settled congregation should be considered as a parenthesis in his missionary labours. In concluding, Mr. Leyland said:—I fully appreciate the many expressions of feeling which have been uttered to-night on behalf of the various societies, and I trust that this union between the Burnley congregation and myself may have the blessing of God upon it, and that it may be lasting and beneficial to us and to the people with whom we live.

The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. R. C. Smith, and, after the usual votes of thanks, it was brought to a close by the singing of a hymn by the assembly, and by prayer, pronounced by the minister.

In the course of the evening several glees were rendered in an excellent manner by members of the choir.

COLNE.

A NEW FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE memorial stone of a building to be called the Free Christian Church, was laid at Colne on Saturday afternoon last, by John Grundy, Esq., of Summerseat, near Bury.

Colne is a busy manufacturing town on the verge of Lancashire, a few miles distant from Burnley and Padiham, on the Yorkshire side of those towns. The population is mainly of the operative class, and, as in most Lancashire districts, the people take a thoroughly hearty and intelligent interest in all the stirring questions of the time. Adjacent to Colne are Rawden, Barrowford, and Nelson, from which most of the Nonconformist congregations in the town gather adherents, and from which also, it is hoped, the New Free Christian Church will secure supporters.

The movement for the establishment of a church of liberal theology in Colne, was begun in the winter of 1876, when a course of lectures was given in the Cloth Hall, under the auspices of the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The movement was especially under the charge of the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., of Padiham, who has throughout given to it unwearied aid, and who secured the services of several ministers as lecturers. The result of the lectures was the beginning of regular Sunday services in the Hall, and these proving successful in respect of numbers and in the zeal of the worshippers, the Rev. W. Matthews, then of Rawtenstall, was engaged by the East Lancashire Mission as the minister, and under him the congregation was formed into a Church, and a Sunday-school started. Presently it began to be felt that a more convenient and pleasant building than the Cloth Hall must be secured if the Church were to carry on its work efficiently and grow into strength. After considerable difficulty a suitable site was obtained in Stanley-street. The designs of Mr. Virgil Anderton, architect, of Padiham, were accepted, and the work of erection was begun.

The cost of the structure is estimated at about £2,000, and towards this sum £1,450 has been promised, including liberal grants from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and the subscriptions of the congregation. The structure will be built of stone, in the geometric style, and the body of the building is to be 50ft. by 32ft., the chancel 16ft. by 11ft., the organ chamber 11ft. 3in. by 10ft. 3in., and the vestry 11ft. 6in. by 11ft. The roof at the highest point will be 26ft. from the chapel floor. The seats of the chapel are to be open benches, and the place will accommodate about 300 persons.

On Saturday afternoon, in beautiful weather, a large company assembled at Cloth Hall, consisting of the members of the congregation, and numerous friends from Padiham, Burnley, Accrington, and Newchurch. They marched in procession to the site of the new Church in Stanley-street, where a short service was held, the ministers accompanying Mr. John Grundy being the Revs. W. Matthews, resident minister; H. S. Solly, M.A., Padiham; S. Fletcher Williams, Liverpool; T. Leyland, Burnley; E. Hopkinson, Accrington; E. Turland, Ainsworth; A. Lazenby, Newchurch; C. H. Osler, Over Darwen; J. Pollard, Belfast, &c. General regret was expressed at the absence of the Revs. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S., of Bolton, and D. Walmsley, B.A., of Bury, the secretaries of the Mission. Mr. Coe was prevented from attending by an unfortunate accident which has lamed him; and Mr. Walmsley by the necessity of leaving home for services the following day at Chowbent.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE.

After the hymn "O God! this stone to thee we lay" (composed for the occasion by the minister, the Rev. W. Matthews) had been sung, Rev. H. S. SOLLY, Padiham, read as the Scripture lesson 1 Cor., iii., and offered up an appropriate prayer.

Rev. W. MATTHEWS then said it was rather over sixteen months since he came to Colne and since their church was organised. Hitherto they had had to meet in the Cloth Hall, and he believed that there people could give testimony that they had spent many happy hours and enjoyed many services. They were now entering upon a new era of their life. They were laying a memorial stone of their own church, and it was calculated to make their hearts glow with affection and gratitude to God, that they were enabled to raise a temple to His name for the benefit of themselves, and the benefit, he hoped, of thousands of children yet unborn. They believed their principles to be in accordance with the teaching of the Gospel of Christ; and, because of that, they endeavoured to propagate them with all the vigour, and energy, and love that God had endowed them with. He then stated that the bottle about to be deposited in the cavity of the stone contained the Report of the East Lancashire Mission of 1876, and with it an account, prepared by Mr. Solly, of Padiham, giving a history of Unitarian services in connection with Colne, previous to, and down to, the present time; also a report of the East Lancashire Mission for 1877; a list of the members of the church (about 34), and about 40 scholars; a programme of the day's proceedings; copies of the denominational and of the district papers. The next business was "The presenting, on behalf of the congregation, of a new silver trowel to John Grundy, Esq., on the occasion of his laying the memorial stone, July 13th, 1878." He trusted that his (Mr. Grundy's) life would be long spared to perform similar services to the one he was about to perform. He thought that they should labour until every town, with a population something like Colne, had the privilege of hearing the principles of what was sometimes termed Unitarian Christianity. They claimed to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience and the light which God had given to them. They granted that liberty to everybody else, and they only wished that every section of the Christian Church might succeed in lessening vice, reducing misery, and in bringing souls to their great Father—God. On that ground they could all work to accomplish some good in the world. He had great pleasure in presenting Mr. Grundy with the trowel and mallet, in order to lay the memorial stone of their new building.

Mr. JOHN GRUNDY, after declaring the stone truly laid, said: Ladies and gentlemen, having laid the memorial stone of this building, dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, in the Spirit and according to the precepts of His Son our brother, Jesus Christ, I turn to you in the exercise of the privilege which that duty accords to me. I have laid this stone in the faith that the interests of the church will be committed to faithful men and women; in the hope that it may bless not only those who are immediately connected with it, but the thriving community of Colne. I have laid it, too, in the spirit of universal charity—the culminating virtue of Christianity, encircling all the children of God. Religion is not only most intimately connected with the bright hope of immortality and the blessedness of a future state, but it deeply concerns man in his social capacity, as well as the collective nations of the world. Having referred to the superior and elevating tendency of Christianity as compared with the crude religions of rude barbarians, he said that Christianity taught the enlightened to instruct the ignorant. Its spirit had abolished slavery from all the leading nations of the world. It had blessed and made sacred the marriage tie, and raised woman from a plaything and slave to be the companion and friend of man; and, since the great Founder had placed his hand upon the head of the child, it had protected the weak. And not yet were all its victories won. It was not until Christian principles were rightly understood by the nations, and the Gospel had spread through the world, that the beneficial effects of Christianity would be fairly manifested. He might be asked, Why come to Colne to lay the corner stone of a Unitarian Church? or do we want a Unitarian Church in Colne? Some would ask these questions with much doubt. It was true that he and his friends on the platform worshipped God, with St. Paul, after the manner men called heresy; but they did believe that in these times more than ever it was an incumbent duty upon them to endeavour to spread amongst the people the great principles of Unitarian Christianity. He then alluded to the struggles which are taking place in the churches of Scotland, amongst their best men, to be free to teach the truth of God as they receive it in their own spirit from Him. No church in England, Scotland, or Ireland stood upon the foundation of perfect freedom except the Unitarian Church. When this struggle was going on in the minds of men, and this spirit of inquiry was abroad, it was of importance to society that their principles should be declared by God's servants among them, untrammelled as they were by creeds and by the authority of others. He said it with pride that they were free. They kissed not the toe of the Prophet at Mecca, or the Pope at Rome. They declined the assistance of convocation, conference, synod, or Presbyters, and all such authorities which did not come from God. The speaker then referred to the free position the minister would occupy, and took occasion to speak in eulogistic terms of Mr. Matthews's abilities, and exhorted the congregation to help him in all his good works. He would be found a minister of God just in the proportion that he had the Divine Spirit of the Father within him; he would entitle himself to be called a Christian minister just in proportion as he showed a Christian character in his conversation and in his life. From him it would be heard that they held by the great central truths of the absolute Unity of God, one indivisible Being, and of the universal brotherhood of mankind. They did not believe that the inspiration of God's Spirit was locked up in a book, or confined to the past, and that mankind had only to hear its echo. But they believed that now He besets them behind and before; that He never leaves himself without a witness in the world; that He at this moment inspires all great and good men; every child of His who, in the spirit of his firstborn Son, dedicates his life to the benefit of humanity. Those were principles that ought to be well understood, and he thought that, if properly understood, they would be appreciated by the hard-headed men of Colne. They were not there in a spirit of denominational pride. They did not wish to set sect against sect, or to increase the rivalry amongst the churches. But they thought that they had a distinct message to the great heart of the people, and they would deliver it in charity. They would look with satisfaction and pleasure on every well directed effort to spread pure Christianity amongst the people by others. He was certain that in their undertaking they were doing their duty, especially to those by whom they were more immediately surrounded. He was also satisfied that the more they could spread religion the more honest, sober, virtuous, and happy the people would be; for it had been truly said that "religion has her seal in the bosom of God, and her voice should be the harmony of the world." But, alas! that they should have so much strife arising out of bigotry, and intolerance, and superstition. However, it was not the part of true and manly men to sit down and weep, but to take courage and perform their duty as they saw it before them. They had, therefore, a message worth delivering, because it had been said, and truly, that nothing was more conspicuous in the history of man than vice. But, just in proportion as pure and practical religion was spread among the people, do individuals become prosperous and happy, and nations orderly and good. (Applause.)

After the hymn, "The perfect world by Adam trod," had been sung,

The Rev. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS, of Liverpool, addressed the assembly. He observed that they had met together for a distinctly religious purpose. They represented principles which, until within a recent period, had no expression in Colne, but which, when they came to be expressed, found a ready and hearty response in the hearts and minds of numbers of the people in the neighbourhood. That response had been such as to justify a movement for the establishment of a comfortable place of worship, where those to whom their principles were strength and peace might meet from week to week to deepen the foundations and renew the warmth of their best and highest life. What were those principles? They were, first and supremely, religious principles. They who were there assembled were not mere doctrinalists, holding the culture of piety as a subordinate thing; they were first and supremely religious worshippers, believing certain doctrines because they had been impelled to the conclusion that those doctrines were more calculated than any others to make for piety. They put in the front their belief not only that the religious sentiment existed, but that it was the most permanent and important element of man's being. They held that man had been made by God with a nature which was essentially religious, and that he was constrained by imperious moral necessities to express his wonder, awe, veneration, and love in the forms and offices of worship. After some further reference to religion as the radical force of society, the emancipator and inspirer of the individual soul, and the producer of the loftiest types of character, and as, amidst the crumbling of creeds, abiding and living the supreme interest of humanity, and the redeeming power of human life, the speaker said: But, as believers in the primary importance of the religious principle we do not stand alone. Every church and every Sabbath congregation in Colne are a testimony that our neighbours hold, and hold as deeply as ourselves, the same conviction. Our belief in the religious principle is theirs also, and therefore it does not differentiate us from them. We, therefore, proceed to say that this religious principle receives the largest measure of truth, and so attains the truest strength and exercises the most regenerative and ennobling influence in an atmosphere of freedom. And here we touch the line which separates us from all other churches. They hold that the religious principle is best cultured by training it with and into a creed, and making the creed the judge of thought, the test of life, and even the measure of God's favour. We hold that the religious principle is best cultured, that it is carried to its richest development, and that it entreasures the world with the most precious results, both in thought and life, when it is left to seek after truth wheresoever the Spirit of Truth, which is the Spirit of God, leads it. They say that it thrives best within the enclosure of articles and confessions of faith; we say that it thrives best by giving it access to the open air, allowing its roots to find feeding ground in any and every congenial soul, and permitting them to grow according to their own sweet will. Hence, while, like other churches, we are believers in the fundamental and permanent religious element in man's being, we are, unlike other churches, believers in entire mental freedom as the atmosphere in which that element most naturally, vigorously, and fruit-bearingly unfolds. But, it is asked, with this liberty for the religious principle to fashion for itself what intellectual forms it may, does there not result a great variety of opinions? and is it not difficult to establish a church upon such a basis as differences of thought? I answer, first, that variety of opinions there always must be among men who think for themselves. So long as we know but in part, all men will not see all things alike. So long as it is human to err, to be ignorant of many things and to be mistaken in some is the necessary condition of humanity. Every wise man, therefore, will allow others the same liberty of thinking which he desires they should allow him. Variety of opinions is the necessary result; and there is no alternative except enslavement to a creed or a priesthood. Such an alternative we have, as a solemn duty to God, to our own conscience, to the cause of religion, deliberately rejected; and have taken our standpoint on the principle, as the very life-breath of religion, that everyone has it laid upon him as a solemn charge from heaven to follow the dictates of his own conscience and the conclusions of his own judgment in simplicity and godly sincerity. He must be fully persuaded in his own mind, and then act according to the best light he has. He has no power to constrain another to think with him. God has given no right to any man, to any Conference, Assembly, Synod, or Union, thus to lord it over the consciences of his children; but every man must judge for himself, as every man must give account of himself to God. But this dependence of each one upon himself to decide as to the theological expression of the religious principle—a dependence which is no less a duty than a right—results in agreements far more essential than the perhaps more palpable differences. There are amongst us differences in our conceptions of God, of Christ, of salvation, of immortality—or rather, I should say, more accurately, differences in our modes of expressing our conceptions, and these differences are the things that first strike an observer; but a thoughtful inquiry reveals an underlying oneness. We are substantially at one that God is an Infinite Father, and that all ideas which intensify that central light of our theology must be the outshining of the Eternal Sun. We are substantially at one that Jesus Christ is the spiritual ideal of humanity, and that the reproduction of his life of goodness is our highest possible attainment. We are substantially at one that salvation comes from the influence of his life and death, and from all other influences, leading us to spiritual union with God. We are substantially at one that immortality, under all possible conditions, is an endless progress to the centre of all life, the fountain of all love, the source of all light. Thus there comes something, at least, of an answer to the second question, as to the difficulty of building a church on a variety of opinions. The varieties are more apparent than real. The unities are more real than apparent. But I go further, and affirm that the question betrays an erroneous conception of the basis of a church. The basis of Christian fellowship is not uniformity of thought, but brotherhood of spirit. Not to think alike, but to love alike forms the strongest bond. Oneness of affection, not oneness of opinion, makes the real church. There is no difficulty in establishing a church on the foundation of the love of God and man, accompanied with great diversities of intellectual belief, except the difficulty which arises from the hold sectarian theologies have upon the minds of men.

Here, at any rate, in the church about to be built, the experiment will be tried, and I have no doubt it will be as successful here as it has been, and is, in numerous towns in this county and in this country. Herein this church will be distinguished from all other churches in this town. It will be at one with them in cultivating the religious principle, in lifting man nearer to his highest self and so nearer to God. But it will stand apart from—I will add that it will stand above—they, on a higher level than they, in providing for that religious principle a free course that it may be glorified. It will put up no set of theological tenets as the conditions of entrance to it. It will not insist upon the acceptance of certain opinions as requisites for membership. It will not trench upon the freedom of its worshippers by imposing any articles, creeds, or confessions of faith to which they must surrender their judgment and bow their knee or perish everlastingly. Alone of all churches in this district, I venture to affirm, it will proclaim that the kingdom of God which is within the soul is not in the attitude of the intellect towards God and Christ and immortality, but in love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. Its platform, theologically considered, will be faith in man as able of himself to judge of truth and to do right, and faith in God as loving all His children alike, whatever may be their opinions—faith in man as, here and hereafter, God's inalienable child, and faith in God as, in this world and in all worlds to come, in time and in eternity, man's Saviour, Friend, and Father. Practically considered, it will be faith in reclaiming the erring, uplifting the fallen, teaching the ignorant, visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and keeping the soul unspotted from the world, as the only pure and undefiled religion. Hence it will proclaim as the bond of its communion—Whosoever doeth the will of our Father in Heaven, the same is our brother and our sister. (Applause.)

EVENING MEETING.

The procession then returned to the Cloth Hall, where tea was prepared, and a numerous company sat down. After tea a public meeting was held in the Hall, presided over by J. GRUNDY, Esq. He was supported on the platform by the ministers before mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, said that the duty incumbent upon them as a church was that they would be expected to place themselves before the inhabitants of Colne as people worthy of the name of Christians, devoted to good works, and sincerely desirous to honour God by the practice of virtue in obedience to His laws. It was not enough for them to resolve to perform such a duty, but they must consider the most successful way of doing it; and they must endeavour, at all events in Colne, to relieve the Unitarian body from a reproach that was often, and he feared deservedly, cast upon it, of inattention to the duty of public worship. He would have them to understand that to his mind it was not sufficient that a person should enrol himself on the list of church members, so called, and pay an annual subscription, and come to chapel now and then, and more especially when there was an eloquent and gifted man to preach to them. But it was their duty, "in season and out of season," to show their fidelity by attending regularly their place of worship. It was also necessary that they should respect their minister, and be resolved that the institutions of the church should prosper. Nothing was more damping to a minister than to see the benches or pews comparatively empty. They lived in a beautiful locality, but he hoped that they would not be tempted to neglect their religious duties in order to walk the fields and hills. He would also have them bear in mind that if their church had to take root in Colne they must work hard in the Sunday school. Some future day he trusted that they would take upon themselves the responsibility of a day school; but be that as it may, it was his belief that no Christian church could live without its members working, and more especially without attention being devoted to the interests of the Sunday school. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) They must be kind and considerate to their minister, for they would find him a man of deep conviction and perhaps of sensitive nature. It would paralyse all his efforts if he did not receive their confidence. If they wished to make an impression upon society they must train up the children in the way they should go. They must let their religion consecrate the domestic hearth. Every mother must have her child at her knee, and teach it to lisp its earliest prayer to God, in the spirit of grateful thanksgiving. The success of the church depended largely on the women, who would do well to form themselves into a society, to use their influence in the neighbourhood for the cultivation of habits of sobriety and virtue. He wished them to baptise their children in the reverence of God and the love of Christ, and train them to live a Christ-like life. They were told by some that religion was a delusion. Believe it not. Could they conceive of what the state of society would be if all religious restraint were banished from the land? Where would the poor and the weak be if the rich and the powerful men had no restraint but what human laws put upon them? No, men must know that they were living under the eye of a merciful and loving Father, but who visits iniquity and wrong-doing with condemnation. He appealed to them to adhere to the great principles which Christ, their brother, had taught them, to carry them out in their lives, and so make themselves an example to those by whom they were surrounded; and then the day would come when people who now despised their little household of faith as a pernicious nest of heretics would be bound to believe that there was something valuable in what they taught. They were told to dispense with Christianity; but they could not do that, because it had been a blessing to the world, and was not to be blamed for all the bigotry and superstition that men have put upon it. It was of Divine origin, and was intended to be the religion of all the nations of the earth. (Applause.)

Rev. W. MATTHEWS then read letters of apology for absence, through unavoidable circumstances, from Revs. C. C. Coe and D. Walmsley, and also letters excusing their non-attendance from the Rector of Colne and the Nonconformist ministers of the town.

The Revs. E. TURLAND and H. S. SOLLV, in pithy, practical addresses, followed up the remarks of the Chairman.

The Rev. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS, in his remarks, dwelt upon the church as the representative and the beginner in that neighbourhood of a reformation wanted at the present day in all the churches—a reformation that would welcome the fullest free inquiry into all subjects of religion, that would stand openly for the best that it thought and knew, and that would admit the fullest fellowship and brotherhood amongst religious people who held different theological views.

The Rev. E. HOPKINSON advised the congregation not always to be intellectual gladiators, combating the questions of Unitarianism versus Trinitarianism, or vice versa, but to work in a spirit of charity towards every other church.

Other short interesting addresses were given by Revs. C. H. OSLER and T. LEYLAND.

The proceedings were interspersed with singing by the choir.

The collections for the day amounted to £14. 6s. 5d.

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

ERRATUM.—The statement in our report of Camarthen College attributing "senior Greek to Professor Jones" is an error. All the Greek is in the department of the Principal, Dr. Vance Smith.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. R. Cowley Smith has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the pulpit at South Shields.—The Rev. David Scott, of Liverpool, has received and accepted an invitation to become the minister at Dewsbury, and will take charge of the pulpit on the 28th inst.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday, July 14th, Mr. George Thomas Walters gave a reply to a lecture delivered the previous Sunday by Dr. Sexton, in the Evangelical Union Church, subject, "The Punishment of the Wicked: will it be eternal?" There being only morning service at the church during the summer months, Mr. Walters was able to be present at Dr. Sexton's lecture. The intention of giving a reply was well advertised, and secured a very large and attentive congregation.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday last the third meeting of the season of this union was held here. The attendance was not so good as might reasonably be expected, considering the beautiful state of the weather, which was everything that could be desired. Only about 50 persons were present. A paper was read by Mr. Ellis Greenhalgh, of Ainsworth, on "Do our Sunday school teachers do their duty?" An instructive discussion followed, in which the following gentlemen took part—Messrs. Duckworth, Schofield, Barrett, A. Firth, S. Healey, William Healey, jun., of Heywood; Mr. Jones, Stand; William Crossley, of Bury; and Mr. Rees, of Manchester. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to the essayist for his paper, which brought the meeting to a close.

BURNLEY.—On Friday last the Sunday school and congregation held their annual fete in a field adjoining Cemetery Lane. The children assembled in the school-room at eleven o'clock and proceeded to the field, where they were joined by their elders in the course of the afternoon. A cricket match and many other games were entered into with complete heartiness. Coffee, buns, nuts, and sweets were supplied to both young and old. The weather was splendid, and the cool shades of evening closed one of the happiest field days ever held by this flourishing school and its friends.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST-STREET CHAPEL.—The annual floral services were held in the afternoon and evening of Sunday last. A large space in front of the pulpit was occupied with flowers and greenhouse plants, tastefully arranged, which presented a more beautiful display than in former years. In the afternoon a large number of the Sunday scholars and congregation brought with them bunches of flowers, many beautifully arranged in bouquets, which they freely gave for the hospitals, and of which five large baskets full were collected and divided between the Queen's, the Children's, and the Homœopathic Hospitals. The service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, when the chapel was crowded. The Rev. B. Wright preached to a large congregation in the evening. An offering was taken at the doors to defray expenses, and towards the Sunday-school summer excursion. On the following Tuesday the annual trip took place, when the Sunday-scholars, teachers, congregation, and friends, nearly 600, made a delightful excursion to the village of Shustoke. The scholars were supplied with a good tea, and enjoyed a variety of sports and games. A brass band accompanied the party, and the weather being most favourable a delightful day was spent together, which will long be remembered.

DONCASTER.—A very successful Sunday-school anniversary was held here last Sunday. The Rev. J. Fraser preached on "How to develop the affections of a child's heart, and heighten the aspirations of its soul," to a very good congregation. A number of pieces of prose and poetry were recited by some of the children, while some beautiful hymns and anthems were rendered by the choir and little ones. The collection more than doubled that of last year.

EDINBURGH.—On Saturday, the 6th instant, the scholars and friends of St. Mark's Sunday school made an excursion by rail and cart to Hopetown House, South Queensferry. The weather was all that could be wished, and the day was spent in the splendid grounds overlooking the Forth.

HULME: EMBDEN-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Saturday last the first of a series of summer excursions in connection with the above school took place. About 30 teachers and elder scholars, including the Rev. J. Harrop, and Mr. S. Barnes, superintendent, went to the village of Prestwich, where a substantial tea was provided. The return journey was taken through Mere Clough, on to Pendleton, and the excursion was well enjoyed.

HEYWOOD.—On Monday, July 8th, the members of the chapel choir had a trip, through the kind generosity of a few friends, to Skipton and Bolton Abbey. Alighting at 8.30 at Skipton, our friends made their way to the Unicorn Inn, where a good substantial breakfast awaited them. Afterwards they visited Skipton Castle and Bolton Abbey, and walked a distance of about three miles through Bolton Wood and onward to the ruins of Bardon Tower. Leaving Skipton per 8.15 train the party arrived home at half-past ten, having spent a most enjoyable and happy day together.

HULL: BOWTALLEY LANE CHAPEL.—The Sunday school scholars, teachers, and friends had their annual excursion, on Wednesday, 10th inst. The place selected this year was Welton Dale, one of the most beautiful parts of East Riding. The day was fine, and the party thoroughly enjoyed themselves.

LONDON: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, KENTISH TOWN.—The Sunday school had its twentieth annual excursion on Friday last, July 12th. The party was a large one, consisting of some 250 scholars, parents, teachers, and friends, who went to East Barnet and Hadley Wood. The day was fine, and what with various games and rambles in the wood and fields was a most enjoyable one. Before starting for home, the children, &c., were called together, and joined in the singing of several hymns, finishing up with hearty hurrahs for the friends who had subscribed towards the expenses, and the Rev. P. W. Clayden, pastor of the church.

LONDON: BIBLE READING SOCIETIES.—On July 5, the annual tea meeting of the North London Bible Reading Societies took place at Newington Green Chapel, under the presidency of the Rev. J. D. Hirst Smyth. The societies assembled for tea at half-past five. Miss Marian Pritchard, the hostess, had provided a most elegant tea, of which 74 persons partook. The chapel was tastefully decorated with beautiful flowers, among which roses were the chief. After tea the number was augmented to 110. Mr. Smyth took the chair at seven o'clock, and after a hymn and prayer, and a few words of introduction, the annual reports of the different societies were read. This was done by some of the younger members. The Rev. T. W. Freckelton then read the reports of the three local theological classes, that at Newington Green, at Stamford-street, and at Unity Church. Mr. Smith then gave an interesting and valuable address on the subject of the evening "Prayer." In this he expressed great sympathy with the societies' efforts, and also expressed a wish to see a quarterly prayer meeting held in that chapel. Mr. Freckelton then spoke on the same subject—prayer—and in the course of his remarks took some exception to a statement of Mr. Smyth's to the effect that we were never to tire of prayer, that if we did not find benefit from prayer we were to pray until we did, indeed we were to weary God out of prayer. Mr. Freckelton objected to this insistence of prayer. The Rev. H. Ierson, in a very earnest speech, endeavoured to reconcile the statements of the two previous speakers. "The wearying God out," which was quite consonant with the teaching of the New Testament—referring to the widow and the unjust judge—might, he thought, be reconciled with the no prayer of Mr. Freckelton in this way—that if our hearts were right with God, if we were still striving to do his will, even though we did not actually pray in words, yet God, who knew our hearts, would in the end answer us; for he could suppose that even the widow was not always beseeching the judge, she might simply sit still outside the court—the judge knew she was there and what was in her heart, and in the end answered her demand. Mr. Ierson gave his very warmest sympathy to the societies, and stated it as his belief that five-sixths of what the orthodox meant when they said that Unitarians were cold was that they were not a praying people, and that nothing struck him more than this absence of prayer when he first joined the Unitarian body. He believed the Spirit was doing this work, causing the formation of these prayer meetings among Unitarians. The Rev. R. Spears said he never had any of the difficulty about prayer that troubled some people. He prayed simply as a child to his father. After a hymn, the meeting was brought to a close by some words of reverent prayer from Mr. Turner, of Newington Green.

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET.—On Sunday, July 15th, the Band of Hope held its usual quarterly party, which assumed the form of a treat in the country. Through the kindness of Mr. McTaggart, of St. Michael's, we enjoyed the use of a field of considerable natural picturesqueness, and spent a most delightful afternoon.

MOTTRAM.—Last Sunday the annual procession of teachers, scholars, and members of the congregations, numbering over three hundred, marched through the village. At the Market Cross a hymn was sung by the children and friends, after which the Rev. N. Green delivered an address on "Liberal Christianity," the number having at this time reached between four and five hundred persons. At the conclusion of the address another hymn was sung, and the procession returned to the chapel. In the evening the chapel was filled to hear the scholars recite and sing, and to witness the distribution of prizes. Over one hundred prizes in books were awarded for regular attendance during the year. Beside the prizes given by the school, five certificates were given from the Manchester District Sunday School Association to scholars who had passed a successful examination in the Life of Christ.

MONEYREA (IRELAND).—On Friday evening, June 28th, a farewell soirée was held to bid good-bye to the Rev. Thos. Leyland on his removal to England, to take the pastorate of the congregation at Burnley. An engrossed and framed address was presented by Mr. David McMaster, the secretary of the congregation, and a purse of gold was presented by Mr. Nathaniel S. Bodell, the treasurer. Mr. Leyland made a suitable reply, in which he referred to the pleasant intercourse he had had with many of them. If the presbyteries had been too narrow for his entrance, and if the non-subscribers had kept him out of their association, he had found a three years' haven in the hearts of his people. He was sorry to part from them, but duty seemed to point to more active scenes of labour amongst the working population of his native county in England. During the evening kind words of farewell were given by the Rev. J. C. Street (who presided on the occasion), Revs. Prof. Orr, W. O. McGowan, H. A. McGowan, A. Buckley, by Messrs. Fisher, Neill, Darbishire, Davids, and by several members of the congregation. On Sunday, the 30th of June, Mr. Leyland preached his farewell sermon to a large and attentive congregation. Taking for his text the words of the Apostle, "I have declared unto you the whole counsel of God," he reviewed his brief ministry amongst them, and expressed his gratitude that in a land in which even the liberals were willing to have their old fetters reformed, he had been allowed to preach the Gospel of the free faith, not only in freedom, but to an appreciative people. In concluding he said: "During our sojourn together you have become ecclesiastically free; stand fast in your freedom; I commend you to God, and I bid you farewell."

NOTTINGHAM: HIGH PAVEMENT.—On May 22nd the High Pavement Church was visited by Mr. W. J. Harrison, curator of the Leicester town museum, with a view to examining its acoustic defects and prescribing a remedy. Mr. Harrison recommended a very elaborate series of thin wires, which have been put up and supplemented by some additional ones suggested by Mr. J. B. Carter. Many testimonies of the happy effect of this contrivance have been received, in breaking up the echoes that have been complained of. Mr. Harrison advised the further use of drapery should the wires not completely cure the evil. Would it not be wise, in all future contracts with architects and builders, to stipulate that new chapels should be so constructed that people could hear in them? On the 27th of June the congregation had an excursion to Donington Park, and everybody enjoyed the visit. The adjourned meeting of the Provident Society was held on June 3rd, but the question of registration was not settled, and was further adjourned till September 2nd. The certificates gained by the High Pavement Sunday scholars were distributed on the afternoon of June 2nd, by Mr. William Gill. The following is an abstract of the results of the examination, so far as the Nottingham schools are concerned:—

POOLE: FLOWER SERVICES.—On the 30th ult., special flower services were held, and collections made on behalf of the Sunday schools. In the morning the Rev. W. Agar dwelt in an impressive discourse upon the "Elevating and Purifying Influence of the Element of Beauty in the Providential Arrangements of the Creator," and in the evening drew practical lessons from the same source. The committee were abundantly supplied with choice flowers from various friends in the town and neighbourhood, and the chapel was decorated in excellent taste, places of honour being given to bouquets of wild flowers sent in for competition by the Sunday school scholars. We are gratified to learn that upwards of a dozen of the Wareham congregation were present, and should be only too glad to hear that effectual steps were being taken to re-open the chapel there.

STUDENTS OF THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—The annual reunion of past, present, and incoming students, took place last Friday week at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. Besides those mentioned below as speakers, the following ministers were present: Revs. W. R. Smyth, Birmingham; A. Webster, Perth; W. S. Smith, Antrim; J. McDowell, Pendleton; W. Mellor, Crewe; J. J. Wright, Leicester; E. H. Bolland, Crediton; H. Rylett, Reading; and C. H. Osler, Over Darwen. There were also present Rev. J. Black, M.A., missionary tutor, all the present students of the Board, three of the incoming students, and several ladies. After tea the chair was taken, at 6.30, by Mr. W. Mason. After some preliminary remarks the chairman called upon Mr. D. Rees, who proposed "Welcome to the Incoming Students." This sentiment, which was warmly received, was responded to by Mr. P. Holt, of Astley. Mr. W. C. Bowie then proposed "Welcome to the Visitors." To this Revs. J. C. Street, Belfast; H. Williamson, Dundee; and W. Mitchell, Glasgow, responded. The chairman then, in feeling terms, bade farewell to the retiring students, Messrs. J. Moore and E. Crooks, each making a suitable and affecting reply. Next the Rev. J. Cuckson, Birmingham, proposed in well chosen words "Prosperity to the Home Missionary Board." Rev. J. Black, M.A., responded. The remainder of a very pleasant evening was devoted to various games, vocal and instrumental music, recitations, and dancing. In conclusion the company joined in singing "Auld Lang Syne."

TAUNTON.—The children attending the Mary-street Chapel schools had their summer treat on Thursday and were conveyed in waggons and vans to Cothelstone where they scattered themselves all over the hill, and were soon engaged in all kinds of amusements. Mr. Pile, optician, of East-street, whose kindness was greatly appreciated, had his large telescope mounted by the old tower, and splendid views of the surrounding country were obtained. During the afternoon games were continued until seven o'clock, when the muster-roll was called, and after a few words from the Rev. John Birks, pastor, expressive of thankfulness to God for the pleasures of the day, the doxology was sung, and preparations made for the return journey.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY AND THE LATE EARL RUSSELL.—The following answer of Countess Russell to the resolution of the Assembly has been received by the secretary: "Drummond Arms, St. Fillans, Loch Earn, near Crieff, July 13th, 1878. Countess Russell presents her compliments to Mr. Dowson, and acknowledges with heartfelt gratitude the receipt of the resolution passed by the Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers and congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire, at Southport, on June 20th. Such a testimony to the memory of Earl Russell, joined with the sympathy expressed towards herself, will be deeply valued by Countess Russell."

TODMORDEN.—The scholars of the Unitarian Sunday School had their annual picnic last Saturday afternoon, accompanied by the Rev. L. Taplin, M.A., and Mr. J. Crabtree, one of the superintendents. Altogether about 500 persons proceeded to a field near Dobroyd Castle (kindly placed at their service by Mr. John Fielden). The Castle-street brass band headed the procession, the pleasing appearance of which was greatly heightened by the number and variety of the banners displayed. About half-past five o'clock buns and tea were served in the field. Rain came on after tea, and caused many to return home. The remnants of the party were organised into a procession about 8.30, and returned to town.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editors.—In a note on the current number of the Theological, you confound Will. C. Smith, the author of the article upon "Religious Freedom in Scotland," with Dr. Walter C. Smith, who was once a heretic, but has not been so regarded for several years. I am all the more inclined to call attention to the error because the same mistake was made on a former occasion.

IS A SCIENCE OF THEOLOGY POSSIBLE?

To the Editors.—In your last week's "leader" you make the following statement: "Either theology is, or it is not, worthy of the name of a science;" and your subsequent remarks lead one to infer that you believe that it is "worthy" of such a title. Now, since upon the answer we give to this question—"Is a science of theology possible?" depends the value we attach to theological doctrines, just as our appreciation of the science of astronomy depends upon the strength of our belief in the trustworthiness and certainty of its facts, I should like to know, sirs, upon what grounds you believe theology "worthy" to rank as a science? It is a question that has long and anxiously occupied my own thoughts; and, as far as I have been able to see at present, I cannot infer anything more than a negative conclusion.

For, it seems to me, we must either enlarge the meaning of the word Science as at present used, or more strictly speaking, give it a wider application, or else we must relegate Theology to the realm of pure hypotheses. Science proper deals only with phenomena, and with physical phenomena, their laws and relations. The word is employed to denote "a system of organised knowledge." And what is special in all scientific knowledge is, that every accepted fact is capable of demonstration. Its language is—"this is," or "this is not," "this does," or "this does not happen." Its speech is all positives. It knows nothing of "perhaps," or "may be." Is this so theologically? Is it possible to construct a science out of the "unknowable"? Theology is "a discourse concerning God." What do we know about God that can be said to be scientifically established?

What many earnest religious minds are patiently waiting (for I fear doomed for ever to disappointment) is a system of theology that professes to be, that is, based on scientific principles. We have had many such, but they have glaringly failed to satisfy their claims. For in using the word "science" in connection with theology we are placing it in the same category as astronomy or chemistry; we are virtually acknowledging that the things which belong to theology are as capable of demonstration as the things that belong to any one of the sciences; but this has not been found to be the case. If there be a theological "Euclid" anywhere in the world, may he soon speak, for until he does we must be content to fall back upon the moral and religious certainties which are found in man himself.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE BEARD MEMORIAL UNION.

To the Editors.—Some months since Mr. J. H. Reynolds wrote a very able letter to the Herald, stating that, very many years ago (so long that many who are now men and women were children then), an old friend of his—who had since gone to his rest—had propounded a scheme for forming in Manchester a kind of club, where its members might drop in to see their friends, have a cup of tea or other refreshment, and feel at home, and requested all who felt disposed towards its formation to send their names to him.

I ventured the following week to urge the matter on, and trusted it would not lie until our children grew into men and women. Shortly afterwards I asked Mr. Reynolds how the matter was going on, when he answered that he had received a few replies, and expected in awhile it would be further developed. Having had the honour of being elected on the committee of the above Union, and looking into its aim and objects, I find with a little extension it would exactly carry out the idea of Mr. Reynolds and his late friend. I have never asked, but it occurs to me the latter can have been no other than the Rev. Dr. Beard himself.

My dull comprehension could never exactly make out the meaning of Longfellow's words—

"Let us then be up and doing
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labour and to wait," unless he had likewise experienced something akin to what our friends have. It is time we left the last words out, and instead of "learning to wait," adopted the old precept—"Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." We are not now the despised sect, almost afraid to mention the name we own, that our forefathers fought so valiantly for against all odds, including even our fellow Nonconformists; but chiefly through their exertions, and notably Dr. Beard's, we are both more influential and respected. There is a wide field before us. A vast number of people who attend no place of worship are very much like what Councillor Ben Brierley pithily expressed himself to be, at the opening of the Miles Platting bazaar, when he said: "People call me a Nothingarian, but if I am anything I am a Unitarian." To embrace these Nothingarians, and make them Unitarians, let us open our social doors wider.

By increasing the subscriptions to the Union, say to five shillings per year, and getting as many as possible to join it, taking in the various daily papers and other periodicals, forming a library, and arranging with the trustees of the Memorial Hall to grant the use of such rooms as may be required, and with the hallkeeper to supply refreshments to those who need them, and make it as sociable and attractive as the neighbouring Young Men's Christian Association is, no doubt it will prove equally prosperous and useful. If the trustees cannot spare rooms, why not use those in the building let off as warehouses? Surely we have sufficient public spirit to afford it.

There is another point: Whilst the agitation is going on to open libraries and museums on a Sunday, let us set the example by opening this on that day. We braved derision of old when reading and writing were taught in our Sunday schools, and at a time when few of the poor could get them elsewhere, and many a successful man and woman of the present day blesses the old times gone by for their prosperity. Let us brave derision, if necessary.

The committee do not meet for over two months, and as I know very few of them personally, I thought this the best means of ventilating the subject, which I trust will be heartily taken up.—Yours truly, Daisy Bank, Moston. JAS. BARKER.

VISITORS TO PARIS.

To the Editors.—As it is generally believed that Englishmen just now visiting Paris are very much impressed upon with regard to lodgings and provisions, it may not be out of place, in your widely circulated columns, to give a few words of advice to those of your readers who have never been to that city, but who intend to visit it during the present season. Having just returned therefrom, I am happy to state that in that quarter of Paris where I have resided I have not found any disposition to take undue advantage over the visitor. Of course, if you go in grandee style, and order everything in general terms, and refuse to ask the price of things before you get them, then you tempt the Frenchman to impose upon you, by giving him the impression that you have plenty of money to throw away, and that you do not wish to be troubled with the details of your bill of fare and attendance. Even when advantage is thus taken of your weakness, it is no more than what is done every season at many places in our own English watering places—to which experience teaches us to submit, as a matter of course.

But if the visitor on getting out of the railway station in Paris will avoid all those places where he will see "English is spoken here" in the windows, which may, or may not, according to circumstances, mean that the game of the "spider and the fly" will be played there, and take a bus with a correspondence ticket to Palais Royal, and change busses there (without having extra to pay) for the Palais de Luxembourg, he will find himself in a bond fide French quarter of the city, where, all other things being equal, prices for lodgings and provisions are as reasonable as anywhere in London or Manchester at the present time. Having arranged about his bed with the matron of his hotel, or maison meuble, and assuming that he will not be bound to take his meals at any stated hour in the place where he sleeps, let the visitor saunter out to his meals at some respectable crémère, café, or restaurant, just as it suits his taste. If possible, let him select some place for that purpose where a price-list of the bill of fare is daily put before him, from which he can suit his taste and pocket too. This may be easily done at all the establishments of M. Duval, one of which he will find at 94 (or thereabouts), Rue de Lafayette, not many minutes' walk from the St. Lazare station, and where he can procure a list of all Duval's establishments in Paris, and which he will find of great service to him in his walks about the city.

In the Luxembourg quarter I have found everybody courteous, very civil, and rather disposed to assist you than to take undue advantage of you. If you can leave your English conventional feelings at home, and rid yourself of the anxiety which obtains as to what "Mrs. Grundy" will say if you do this, that, and the other, you will get along all the better, for that feeling does not prevail among the Parisians as it does among our own people in England. Again, do not put yourself under professional guides. I could tell some strange stories about them. Somebody must pay the wages of these men, and of course you belong to that "somebody" if you will be guided. While under a guide, you cannot select your own company, which at times is a very inconvenient thing; cannot look at a masterpiece of statuary or painting as long as you would like, but must hurry on with a medley group, who may neither know nor care anything of its history, and be indifferent to its merits; be obliged to take their bill of fare whether you can eat it or not; and go off as per programme whether you are disposed or not. The other day I was standing under an umbrella looking at the July Column where the Bastille stood, when three or four open carriages drove up under a guide who jumped out of his carriage followed by some half a dozen from the whole company, and as his arm and tongue and umbrella were explaining matters to the half dozen who surrounded him, I could not refrain from laughing right heartily at the spectacle which the dismal groups in the carriages presented, waiting there in the rain until the guide and the guided had had their say at the base of that memorable column; after which the half drowned company with sadness and sorrow depicted in their countenances drove away. Who this company was, or whence it came, I never troubled myself to ascertain. Being under a guide has its advantages; but its disadvantages are many and will not be submitted to by any one who loves his liberty if he can do without it. Your own experience, with a little common sense, in the long run will teach you more wisdom than any amount of guiding will do for you. Having said so much for the benefit of those who can speak a little French and who have never been to Paris, and though my experience may have been different to that of others, yet I leave these timely hints to those of your readers above mentioned, hoping they may profit by them, as has been the case with yours, &c.

DOING AND SAYING.

It is considered probable that the island of Cyprus was the Chittim of the Old Testament.

Professor Leone Levi estimates that out of every pound of taxation contributed by the working man to the National Exchequer, 13s. 5d. comes from alcoholic liquors and tobacco.

The late William Cullen Bryant, the celebrated poet, attributed his marvellous health to his prudent mode of living. He was almost a teetotaller, and lived principally upon fruit and vegetables.

The ex-minister of Servia, M. Chedomille Myatovitch, an eminent Christian scholar, is translating the Pilgrim's Progress into the language of the Serbs. He has expressed himself to be of opinion that of all the books he has read (and he is familiar with the best English Evangelical literature) the Pilgrim's Progress is the best adapted to the Servian mind.

Mr. Theophilus G. Pinches, who has been appointed to the post left vacant in the British Museum by the death of Mr. George Smith, has, says the Daily News, begun his career as an Assyriologist by an important discovery with respect to the chronology of the reign of Cambyses, which, if it proves correct, will overturn all the former theories of Assyrian chronology.

A new association, styled the National Mahomedan Association, has been recently formed at Calcutta for the promotion of literary culture and the protection of Mahomedan interests. This, says the Times correspondent, is a wise and energetic attempt on the part of the Mahomedans to regain by legal and constitutional means the positions of trust and consequence they once held under the English Government.

From the studies of M. Favre on the subject of colour blindness at the Académie des Sciences, it appears that 3,000,000 persons in France are afflicted with inability to distinguish colours (Daltonism). The number of women so affected, as compared with the number of men, is in the proportion of one to ten. Nine cases of Daltonism out of ten may easily be cured in young subjects. The best means of treatment consists in methodical exercise upon coloured objects.

Commenting on the recent union of Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists in Ireland, the Irish Times says that Methodism now takes a new place amongst sister churches, and will occupy numerically, but still more, morally, a higher position than before. The ministers of the united body will number about 270, and their adherents probably about 100,000 persons. With a staff of working clergy, aided by lay agents of intelligence and zeal, it ventures to predict a new career for Methodism in Ireland.

In the Board Schools of London 188,000 children are being daily instructed in the Bible. But the Board has no power to give rewards for attainments in Scriptural knowledge. Mr. Peek and the Religious Tract Society, however, generously offered to find the prizes. This year 105,000 children have competed, being 20,000 more than last year, while a higher tone has characterised the answers. Not more than one child in 4,000 has been withheld from the Scriptural instruction by the wish of parents.

Lord James Butler has seceded from the Irish Episcopal Church. He was a great champion of revision of the Prayer-Book, and often made the proceedings at the General Synod hot and lively by his strong persistence in denouncing what he considered the corrupting Papist notions in the Prayer-Book. But he failed to get the Synod to go far enough. The revised Prayer-Book came into use on the 1st inst., and Lord James Butler refuses to use it. It is, he says with emphasis, still full of corruption.

We are prone to forget the greatness of the interests involved in our relations to India. In Bengal the Bengali is the vernacular of thirty-eight millions of our fellow subjects. In the south-west provinces, Hindu is spoken by seventy millions. In the Punjab twenty-four millions chiefly use Urdu and are Mohametans. Throughout these and other portions of the vast empire English is becoming the language of education and of culture. What a weight of responsibility and solemn importance do these few figures furnish.

The dark cloud of famine that till recently has, for the third year running, overhung India, seems about to be rolled away. The time for the commencement of the annual downfall—upon the extent of which depends the harvest—has again come round, and grateful tidings are told of a fair rainfall from the North West and Madras, which were most severely stricken by the previous failures in the rains. In the latter presidency the total number on relief works last week was 127,621, on gratuitous relief, 74,120—figures which compare very favourably with those given this time last year.

A movement is started in London for uniting all the Presbyterian Churches on the English side of the border. It is, in fact, a gentle and ingenious expedient for disestablishing the English branch of the Established Church of Scotland. There are fourteen congregations throughout England connected with the Established Kirk, but they are all dwindling year by year to a mere handful of members, while the other Scotch Presbyterian Churches in England flourish more and more. Dr. Cumming is the only well-paid representative of the Scotch Kirk in England, and he is the chief opponent of the scheme of incorporation. The established Kirk in England is a landmark of the setting of the popular tide towards voluntarism. But some Scotch Conservatives are denouncing the proposed amalgamation as a political trick.

A writer of gossip in the Court Circular states that Monsignor Capel has resigned the rectorship of the Catholic University College at Kensington, London. Those who knew anything about the matter, says the writer, have long foreseen that the whole thing must inevitably collapse. Started at an immense expense, with highly-paid professors of standing, an imposing show was made, which induced some to believe that a promising institution had been started. But from the beginning it has been little more than a matter of spending money. The writer is not sure whether the students outnumber the professors, or the professors the students, but there is little difference either way. The few students have been treated, as children in small families generally are, with every indulgence. The institution was not remarkable for discipline; and as Monsignor Capel is not a University man himself, he probably found it rather beyond his power to mend matters.

The Commissioners have been appointed to inquire into the law and existing practice as to the sale, exchange, and resignation of ecclesiastical benefices, and to recommend remedies for abuses, if any are to be found to exist. The inquiry will probably occupy two or three years, and is not likely to be of much value. The shrewd and able writer in the Manchester Examiner, who signs himself "Promotion by Merit," says:—"It is not very likely that the Duke of Cleveland, who holds nineteen livings, including Wem, worth £2,300 a year; or the Earl of Devon, who has eight livings, or Viscount Middleton, who has also eight livings, will recommend that the power of selling these livings should be taken from them; and yet that is the only recommendation which will satisfy the country. Among the twelve Commissioners there is not a man (with the exception of 'the Right Rev. Father in God, William Connor, Bishop of Peterborough') who has taken any part in the discussion on this question; neither is there a single Dissenter, although Dissenters, feeling the responsibility they have in the prolonged existence of bribery in an institution for which we are all responsible, have taken the most active interest in bringing about some legislative remedy. It was fully expected that Mr. E. A. Leatham, M.P., who knows more of the outside feeling on the question than all these Royal Commissioners rolled into one, and who has spoken so often about it, both in and out of Parliament, would have been one of the members of this new Commission; but then he is a Dissenter, and so the Government would not have him."

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE CONDITION OF THE CHURCHES.

IN the editor's "Outlook" in the Family Treasury, there is a notice of the present condition of the Scottish Churches:—"There is something not a little remarkable and suggestive in the present condition of the Scottish Presbyterian Churches. Scotland is understood to be a poor country, yet three of its churches, not one of which embraces the aristocracy, contribute between them for religious and benevolent objects an annual sum of more than one million three hundred thousand pounds. It is also noticeable that within the last year or two there has taken place, in every one of the Churches, an immense increase of activity. This activity has taken the form, to a considerable extent, of what are called home missionary operations. A large number of new churches have been built or are being built. And it seems warrantable to conclude that there are now more people attending public worship north of the Border than there ever have been before. With all that it is significant to observe that the crust of the old faith has been broken, and that, to use the figure we have had before us throughout, the old bottles appear to be in danger of being burst by the violent fermentation of the new wine."

THE POPE AND THE DEVIL.

ORANGEISM in Scotland is no mean force, for it claims more than 70,000 adherents, chiefly in Glasgow and the west. The 12th of July, as usual, was chosen by the body as a great gala-day, when a good many thousands, professing ultra-Protestant principles, chiefly consisting in a fierce hatred of Popery, held a demonstration, at Rutherglen, in the vicinity of Glasgow. Besides the ordinary lay speakers, there were present on the platform three ministers of the State Church, who, far from setting an example of moderation, seemed more fiery-spirited than the rest. The Rev. Robert Thompson, of Wellpark Church, Glasgow, offered up the opening prayer, which contained the remarkable petition, "Oh, Lord God, confound the Papacy, and may the present Pope perish amid the intrigues of the Jesuits with whom he is surrounded, and the devil, whose servant he is." In a speech which he delivered at a subsequent stage of the proceedings, Mr. Thompson used language equally violent, expressing the wish that his Holiness might soon go after his predecessor to purgatory.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

The Expositor (Hodder and Stoughton) sustains the high character which this magazine has acquired. The editor's exposition on the Book of Job is continued, and this instalment on chapter xxi is most stimulative and suggestive. Professor Fairbairn's studies in the Life of Christ are occupied this month with a strikingly able discourse on the relation of the Baptist to the Christ. Dr. Sanday expounds his conception of some leading ideas in the Theology of Paul, but we differ in toto from his representation of Paul's idea of the death of Christ. The Dean of Canterbury contributes another paper upon the Prophet Jeremiah; and the Rev. Dr. Reynolds begins what promises to be a very helpful critical commentary on the Epistle to Titus. As the present number begins a new volume it affords a good opportunity for Biblical students, who are not already subscribers, to begin taking a magazine which, in its own special line, is without a compeer, and is a most valuable aid to readers and expounders of the Scriptures.

The Homiletic Quarterly (London: R. D. Dickinson) is a complete sackful for Benjamins of the clerical profession. The number for July contains a "Clerical Symposium" on the method of preaching calculated to be most effective in relation to popular indifference and philosophical scepticism. The writers are Dr. W. G. Blackie, Professor Reynolds, Professor J. G. Murphy, M. de Pressense, Canon Perowne, and the Rev. J. Clifford. The discussion is full of interest, the papers of M. de Pressense and Mr. Clifford being especially pithy and powerful. The other contents of the number present a great variety of expository and homiletic matter, noticeable among which is a contribution from Professor Bruce, of the Free Church College, Glasgow, on the parables of the Treasure and the Pearl. The "Sermonic Outlines"—which are a dangerous temptation to lazy men—strike us as very thin, and are singular in their complete ignoring of those living questions of the day which M. de Pressense, Mr. Clifford, and Canon Perowne earnestly plead no preacher, who desires to be effective, can afford to pass by.

The editor of the New Quarterly Magazine (London: Chatto and Windus) is to be congratulated on the excellence of the July issue. There is not a dull page in it from first to last. Mr. Edmund Gosse's careful biographical and critical essay on "A Dutch Poetess of the Seventeenth Century"—Tesselschade Visscher—will be a revelation to most readers. General Cesnola's "Cyprus" forms the basis of a most seasonable and readable article by Mr. W. Watkiss Lloyd on our new acquisition, although from the absence of any reference to the transfer, it seems to have been written before the Anglo-Turkish Convention became known. The article is mainly historical; but it presents some at least of the information which we are all now eager to pretend to have in our possession. Mr. Arthur Arnold gives an interesting account of Socialism in Germany, and takes the sensible view of the only rational means of meeting that movement. "Mary Wollstonecraft," by Mathilde Blind, is a very well written memoir of the celebrated William Godwin's equally celebrated and gifted wife. Among the best features of the magazine are the summaries of current literature and current criticism, carefully and judiciously done. Notwithstanding the enormous number of our periodicals, the New Quarterly has a distinct place, and worthily fills it.

The article in the University Magazine for July to which most people will at once turn is the sketch of the life and career of Mr. Poynter, whose portrait forms the contemporary portrait of the number. So much has been said about Mr. Poynter in praise, and, since his nomination as director of the Government art-training schools, in dispraise, and even dislike, that it is well for the public to have that which is usually the best defence and explanation of his acts—the story of his life. No one, not even the most aggrieved art-master of a provincial school, can read the account here given of Mr. Poynter's education and his devotion to art without feeling that behind his action there lies much more than the mere fussiness of the head of a department—the clearly conceived purpose of an artist, who is a born teacher, and who is bent on working out a much-needed reform in the art-culture of our land. We strongly recommend to our readers the sketch which accompanies the portrait in the July number. The current number of the University is a very interesting one, all the articles being of more than average quality. If we were to speak with special praise of any, it would be of the first article in the number—"An Aryan Ancestor"—one of the frequent contributions to this magazine in which light is thrown on the modes of thought which were common in the East at the time when the earlier New Testament books were written. We do not know where, except in the University Magazine, we could find a popular yet accurate account of the superstitions and hopes and theories under the influence of which some of the leading doctrines of Christendom took their first shape. The article does not bear the initials of Mr. F. R. Conder, but we can hardly be wrong in attributing it to him. We would also mention with special pleasure the very full and competent notices of books which, in this as in most of the numbers of the University Magazine, form a leading part of its contents. Nowhere can a teacher who is anxious to have his books "tested" for him have that better done than in the "current literature" article of the University Magazine.

LESSONS FROM CHICAGO FOR UNITARIANS IN ENGLAND.

THE record of "F. B.'s" visit to Chicago given in a recent issue of the Herald, ought to suggest some practical and beautiful things to not a few Unitarian congregations in our own land. The spirit which seems so active in the two churches "F. B." refers to, were it developed here, could not fail to commend Unitarian principles more largely to occasional hearers, and bring about some beautiful and catching results.

For a period of over thirty years I have not infrequently attended one of the most influential Unitarian churches in the West Riding of Yorkshire, where the services are always solemn and impressive, the thought in the generality of the sermons reaching a high standard of beauty, purity, and power; often profound in depth and massive in tone, and in range of subject all but as wide as the needs of the populated world; yet ministering only to the finer susceptibilities and humanities of the heart just about as much as the sublime pieces of Gothic architecture, around which Sunday after Sunday the echoes float. One is always struck with the fine ringing interchange of vocables, but out of them comes little warmth to the heart, or joyous inspiration to the life. There is grandeur, but it is wedded to coldness, and the feelings of the hearer are chilled. Besides this, there is an undertone of pensive sadness running through much of the thought, and the life droops as if wreathed in cypress. So, despite the imposing solemnity of the services, and the periods of grand stillness, the hearer might as well be transported to the frigid zones for any real impetus given to the zeal and the love that are to waste not, nor weary in their daily play.

One learns to admire that which is solemn and imposing, and one gratefully feels the hush that stays the fever of life; but in religion we want most that which is generative and radiative—that which unites man to man in thought, and purpose, and love. We want the utterances that bend the head in reverence; we want also those which fill the eye with pleasant and peaceful light, and which make the heart pliable to all that is pure, uplifting, and joyous. We want the fire that rouses from their dreamy slumbers all the expansive sympathies that shall win for the life about us finer issues, and a larger, nobler world. We need to tread the bright green surface of the earth, and be fed by its streams and touched by its beauties, and not to front so much dark problems, or feel ourselves lost in mental catacombs. By all means let us have beautiful churches, impressive services, and high-toned sermons; but above all, let us have that mingling of humanity which, in the church at least, shall merge the whole congregation into one band of worshippers, one spirit animating all. Ideal religions should be idyllic in their manifestations and sympathies, and the exponents of them should lay constant stress on all fuller and richer flowering. Excepting the more extreme of our Unitarian ministers, it seems to me that few ever wage nervous war with the bigotry and prejudice of caste, the haughty exclusiveness of wealth and social position, and the superfine indifference to the larger and nobler needs of humanity so palpably creeping into some of our congregations. Most preachers I have heard for years rather conserve conservatism, and foster growing impediments to social union and religious assimilation than otherwise. Men of culture they are undoubtedly, but they lean a little too much to the side of the high and the mighty. The cushioned pew is not nobly and largely plastic to the risen pulpit. The voice that speaks from the elevation is sonorous and impressive; but the hearer remains calm, passive, lethargic—wrapped in a mantle of indolent self-sufficiency. The power to magnetise the heart—the main spring of all life—is wanting. But perhaps this is not the fault of the preacher solely and always. Something of it may be due to other influences than his. Generally, however, the church is what the minister makes it. He is the strength and beauty of its life; and to whom must we look for the initiation of more generous and wider communion within it if not to him?

That beautiful Christian socialism which has made Eversley dear to many an English heart surely is not altogether away from the vocation of a minister, and many of our churches might with reasonable hope of good seek to copy that example. At any rate, the experiment is well worth a trial. Why should one have to mix for years and years in a congregation, and not more than half a dozen people condescend to give you a welcome, or even to speak a kindly word to you? It is essentially a poor semblance of a religion that does not sometimes rise above artificial distinctions and class prejudices. If one is poor in worldly wealth or in name, what does that matter in a church where the people worship the same Father? Why should a rigid barrier of caste of all places be set up there? Wealth and position need not crush the more beautiful flowering of human thought and sympathy. Neither of them are really alien to the world's needs or to the noblest culture. Inequalities of society there must be. 'Tis in the law that differences of influence and power must exist, and the large-hearted Christian will look on all these things with a calm glad philosophy that will but grow more intense and fixed as the years ripen thought and judgment. But none of these things need repel or hinder communion. Wealth does not lose dignity because it condescends to exhibit the modest graces of courtesy and kindness; and position abdicates no throne because now and then it unbends to associate with those who, if they occupy a lower status in society, have yet hearts that can always feel the nobility of conduct, and who can glow with enthusiasm over every conquest of truth and beauty and progress.

In these utilitarian and fast augmenting materialistic times, I fear the charm of novelty is gradually passing out of the routine of our six days' life, and the romance of pure, elevating, sympathetically vital sentiment out of our seventh day worship. And it is only such men as Charles Kingsley in the church, and George Dawson out of it, if I may so speak of the latter, who do something really palpable to keep them intact. Why the labourers in this vineyard of the masters are so few, I know not. Surely churches that are said to represent something like thirty millions sterling have the power to do work as inherently grand as the work of these two men—work that should not only attract the more lovable side of humanity to themselves, but likewise commend their own principles and professions to the hearts and minds of all who get contact with them.

The propagandism of a church may widen its areas and increase its numbers, but these do not constitute its success. Its success lies in its ever-higher life, in the sweet, abiding bonds it creates, and in the loving and sacred memories it sets up in the world of worship, of thought and of action. When some such results as these are born of its influences it may well take rank as an instrument of God, and the children gathering within its spaces will find there the power that idealises and adorns their lives, and realise that wholeness of enjoyment without which religion will scorch and burn up the noblest emotions of mankind. ROTHERHAM.—On Thursday, 18th inst., the children of the Sunday school were treated with a trip to the charming grounds of Roche Abbey, about eight miles distant from Rotherham. The scholars were conveyed in waggons most kindly provided by Messrs. Husband, Walker, Houseley, Leggoe, and Owen. The teacher's and a good number of the congregation accompanied the excursion in waggonettes, &c. A most delightful day was spent by young and old amid the venerable ruins and charming woods and picturesque rocks and waters of this ancient abode of the "White Monks" of the Abbey of Santa Maria de Rupe. After the children had been well regaled with the usual good things provided for their hearty appetites, they were assembled under the grand old gateway, formerly also used as the hospitium for travellers and poor tramps, and after some hymns had been sung, the Rev. W. Blazeby addressed to the scholars a few appropriate words. The Rev. J. Fraser, of Doncaster, also joined the party.

WHAT WE MIGHT DO.

REV. WILLIAM BENNETT.

WHAT blessings might we spread around
 Did we possess the will to do it !
 What pleasure make to all abound,
 Did we such good with wisdom view it !
 But for one hour of hollow joy
 We sell the solid bliss before us,
 And deem Truth's gold but base alloy,
 That would with higher wealth endow us.

What noble lives we all might lead
 Did we but act up to our knowledge !
 What service high, in word and deed,
 What wisdom spread, like school or college !
 But self, blind self, steps in between
 Our higher thought and harder duty,
 And turns aside the living stream,
 That else had flowed in love and beauty.

Oh ! let us pause, and waste no more
 Our substance on such fleeting pleasures,
 But wisely for ourselves in store
 Lay up by times true, heav'nly treasures :
 See in the good of all, our own
 Supreme bliss, and best endeavour ;
 And, having to the future sown,
 The harvest reap now, and for ever !

THE FUTURE PUNISHMENT QUESTION.

IN the seventh volume of the Expositor, just published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, is a paper by Canon Farrar on "Rabbinic Eschatology," which raises the much-debated question of immortality and future punishment. It is needless to say that Rabbinic deliverances on that subject give no countenance to the orthodox idea of the eternity of "hell fire." It was long, indeed, as every ordinarily well-read person knows, before the idea of immortality itself passed out of the sphere of opinion into that of faith among the Jews ; and the whole of the earlier conception of Sheol and Gehenna, as found by tracing the history of the words, affiliates itself far more with the Roman Catholic purgatory than with the Protestant hell. The rabbis, in a word, wavered between annihilation and universal restoration—the balance decisively tending to the latter. Very beautiful are the fancies of some of the rabbis. Even where in later commentaries some countenance is given to the idea of final annihilation, this is corrected by unconscious and beautiful ideas of restoration, as in a commentary on Malachi iv. 3, where the righteous are represented as coming at the end of twelve months and interceding for those whose souls have been wasted and their bodies consumed with fire. "To their words, the Holy One, blessed be He, answers, 'If so, then go and heal them.' Immediately the righteous go and stand upon the ashes of the wicked, and pray for their pardon, and the holy and blessed God causeth them to rise from their ashes, under the feet of the righteous, and to stand upon their feet, and they are conducted to eternal life." Even the good had to pass through Gehenna that the sinful stains which adhere even to the best of men might be burned away ; but also—beautiful thought—that they might cover with a garment the naked and shivering souls of the guilty. There was even a Sabbath of the damned when they enjoyed cessation from torture. If Canon Farrar has not said much that will be new to most theological students, he has set some of the most touching of the Rabbinic legends in a new light.

The article on the æons from DE QUINCEY was well worth reprinting. After the "master" has established the true meaning of the æon as indicating the period that pertains to the existence of any creature, mysteriously assimilated to its essential nature as before GOD, he sums up his main points thus :—

That man (which is in effect every man hitherto) who allows himself to infer the eternity of evil from the counter eternity of good, builds upon the mistake of assigning a stationary and mechanic value to the idea of an æon ; whereas the very purpose of Scripture in using this word was to evade such a value. The word is always varying for the very purpose of keeping it faithful to a spiritual identity. The period of duration of every object would be an essentially variable quantity were it not mysteriously commensurate to the inner nature of that object as laid open to the eyes of God. And thus it happens that everything in this world, possibly without a solitary exception, has its own separate æon. How many entities so many æons.

But if it be an excess of blindness which can overlook the æonian differences amongst even neutral entities, much deeper is that blindness which overlooks the separate tendencies of things evil and things good. Naturally, all evil is fugitive and allied to death.

I separately, speaking for myself only, profoundly believe that the Scriptures ascribe absolute and metaphysical eternity to one sole Being, namely, to God ; and, derivatively, to all others according to the interest which they can plead in God's favour. Having anchorage on God, innumerable entities may possibly be admitted to a participation in the Divine æon. But what interest in the favour of God can belong to falsehood, to malignity, to impurity ? To invest them with æonian privileges is, in effect, and by its results, to distrust and to insult the Deity. Evil would not be evil if it had that power of self-subsistence which is imputed to it in supposing its æon life to be co-eternal with that which crowns and glorifies the good.

It will thus be seen how close a relation there exists between some of the beautiful thoughts or fancies of the rabbis and the theological philosophy of the "English Opium-Eaters," to whom Mr. LESLIE STEPHEN has not only denied the title of philosopher in toto, but has declared that his worst fault was an excessive inability for anything beyond spinning gorgeous phraseology. How odd that the editor of the Expositor should fish up such out-of-date, quarter-of-a-century-old "gorgeous phraseology" to fill his pages !

THE BASIS OF FELLOWSHIP.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

A COMMON purpose to seek, find, and practically apply the truth is the only just or practical basis of organisation. And this is not only the broadest, it is also the strongest, possible platform of union. If a Catholic, an Orthodox, a Unitarian, a Free-religionist, an Infidel or an Atheist is still a sincere and an earnest seeker for the truth ; and if he holds himself ready to accept and obey that truth just as soon as found, then I will take him by the hand and help him, and let him help me. He is more truly my brother in God than any bigot or Pharisee, whatever his name, or however plainly he can pronounce his h in Shibboleth, or however broad be the borders of his garment. The truth-seeker is the only God-seeker. And however far away I may think him to-day, he is still travelling along one of the light-rays of that infinite circle whose centre is the fountain of all light. Two men may be on parallel lines, very near together, and still never meet. And two others may be following verging lines on opposite sides of a circle, apparently very far apart, but really nearer together and nearer to God than those who can touch hands over their differences. So there are conscientious Atheists and Catholics that are nearer to God and His truth than some complacent and self-satisfied Orthodox or Liberals.

Look for a moment at this basis of fellowship I propose. It is that of the workers of science. Beneath all the various, wide-spread, and disconnected labours, discoveries, and experiments of the great body of scientific workers, there is the common belief that all scientific truth is one—that the universe is all one piece—that distant truths are only different parts of one divine pattern that runs all through the whole visible garment of God. Wherever any man, then, finds a truth—in star, or sea-depth, or geological stratum, or amid the chemic mysteries of organisation or dissolution—whether he is travelling north or south or east or west, still he is working on one plan ; and when the work is done, the unity of the complexity will appear. This scientific faith is grander than any that the religious world has yet attained. But we must come to this. Religious truth is one as God is one. Go forth, then, ye religious explorers, and seek only for truth, knowing that all truth-seekers are brothers, and must come to hand-clasping and looks of recognition bye-and-bye ! No matter though one say, "From my standpoint God looks dark and hateful, and humanity totally depraved." No matter ; only look for truth and report what you see, and all will one day be clear. No matter though another say, "To me all the universe looks chaotic, and I see no trace or track of God at all." Still, no matter ; only be sincere, open-eyed, and open-hearted, and look for truth. God's truth is one. It is like the city of Pompeii—buried. Let the workers descend and excavate wherever they will. Let them work toward any point of the compass. When the whole is laid open to the sun, street will link itself to street and square with square, until the separate parts resolve themselves into one unity of plan and structure that includes the whole.

Let us, then, stop talking of Conservative or Radical. Be all seekers after the truth, and this bond of a common purpose shall bind us in a real brotherhood of God. The conceit of having found separates, the humility of search brings together in true unity.

"RELIGIOUS COMMUNION."

FOR ages there has existed a disposition to attach undue importance to the "church" to which a man belongs. To be a member of the church has been insisted on as essential to human salvation. Multitudes have sought comfort, and not seldom found their ruin, in the notion they were embraced in the motherly arms of the church because they belonged to one of these lesser churches ; and with this they have been satisfied. Professed Christians have fought about the church as if it were a matter of life and death. And the bond of union in these churches has been a formal bond : religious communion has had to be communion with God under a certain form, and a communion with truth in a certain form. This has been the basis and the bond of union. And unless you could subscribe to a certain creed, in a certain form, you were not of the "communion of saints," and had no part with them. This has been the direct and implicit teaching of the church for ages. But the question raised at the Leicester Conference was : "Could men have religious communion without identity of religious belief ?" And many and noble were the answers that were given. Mr. PICTON said : "All theologies were liable to misconceptions"—an admission which opens wide the doors of toleration—

"but those which lifted the soul into a higher life must be acknowledged to possess an element of unspeakable value. And the men that enjoyed this higher life were the men fitted to commune with each other." Mr. GASQUOINE asserted liberty of thought and the oneness of the truly religious spirit, and Mr. M'CLAREN urged that wherever you see Christlike men, there was the true church, and it was folly to try to make the wind of God make music only through our organs. And again, at a recent meeting in connection with the Congregational Union, Mr. FORSYTH said "the bond of Christ was deeper than any definition of it," while Mr. CLODD asserted that "religion must rest on the religious nature of man. Creeds were decaying of themselves, and that only which eluded definition was permanent." And Mr. PICTON again said that "the man who believed in the fall could have real religious communion with the man who accepted the theory of DARWIN, for both were striving to move upwards and onwards." All these are signs of the influence of that great truth of religion that the bond of union in the communion of saints is a link stronger than that which binds the mountains and hills together, more lasting than the changing creeds of humanity—it is the bond of sympathy with the divine Infinite, which is eternal as God himself. LONDON OUT OF CHURCH.

At a Conference held at the Memorial Hall, London, last week, in connection with the London Congregational Union, for the purpose of promoting the objects of the Church Aid Society, some very interesting statistics relative to the provision for public worship in the metropolis—which have been a long time in preparation—were made public by the laborious secretary of the Association. For this purpose London has been divided into two areas. The larger, which takes a radius of twelve miles around Charing Cross, contains an estimated population of not less than four millions and a half. Smaller London, including twenty-eight registrar's districts, with a population of three millions and a half, has provision for public worship for a little over a million, while if fifty-eight per cent of the population went to church or chapel double that accommodation would be required. In other words, there is a deficiency in the lesser metropolis of not less than a million sittings. What proportion of this is actually required by the population is not stated, but it is well known that even the existing places of worship are, for the most part, very far from being filled on Sundays. Of course, there are many interesting questions suggested by the statistics upon which we cannot here enter. It may suffice to state the further fact that of the actual accommodation in London proper, 578,958 sittings are provided by the Church of England, and 508,868 sittings by religious bodies outside the Establishment—a proportion about the same as in 1867, when a similar inquiry was made, and the results recorded in the columns of the Nonconformist.

COVENTRY.—The Great Meeting House Sunday School held its annual outdoor treat on Tuesday last. With band playing and banners flying, the children numbering upwards of one hundred, marched from the Cow Lane School to a field in the Park, kindly lent by Mr. A. Dunn. There they quickly dispersed for amusements. A large tent was provided, and after their activities the children and friends, now about 150, gladly availed themselves of its shade and heartily indulged in the cup that cheers but not inebriates. Refreshment ended, the amusements were again resumed. About nine o'clock the children re-formed into rank, and with band and banner marched back, highly delighted with their day's sport.

"WOULDN'T."

SHE wouldn't have on her naughty bib,
She wouldn't get into her naughty crib;
She wouldn't do this, and she wouldn't do that,
And she would put her foot in her Sunday hat.
She wouldn't look over her picture-book;
She wouldn't run out and help the cook;
She wouldn't be petted, or coaxed, or teased,
And she would do exactly whatever she pleased!
She wouldn't have naughty rice to eat;
She wouldn't be gentle and good and sweet:
She wouldn't give me one single kiss,—
Pray, what could we do with a girl this?

CURIOUS EPITAPHS.

The following epitaphs are copied from grave-stones in Saddleworth churchyard:—

John Holden, aged 84, a singer and bell-ringer.

For three score years a counter singer,
And longer still a first-rate ringer,
Was he whose name is put before;
Whose skill in tune and time is o'er.
While some with changes are affrighted,
He, with changes, was delighted;
Of changes yet he must have one,
And then with changes he'll have done.

John Broadbent, sexton, aged 73, died in 1769.

Forty-eight years, strange tale to tell,
He bear the bier, and tolled the bell,
And faithfully discharged his trust,
To earth to earth, and dust to dust.
Cease to lament, his life is spent,
The grave is still his element;
His old friend Death knew 'twas his sphere,
So kindly laid the sexton here.

BECAUSE SHE LOVED HIM.

"I HATE boys! and I wish with all my heart old Bluebeard would carry them away and hang them up by their thumbs, as he did his wives, that I do!" said Susie Lewis, changing her seat for the fourth time in five minutes, and settling herself to read again.

"Who cares what you hate, old Crosspatch? Besides, Bluebeard's dead; and I don't believe he ever did live," answered Susie's brother, rolling, cushions and all, off the sofa on to the floor as he spoke.

"My name is not Crosspatch, I thank you; and Bluebeard did live, whether you believe it or not. I suppose you believe Daniel lived?" inquired Susie, indignantly, snatching her dress out of her brother's reach.

"Who was Daniel?"

"Oh! That shows how much attention you paid to your last Sunday's lesson, Frederick Lewis. Daniel was a judge in Jerusalem,—at least I think so."

"Well, I think you don't know much more about him than I do," said Freddy, trying to get his heels to rest on the table without altering his recumbent position.

"Yes, I do. He was put into the den of lions; and that is just where I wish you and all other boys were, right now," she added, as Freddy made another dive at her dress.

"Yes, but you see, Miss Susanna, Daniel wasn't put into the lion's den for being bad; he was put in because he was so very good,"—and Freddy laid a distinguishing emphasis on the word "very."

"O, you do remember some of your lesson. Well, you won't even be put anywhere for being very good," and Susie again pushed her chair farther away from the teasing boy.

"How do you know so much, Miss Smartie? I might turn out a saint yet."

"It is time you began then, Fred; and if you don't stop teasing me I'll give you something to help you."

"What will you give me, Powsy-Wopsy?" said Freddy, pretending that he was going to tip her chair over.

"Let my chair alone Freddy Lewis; do you hear? Mamma! Mamma! do speak to Freddy!" called Susie, in desperation, as Freddy made another dive at her dress.

"O, mamma is down in the kitchen, making a nice little mince-pie for me; she couldn't come now, Miss Susie; so tell me how you are going to help me to become a saint," said

Freddy, sitting up, and aiming a sofa-cushing at Susie's book.

"First by a real good whipping that you could not forget for a month," answered Susie, dodging the pillow.

"Are you to give it to me, Pussy Cat? because if you are I am awfully afraid," said Freddy, holding up another cushion between his sister and himself.

"Freddy, if you won't stop tormenting me, I will throw this book at your head."

"O, do, by all means! for if you do, I know if you aim at my head you'll be sure to hit the door. Girl's can't throw straight!"

"For a good reason, sir,—they don't wish to; it is not lady-like."

Just here Tom Gregor, Freddy's chief friend, opened the door. "Hello!" he cried, "Hello, Fred! Trotter says the ice on the pond will bear; the fellows are in for lots of fun. Hurry up! I'll wait at the gate for you."

Freddy followed him with a shout and a bound, and the next instant Susie heard him calling upon his mother and both servants in a breath: "Where's the straps of my skates, mother? Jane, where's my straps? Ellen I left them on the hall table; nobody leaves anything alone; Mother! Mother! Mother!"

Susie listened for an instant, then she heard her mother say, "I am very sorry, dear, but I cannot possibly leave the cake now to help you; ask Susie, she'll find them."

"No, Susie won't," said that little girl to herself; "he ought to put his things away as I do, then he would know where to find them. Besides, he plagued me so hatefully all the afternoon; I'm just glad he's lost his straps; Aunt Sophy would say it was a providential punishment, and I think so too."

Here Freddy opened the door, and looking pleadingly at Susie, said, "I say, Sissy, won't you please help me to find my straps? Somebody's hid them, and there's Tom calling me. Come, Susie, there's a good girl. I'm real sorry I teased you; certain I am."

Susie smiled—a bright, sunny smile. "All right, you dear little torment, I'll help you, then; but I am sure I don't know where to look for anything of yours, so you can take my straps. Wait, I'll get them for you; I know where my things are, always."

"Good girl! Hurry, then! Hello, Tom!" he shouted, throwing up the hall window. "Wait one minute, Susie's getting me her straps. Oh, here they are! Thanks! You're a dear little sister—now and then," said Freddy, springing out of the window, and making the gate in wonderful time.

"There, now," said Susie, "he's gone without his comforter, and he'll get a sore throat again; I don't believe boys have more than one thought at a time, ever; I believe it would be right to put my book away, and take him his comforter." She thought a moment, then resolutely put the tempting volume in its place, hunted the lost straps (which she found in the pocket of Freddy's school-jacket), took the warm, thick comforter off its peg, and wrapping herself up was soon in pursuit of her thoughtless brother.

He was not very easy to catch, and when caught could hardly stand still while Susie's deft little fingers fastened the warm, woollen scarf around his neck; but he was not insensible to the loving care, and in his blunt, boyish way, said, "Susie, I'm ever so much obliged, you know; and I wonder what made you think about my throat, after the way I've been teasing you."

"Oh, boys can't help teasing, Freddy, any more than bees can help humming; besides," she said, looking admiringly into the merry, rosy face, "besides, Freddy, sister Susie loves you."

I won't say that Freddy never teased Susie any more; but I do know that that little woollen comforter was a tie between brother and sister, fonder and stronger than many a one that is forged of gold.—Christian at Work.

THE BASIS OF RELIGIOUS FELLOWSHIP.

[PAPER read at the Missionary Conference, Memorial Hall, Manchester, July 5th, 1878, by Rev. WILLIAM MELLOR, of Crewe.]

Amid the endless and widespread agitations and discussions of the time in which we live, the subject of ecclesiastical and theological comprehension has been forced to the surface, and, for some time past, it has been placed in a very prominent position. At least a few men in all the churches of Christendom seem to be getting weary of the separations, ecclesiastical and theological, which mark the Christian world, and the religious eclectics who sit above the strife of warring tongues have been listening intently for some indications of possible harmony, so that, out of the seemingly irreconcilable dialects of the present, they may evolve a universal speech for the future. There are those who, for more than a generation past, have been seeking to bring the Roman, Greek, and Anglican Communions into one common external organisation, if not inward and spiritual fellowship. Among the various bodies of Dissenters also, the same spirit has been at work. All the Methodist denominations of this country have been long and anxiously looking out for some common basis of agreement on which all may stand and form one vast compact body. The various bodies of non-established Presbyterians of Scotland have experienced the same quest, and sought the same object; and the Presbyterians of this country have actually achieved a similar object of desire. As to the Baptists and Independents, one can hardly remember the time when a considerable number in each denomination did not wonder why they should still be kept apart, and sought in various ways to bring them together.

Religious Oneness and the Leicester Conference.

This desire for ecclesiastical oneness naturally leads to, and in some sense prepares for, the deeper, more spiritual, and more important question of religious oneness. Men cannot rest satisfied with an external and mechanical bond. The human heart craves a union which is inward and vital. But how, amid all the differences which divide men, shall this inward and vital union be found? On what common ground shall men with such varied and conflicting views and conceptions of the principles and objects of religion, stand in order to engage in a common worship and a common religious fellowship? This is the question to which many of the most intelligent, the most ardent and loving minds in the churches of Christendom feel themselves brought. This is the question which the promoters of the much talked of Leicester Conference set themselves to consider, and ultimately to answer. To that Conference all were invited who "value spiritual religion, and who are in sympathy with the principle that religious communion is not dependent upon agreement in theological, critical, or historical opinions." Here, indeed, is a broad negative statement, made in a matter of course way, which is not only unsatisfactory for the special purpose it was meant to serve, but which many intelligent, thoughtful, and earnest men cannot readily accept, even if they could ever bring themselves to accept it at all. This statement tacitly denies that the intellect holds anything more than a subordinate place in religious fellowship. Hence differences of a theological, critical, and historical nature are quite excluded and set at naught.

But the intellect being thus excluded, or at least subordinated, in religious fellowship, what is to take its place? If such fellowship does not depend upon agreement in theological, critical, or historical questions, on what does it depend? The only reply I have seen or heard to this question is that religious fellowship depends upon what Mr. Wood calls "spiritual sympathies," and Mr. Picton "spiritual affinities." These, considered as things quite distinct and separate from intellectual convictions, are to form its basis, and by these, and these alone, its limits are to be determined. When pressed with questions such as those which I have just asked, Mr. Picton said: "Sir, I believe in the selective action of spiritual affinities," and a little further on his speech, he said, "Pardon me if I say this, you need not fear that any but those who love you will strive to adhere to your fellowship." On the same subject, Mr. Wood said: "Only leave the spiritual sympathies free to make their own experiments, and the limitations will settle themselves."

Now when we come to look at this new doctrine, we find that it is but a kind of philosophical way of saying that, in the fellowship in question, the heart must be supreme, and that, in the absence of agreement in thought and belief, you must rest on an agreement in feeling and aspiration.

Separation of Heart and Intellect.

But I must frankly say that this basis of religious fellowship seems to me to be radically defective in itself, and very dangerous, if not positively demoralising, in its consequences. Its radical defect is found in the attempt which it makes to separate the intellect from the heart, and to secure emotions independent of, or contrary to, thoughts. But this is utterly unsound in philosophy, and utterly impossible in fair and legitimate practice. All the recent lights of physiological and metaphysical science shine full and clear upon the fact that the whole man is essentially one, and that therefore, intellect and heart cannot be separated without doing violence to the one or to the other, or to both. Physically, intellectually, and spiritually man is properly an inseparable whole, and must be treated accordingly. The application of this physiological and metaphysical fact means, among other things, that if you attempt to cultivate one part of a man's nature at the expense of another, your work ends in more or less of distortion, want of harmony, and want of universal peace and strength. You have no right, therefore, either for the sake of securing an ideal religious fellowship, or for any other purpose, to appeal to his heart at the expense of his head, and to create an excitement in his emotions that shall not be in harmony with his thoughts.

It is by no means clear to me that such an isolation of the mind and heart, the feelings and the thoughts, is, as a rule, possible, if even it were desirable. Let each man among us set his memory to work and try to call to mind any instance in his own life in which his heart and his head were for the time severed, and in which there was either no connection or no harmony between what he felt and what he believed. I should very much like to know who amongst us can remember any such experience at all.

But, even if it be possible, it certainly cannot be desirable. In common and ordinary life, we count him a weakling whose emotions do not work in harmony with his thoughts, and whose heart, as we charitably call it, runs away with his head; just as, on the other hand, we call him cold who thinks without any coincident or corresponding feeling. A man is weak in so far as he is purely emotional, and cold in so far as he is purely intellectual. If I were called upon to compare the intellectual and the emotional man, I should say that the latter was the less desirable, the more to be pitied, and much nearer to contempt. But, all comparison apart, the fact I wish to insist upon is, that neither the one nor the other is more than half a man. Each is defective, because each is unnaturally and abnormally cultivated and developed. In order to get well-rounded, harmonious, and complete men, you must develop the heart as well as the intellect, and the intellect as well as the heart. We recognise this to be the natural and normal state of things in ordinary matters, and it is none the less so in matters pertaining to religion. From this it follows that, when they act normally and naturally, our "spiritual affinities" and our intellectual convictions go together. This is a sound and irresistible logical inference, and what is thus true in logic is true also in fact. I think there can be no doubt, for instance, that, as a rule, Unitarians get most general good where Unitarian doctrines are preached, and Trinitarians where Trinitarian doctrines are preached.

Some Suggestive Anomalies: Mr. Picton, Mr. Wilks, and Mr. Wood.

But, while harmony between the doctrines believed and the spiritual sympathies cherished is thus proved to be the normal and natural state of things, it must be admitted that, in these days, when there is so much that is abnormal and unnatural, we meet with rather curious experiences in this respect. It seems, for instance, and has been again and again said, that men like Mr. Wood, Mr. Wilks, and Mr. Picton, whose intellectual convictions are judged to be a long way from orthodoxy, ought to be much more in spiritual sympathy with the heterodox churches than with the orthodox; and, in the light of the rule just laid down, such is undoubtedly the case, if the supposed divorce be a reality. But, as a matter of fact, so far from these men cherishing sympathy with the churches in whose ranks their intellectual attitude seems to place them, we find, on the part of one and all of them, a positive shrinking and revulsion from all such churches. While my heart was deeply touched, my mind was started upon a curious and complicated course of speculation by Mr. Picton's words on this particular point. He said: "The question that is asked is this—Why do not the two or the three, as the case may be, who are supposed to represent the extreme left in theological opinions, openly leave the Congregational Union and join the Unitarians, or any others with whom they might have more sympathy? That question was received by the Congregational Union, to which it was repeated, with 'hear, hear,' and with applause, which plainly meant 'Yes, indeed: Why do you not leave us, and join the Unitarians, or some other heterodox body?' But listen to Mr. Picton's reply: 'For the simplest of all reasons, we do not find any other body with which we have more sympathy; we do not find any other religious communion in which we are so much at home.' And, again, he says: 'You tell us to leave them (the spiritual influences of orthodoxy), and go elsewhere. It is like turning us out of our native climate into what, to us, is a cold, a frosty, and repulsive atmosphere, and we do not feel called upon to make a change which we feel would be deleterious to our spiritual welfare.' Now, in these words, and throughout the whole of the speech from which they are quoted, Mr. Picton made a decided distinction between intellectual convictions and what he calls "spiritual affinities." Mr. Wood and Mr. Wilks did the same, and all three gave signs that, while their intellectual sympathies seemed to be elsewhere, their spiritual sympathies were with their old friends; and, considering the spiritual to be of more importance than the intellectual, they seemed determined to keep their present places in spite of all opposition.

As the result of my speculations upon this seeming contradiction of the rule that intellectual convictions and spiritual sympathies go together, there are several things to be said, which, if they do not explain it away, at any rate put it in its right position. In the first place, it should be remembered that men like Mr. Picton are quite exceptional in their intellectual order and in their intellectual conclusions, and so may be quite exceptional in their spiritual sympathies. So much is this the case, that it requires no little boldness to enable any one to intellectually classify such men at all; and, if we cannot be sure of their intellectual classification, so neither can we be sure of their right spiritual affinities. After all, therefore, it may be that Mr. Picton's intellectual and theological position is not so far removed from current forms of orthodoxy, or so near to current forms of heterodoxy, as some people seem to suppose; and, therefore, again, he may be much nearer his right spiritual place than his many critics think. The same remark will apply, though in a less degree, to Mr. Wilks and Mr. Wood, and to all others of the same stamp. If I am right in this conjecture, it follows that what seems like an exception to the rule laid down is not at exception at all.

But, in the next place, if there really be a divorce between the intellectual convictions and the spiritual sympathies of these men, what they call their spiritual sympathies, when they refuse to change their denominational position, may not be spiritual sympathies at all, but simply the mixed influence of old association. It certainly is possible for the old home feeling to blind one's eyes to a great many things; and it may be that it has robbed the good men before us of the power to distinguish between things really spiritual and things really domestic and social. But, even if neither of these conjectures will explain this seeming contradiction, even if we are obliged to say that, in the relation which exists between their intellects and their hearts, the men before us are exceptions, I hold that they are but the exceptions which prove the rule.

Unnatural and Injurious Communion.

In spite, then, of all such seemingly adverse appearances, the rule remains—that in religious fellowship, as in all other things, intellect and heart cannot act rightly unless they act together, or in perfect harmony. It is no mere accident, therefore, but of the very essence of the thing, that the religious communion which shuts out, or unduly subordinates, the intellect, being so one-sided in its basis, must be bad in its consequences. It seems to me that such religious communion must necessarily pass through three stages, each of which does violence to some great law, or some great fact, and all of which are decidedly on the descending scale. The first of these stages is one of utter confusion—individual and collective. There is confusion, if not positive conflict, between the mind and heart of each man, and between the mind and heart of one man and the mind and heart of another. All may use the same words, but with utterly different meanings. One man speaks of God and prays to Him with one set of conceptions, and with emotions corresponding; but another man speaks of Him and prays to Him with quite other conceptions, and, therefore, with quite other emotions. To one man Christ is God, but to another he is a man. The intellectual law of relation between such persons is not the law of sympathy, but the law of antipathy, and they cannot come together in mutual honesty without mutual confusion. I know of only one way in which this confusion is to be avoided in such a case, and that is, by a most unmanly suppression of all that is peculiar, and, therefore, of all that is individual. But it is manifest that this stage of mutual suppression, for the sake of mutual accommodation, is a much lower stage than the previous one of confusion. It is lower, for one thing, because it is much nearer to death. So long as there is commotion there must be life, but in the degree to which a man is suppressed he is practically extinguished. Nor is the killing process any the less direct or sure because it is under the man's own control, seeing that it is just as easy to commit suicide as it is to be taken off by the deed of another. But yet, just as the only escape from confusion is suppression, so the only escape from suppression is downright insincerity. Just take a picture of the way in which this latter alternative works. A Unitarian and a Trinitarian, say, meet together for worship and communion, the one ignoring the fact that he is a Unitarian, and the other the fact that he is a Trinitarian. Now, how can there be any directness, or any individuality, and, therefore, any real life or genuine sincerity, and any heart to heart fellowship, when, to begin with, each has agreed to cease to be himself, and, therefore, to cease to be a man altogether? I cannot possibly imagine how such so-called fellowship can be persisted in without this pitiable result—that, instead of the Trinitarian making the Unitarian, or the Unitarian the Trinitarian, into a truer and better man, each shall reduce the other to a mere pretence, or a mere semblance.

But, lest some one should take this picture as a purely imaginary one, let us glance at an illustration from actual life. What, in my way of looking at things, amounts either to most unmanly suppression or downright insincerity, actually happened in May last, in London, at a devotional service, which may be taken, and was intended to be taken, as a practical exemplification of the kind of religious fellowship against which I am contending. A clergyman of the Church of England presided, and it is the pride and joy of its promoters that the meeting was attended by ministers and members of all denominations. And so far so good. But this very mixed gathering did several things which I cannot understand at all, if they do not bear either of the alternative characters just indicated. The speakers, one and all, seemed supremely anxious to say mild and sweet things, and so managed not to say anything with a bold ring of deep, personal, and earnest conviction in it. Matthew Arnold has distinguished himself by calling, what common people call God, "the Eternal power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness," but one brother, at the meeting in question, prayed to the "Eternal power that makes for Union." What he meant by this I do not undertake to say; but it is clear that the God to whom he prayed was the creature of the special circumstances in which he was placed, and not the Eternal Maker of endless diversity. But a fact still more noticeable is the fact that this mixed meeting of Trinitarians and Unitarians ended with the formula—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore," to which, says the reporter, the congregation responded "Amen."* Now, we can all easily understand the Trinitarian portion of the congregation doing this, but the more we think of it the more we are puzzled to understand how the Unitarian portion could do it. They must have either done it, however, or left it undone. If the latter, then they submitted to be suppressed for the time; if the former, one wonders how they can acquit themselves of great insincerity. An utter suppression of all that was peculiar to them, or the repetition of words which they did not and could not believe, and that, too, in a solemn and concluding act of devotion, was the only alternative before them. Yet there was nothing at all exceptional in this alternative in the circumstances in which it happened. Such alternatives and such dilemmas are the inevitable outcome of such so-called religious fellowship as that meeting aimed at.

Arriving thus at utter confusion, and suppression, or insincerity, we must feel that we have got upon a path which is in no sense pleasant and agreeable; but we have not even yet got to the end. The end is dishonourable death and inglorious extinction. All the successive steps which I have noticed lead inevitably to this as the final stage. Though confusion be life, it is yet but half-developed life, and it cannot possibly remain stationary. It must either develop into order and fuller life, or lose all its elements of cohesion and co-ordination, and thus fall back into utter disorder and dissolution. Repeated suppression is gradual suicide. Insincerity is wicked and ruinous perversion. Any one of these evils would put to the test a rather vigorous existence, but, pray, what can withstand their united action? Not anything in the way of religious fellowship, certainly. By the combined action of these destructive forces all such fellowship must end in a nameless something which, by its hollowness, its inanity, and its ghostliness, must make it difficult for the most ardent admirers of religious comprehension to keep their gravity, or suppress their disgust, or restrain their gushing pity, as the case may be.

Here, then, are the reasons why I reject the so-called religious fellowship before us. I reject it because it is onesided and arbitrary in its basis, and because it is consequently and inevitably false in itself, and baneful in its results. I reject it because it begins by doing violence to natural laws, and ends in confusion, suppression, or insincerity, and ultimate death.

The True Basis of Religious Fellowship.

But, on the other hand, just as the basis of religious fellowship cannot be exclusively spiritual or emotional, so neither can it be exclusively intellectual. Though it is not by any means true that religious communion is not dependent upon agreement in theological, or critical, or historical opinions, it is quite as far from being true that such agreement is everything. Men may have the most perfect agreement on such subjects, and yet have no real religious sympathy with each other. They may, indeed, be perfectly at one on all such subjects and yet have no religion, much less religious sympathy. In order to have religious fellowship, therefore, there must be something more than intellectual agreement. In addition to this, there must be a common spiritual life, and common spiritual sympathies and aspirations.

It thus becomes evident that the true basis of religious fellowship is neither exclusively spiritual nor exclusively intellectual, but partly one and partly the other. It cannot be normal and healthy, excepting in so far as it rests both on the head and on the heart. Resting on the heart alone, it inevitably leads, as we have seen, to confusion, suppression, or insincerity, and death; and, were there time, I could just as easily show that, resting on the head alone, such fellowship becomes hard, narrow, and cold, and ultimately dies of frigidity, contraction, and lack of heat.

Here, then, as elsewhere, the sound and safe place is the happy medium. The orthodox churches have always made too much of the intellectual bond of religious fellowship and too little of the spiritual. The Leicester Conference gentlemen and their friends come forward and at once make too little of the intellectual and too much of the spiritual. To get at the solid basis of the religious fellowship which both seek, all we have to do is to split the difference between them.

The general conclusion to which I thus come, with reference to the discussions which suggested this paper, is that, in so far as a wider, more solid, and, therefore, better basis of religious fellowship is concerned, we are substantially where we were before the discussions began. As yet there is no ascertained basis for a universal church, or for boundless comprehension in religious fellowship, any more than for other kinds of fellowship. For anything that now appears, we shall still have to go on upon our old sectarian lines. What the future may bring forth in this respect we know not and cannot know; but, meanwhile, it will be well to remember, among several other things which I have not space to enumerate, that, as we have already seen, there are worse things than an earnest, though kindly, sectarianism. As Mr. Baldwin Brown says: "I would rather have a church in every village in which the members could speak out with their whole heart, and be sure of the sympathy of a little band of their fellows, than I would have a wide communion calling itself a church in which Ritualist, Evangelical and Rationalist, Trinitarian and Unitarian would be listened to with equal composure, and where souls could fall asleep"—and, we may add, die—"with equal comfort under them all."

JOTTINGS.

Why is Protestantism standing still while Rome is advancing? Why does Rome count her converts from among the evangelical by tens, while she loses to them but here and there an exceptional and unimportant unit? Is it that science is creeping like the snake upon the ground, eating dust and bringing forth materialism, that the Catholic church, in spite of her errors, keeps alive the consciousness of our spiritual being, and the hope and expectation of immortality?—Froude.

The ground-idea of Æschylus is not destiny, but retribution, and even an inherited curse does not wreak itself till the inheritor has been himself a criminal. Æschylus's view of life is, in fact, the view of Eliphaz the Temanite, in the Book of Job, and its weak point is what is the weak point there—namely, that all misfortune is regarded as the consequence of guilt and therefore deserved. Æschylus has often been called Hebraic, and he is nowhere more so than in this essentially Hebraic view of life.—Examiner.

A student, revelling in his newly-acquired knowledge of logic, once tried to catch a little boy on the horns of this dilemma: "Have you left off beating your mother?" The urchin looked at him for a moment with great eyes, and then, summoning up all his strength, gave him a tremendous slap in the face. That was the true answer, given by the light of nature. Some one says: Couldn't it be applied to other questions that philosophers ask? O, fie! philosophers are grave men, and don't expect any answer to their questions.

In reviewing any collection of works by what are generally known as the Old Masters, there is one difficulty which stands prominently forward, and makes criticism hesitating, if not silent. Paintings or drawings, which have stood the test of public opinion for hundreds of years, do seem to acquire with time a sanctity and worth such as age bestows upon all other records, and as we tread reverently beneath the shadow of any temple where people have worshipped, however mistakenly, so do we stand beside the works of many of these old masters. They may have, as far as we can see, sometimes wasted gigantic intellect and industry, in the pursuit of an unworthy scheme of art, but at least they did so in all sincerity, and even their mistakes were worthy ones.—Spectator.

We may look down as much as we please on our grandfathers' ideas, but their notions on some subjects were more rational than ours. It is better that a boy should learn to make a shoe excellently than to write bad exercises in half a dozen languages. The wider we make the area of superficial cultivation, the more we destroy the power of perceiving what good cultivation means, the more we are condemning the generations which are to succeed to creative barrenness and intellectual incapacity. Our men of science are fast satisfying themselves at last that mankind are highly-developed apes. This theory could find no hearing while religion and intellectual culture retained their old dominion. The Gospel of St. John, the Antigone, or Hamlet, lie external altogether to the sphere of the ape's activity. The achievements of the nineteenth century, of which it boasts as the final efflorescence of the human soul, lie a great deal nearer to our newly-recognised kindred.—Froude.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

REV. ROBERT COLLYER IN ENGLAND.

ALL our readers throughout the country will be gratified to hear that the Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, is now in England. They will also be glad to know that Mr. Collyer, who arrived on Saturday last by Cunard steamer Scythia (which reached the Mersey on that day), is looking remarkably well, and is in excellent health. With characteristic kindness of heart, Mr. Collyer at once began "to do good." On Sunday afternoon he attended the Sunday school held in Park Hill Road, Liverpool, in connection with the Ancient Chapel (Rev. J. Harwood's), and gave to the children there assembled an address which will live in their memories and hearts for many long years. In the evening he preached in the Hamilton Road Church, Everton (Rev. S. Fletcher Williams's). Mr. Collyer was introduced to the congregation by the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., who had been announced to conduct the evening service in connection with the Hamilton Road Sunday school anniversary, but who had the good fortune to induce Mr. Collyer to take his place, and thus gave the congregation the opportunity of hearing the famous preacher. Had the time allowed of an announcement to be made, the church would have been crowded. Mr. Collyer preached a characteristic sermon on "Home," rich in happy illustration, humour, and pathos, and toned with touching reference to his old Yorkshire home, and to his mother's death—which has happened since his last visit to England. The congregation were delighted by this quite unexpected visit, and their only regret was that Mr. Harwood's gratifying arrangement, being made at the eleventh hour, could not be notified to the Unitarian public of Liverpool.

UNITARIANISM IN LONDON—DOES IT PROGRESS?

A FRIEND at Oxford writes: If I were asked that question I should decidedly say yes. My experience bears me out in that affirmation. I can recollect when there were only eleven places of worship; now there are double that number. I recollect when and schools (George's Row, St. Luke's; Spicer-street, Spitalfields; and Carter Lane, City), besides the following improvements: Stamford-street had a very small attendance; Hackney has built a substantial Gothic church, in place of Carter Lane; Unity Church, Islington, a very handsome church, with schools; George's Row Mission (formerly of Chapel-street) is a new building; Hampstead (that used to have a very small attendance, in what was formerly a coach house) has now a substantial and chastely-built church, with schools, and a neat and elegant parsonage, with garden. There have been formed the London District Unitarian Association, for the delivering of lectures in public halls during winter on Unitarian principles, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which (though located in London) is doing a large amount of work in the country. These two societies are the Gospel heralds to proclaim Unitarianism—which is pure Christianity as Christ taught it. Two congregations, Cambridge and Reading, would not have been but for their exertions in delivering courses of lectures in these towns. Then, again, it is most encouraging to learn from the papers the efforts that are continually being made for the erection of new churches and schools in various parts of the country. Seeing how our sentiments have been opposed by all shades of orthodoxy, I think we have much cause to be grateful for so large a success. Our motto henceforth should be—"Onward, and be thankful."

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN MINISTERS IN ENGLAND. As reported elsewhere, the Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, landed at Liverpool on Saturday last per Cunard steamer Scythia. On Sunday, Dr. Robert Laird Collier, of Boston, reached Liverpool per White Star steamer Celtic. Dr. Collier is accompanied by Miss Louise P. Collier and Miss Mary P. Collier. The Rev. C. W. Emerson, from Chelsea, Mass., arrived on Monday per Inman steamer City of Berlin.

DONCASTER.—On Wednesday, the 17th inst., the scholars and friends of the Sunday school here had their annual trip to Askern, and a most delightful day was spent by young and old. The Sunday school has many difficulties to contend with, yet it is winning its way.

LONDON: KENTISH TOWN BIBLE READING SOCIETY.—This society, which holds its meetings in the vestry of the Free Christian Church, Clarence Road (kindly granted by the church committee), on the second Thursday in each month, was established a short time back, and two meetings have been held; the first on June 13th, at which the 2nd chapter of Matthew was read, and compared with the opening chapters of Luke, it being found that there was little similarity between them. A chapter was also read from the Apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, relating to the flight into Egypt; and a short account from Josephus, of the death of Herod, &c. At the second meeting, on July 11th, the 3rd chapter of Matthew was read, and the account of the coming and preaching of John the Baptist was compared with the accounts given by Luke and John, and the conclusion arrived at was, that Luke's rendering is the fullest, and that you feel to be treading upon solid ground in reading it. At this meeting a photograph of Bethlehem was shown, and accounts of it were read from Bartlett's Footsteps of our Lord and his Disciples, and Dr. Beard's Life of Christ. After each reading questions were put and answered; each meeting closing, as it had been opened, with prayer. A fair measure of success has attended this effort, and, as the meetings are open to all, it is hoped that much good will result therefrom.

LONGTON.—On Monday last the scholars had their annual treat. By the kind permission of the Rev. A. Clarke, M.A., the children and friends proceeded from the schoolroom to the rectory grounds, where amusements were freely and heartily indulged in; the rector and the curate (the Rev. C. J. Hunt) being present in the afternoon, chatting with our minister (Mr. Williams) and taking an interest in the various sports. Tea was provided in the Stone Road schoolroom, and about 120 of the scholars and friends did full justice to the good things placed before them. After tea the games were resumed upon the rectory lawn, and were continued until dusk. This is the second time within three years that the Rev. A. Clarke has permitted our friends to hold their annual treat upon his grounds.

RAWTESTALL.—On Saturday afternoon last the scholars, teachers, and friends connected with Bank-street chapel held their annual picnic. There was a large attendance. They met in a field at Cribden Clough, belonging to Mr. Cunliffe, one of the congregation, where games were entered into with spirit by old and young. The children were liberally treated during the afternoon. Several hymns were sung, and thanks given to Mr. and Mrs. Cunliffe, and others, for their kindness and help, brought to a close a most enjoyable afternoon and evening.

STOCKPORT.—The Bible class, including Mr. W. R. Shanks, teacher, and Mr. O. E. Heys, superintendent, with 13 others, enjoyed a pleasant "outing" to Marple last Saturday afternoon. They walked across the hills to Disley, and returned from there per train to Stockport.

SWINTON: FLORAL SERVICES.—On Sunday last two very interesting services were held here. The chapel was profusely, though tastefully decorated with flowers given by friends for the occasion. The decorations about the communion were especially attractive, the communion rail being covered by a mass of flowers of all variety of colours planted in boxes of sand, and the table ornamented by three various bouquets.

Shelves were erected along the front of the organ gallery and partly round the walls, and on these long tin boxes were placed, filled with wet sand, in which a large quantity of flowers were planted, the boxes being hidden from view by a neat arrangement of moss. From each gas pendant wire baskets were suspended, filled with moss and beautiful flowers. The effect on entering the chapel was very brilliant, while the delicious fragrance of the flowers was very grateful to the sense of smell. The service consisted largely of singing, nearly all the hymns being selected from the "Sunny Side" hymn book. The Rev. W. Harrison conducted the devotional service. The Rev. J. Freeston preached in the afternoon from Gen. i., 12, "And the earth brought forth grass, &c., and God saw that it was good." It was a plain, practical discourse, showing the various uses and qualities of grasses, seeds, flowers, trees, and fruits. The Rev. Chas. C. Coe preached in the evening from Solomon's Song, ii., 12, "The flowers appear on the earth." The preacher set forth in eloquent, poetical, and touching language all the various uses to which flowers are put in the course of our life, and the lessons they teach us, from the time they are found as the ready made playthings for the hand of childhood, till the time when they are placed on the coffin by affectionate hands, and adorn the graves of departed ones. The intense heat rather interfered with the success of the services, but there were fair congregations, and the offertory amounted to nearly £6.

TAVISTOCK.—On Sunday evening, the 14th, a very good congregation assembled in the Abbey Chapel to hear the Rev. Henry Solly, of Croydon, among whom were many who knew him in former years, when minister of this place, and who were glad again to see him and hear his voice after an interval of thirty-two years. The sermon, founded on Acts, xxvi., 28, 29, was of a practical character, devout in tone, and was delivered in the rev. gentleman's accustomed earnest and impressive manner.

WALSALL: A NEW LITURGY.—The Walsall Unitarian congregation has solved the question—"A liturgy or a free service?" by deciding to have both; that is to say, a liturgy for Sunday mornings, and a free service on Sunday nights. In view of this the minister (the Rev. Peter Dean) has been at work for some time past preparing a new service book, and the result—a little work entitled Prayers and Ministries for Public Worship in Six Services, is now in the hands of the printer. It has been a special aim of the compiler to give the congregation a large number of responses to sing, and, by variety, and option to the minister, to guard as much as possible against some of the objections which lie against liturgies. When ready the manual will be advertised in our columns.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[ADVT.] THE KING'S LYNN EJECTMENT.

To the Editors.—Will you permit me through the Herald to tender the hearty thanks of our committee to the many ladies and gentlemen who have so generously responded to our appeal for help in a most trying moment of our existence, and especially to the Manchester and Liverpool thorough-giving Unitarians for the handsome manner in which they received the writer and for the practical sympathy they so warm-heartedly displayed.

The Unitarian public generally will be pleased to know that by their assistance we have already raised within eighty pounds of the amount we require for our new schools and classrooms, and I doubt not but that there are eighty gentlemen left who will willingly send me a pound each, and thus assist us to make the stand we are determined to do, against those who have left no stone unturned so that they might exterminate the small but resolute band of King's Lynn Unitarians.

Our opponents hoped us to raise, but unwittingly have helped us to raise.—Yours faithfully,

A. P. ALLEN, Secretary to the Building Fund, and Superintendent of Sunday School.

MR. CUCKSON ON "THEISM."

To the Editors.—You have done your readers a great favour in giving them the admirable paper of Mr. Cuckson on Theism, for which favour I, for one, heartily thank you. While expressing my great pleasure in hearing the paper read at the Conference, I felt it my duty to say a few words, the substance of which I should like to repeat here, respecting what is said towards the end of the paper about certain terms used in our Free Churches. Mr. Cuckson seems to think that those in our Free Churches who use the terms "Through Jesus Christ," or "In the name of Jesus Christ," do so with the idea that communion with God is impossible without intercession. In this opinion I believe Mr. Cuckson is entirely mistaken. The terms, when used in our churches, are intended to convey the idea that we approach God in the same spirit as Christ, and in the same direct way as he did. I have no doubt whatever that in the forms of prayer compiled for our free churches by Professor J. J. Tayler, Dr. Martineau, Dr. Sadler, and others, such terms are to be so understood. And I believe the same may be said respecting the use of such terms in the free prayers of our ministers. Mr. Cuckson must have brought the idea of intercession with him from his early orthodox connections. I should very much like to see his paper printed in a form for general circulation, as it deals ably with a subject which is just now receiving much attention. But I would suggest to him that he withhold from such reprint the few words which give expression to the error of which I complain, and which I think is calculated to do our cause harm in the eyes of many worthy inquirers.—Yours, &c., GEO. RIDE.

THE NEW FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH AT COLNE.

To the Editors.—In reading in one of the local papers an account of the laying of the memorial stone of this new church, I was very much struck with the masterly address on the principles of Unitarian Christianity given by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of Liverpool. As a Churchman, I should like, with your kind permission, to make a few remarks on the doctrines taught in the Church of England as contrasted with the doctrines taught by the Free Christian Church. I do not hesitate to say that there is no church more intolerant than the Church of England. It is held by the Church of England that if a child die without being baptised it will not go to heaven. Is this not bigotry? In the Creed of Saint Athanasius we are told that if a man do not believe in three persons in one God he shall, without doubt, perish everlastingly. If this is not intolerance, then language has no meaning for me. Sooner than believe such a doctrine as this I would renounce religion altogether. Then, too, I would rather by far enter a Unitarian church and join in its services, than witness the theatrical performances given in most of the churches of England at the present day. With the principles of Unitarianism, as laid down by the rev. gentleman, I entirely agree. I have many friends who are Unitarians, and I have found them to be as good Christians as any of my Church friends. When I see that clergymen and bishops of the Church of England subscribe to one thing and preach and practise another, I think it high time some one spoke out. You, sirs, may think it strange that I still remain a Churchman. I do so for a reason that is obvious. I may have spoken strongly on this subject, but I can only say that I have done so strictly in accordance with my own convictions. I should be glad to see more Churchmen speak out like myself on this question. That the work begun at Colne may prosper is the wish of, yours truly,

DOING AND SAYING.

Mr. Samuel King has left £20,000 to the Merchant House, Glasgow.

Last year the sum expended by 1,660 School Boards amounted to no less than £3,499,655.

The Duke of Devonshire has given £1,000 towards the establishment of a high grade school at Barrow-in-Furness.

The recent decision of the Old Catholic Synod, abolishing the rule of clerical celibacy, is likely to lead to a split in that body.

A lady has offered £1,000 towards the formation of a fund to provide some means of collegiate education for women at Oxford.

At a cost of £4,500, the Clothworkers' Company have added new buildings to the North London Collegiate School for Girls.

Swedenburg rebuked our insular pride when he said—and he ought to have known—that in heaven, which he often visited in trances, the English kept very much to themselves.

Mr. Thomas Jessop, J.P., of Sheffield, a well known member of our Sheffield Unitarian Church, has handed over to that town a woman's hospital, which he has erected and furnished at a cost of £30,000.

That generous member of our Unitarian household, Mr. Samuel Sharpe, has promised to give £5,000 towards the building of the north wing of the University College, London. A sum of £50,000 in all will, however, be required to complete the contemplated extensions.

Many of the bishops who lately took part in the Pan-Anglican Synod arrived at Stratford-on-Avon on Tuesday afternoon, and after visiting Shakspeare's birthplace and other objects of interest, proceeded to Shottery Hall, where they will remain for a time the guests of the Vicar of Stratford. Who says "overworked bishops" should not have a holiday?

The annual assembly of the United Methodist Free Churches commenced its sittings in Manchester on Wednesday, when the Rev. W. Boyden was elected president for the ensuing year, and stated in the course of his address that there was a decrease of 283 in the number of members. He attributed this to the depression in trade, and the consequent unsettlement of a large portion of the population.

The Demerara Colonist states that grants of public money are made in that colony not only to the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, and the Roman Catholic Church, but also to Wesleyans, Congregationalists, and other Dissenters. The sums thus voted are, it is said, paid out of taxes levied on Christians, Mohammedans, Hindoos, and Buddhists. It is clearly a matter which wants looking into. Our colonial Parliaments are, as a rule, steadily setting their faces against State Churches; and it is not desirable than even little out-of-the-way Demerara should adopt the noxious system of concurrent endowment.

In connection with the Wesleyan Conference at Bradford, the Fernley Lecture, on the foundation of the late Mr. John Fernley, of Southport, was delivered in Eastbrook Chapel, Bradford, to an immense audience. The chapel, one of the largest in Methodism, was crowded to excess, every available space being occupied. The subject of the lecture was the doctrine of eternal punishment, and was full of interest not only to the ministers but to the general public. Last year the subject attracted special attention in Conference from the fact that four or five young ministers could no longer subscribe to the Methodist teaching on this point, and consequently retired from the ministry. This year will witness the resignation of the chairman of one of the African districts, whose view of the doctrine of future punishment is out of harmony with the connexional standards. The Conference on Wednesday appointed a committee to consider a proposal made by Dr. Haven, of Syracuse University, U.S., to bring about an Ecumenical Conference of the Methodist Churches in various parts of the world. It was suggested that the Conference should be held in this country.

On Wednesday evening the Government tried to get into Committee with their Bishops Bill, but it became a dropped order. Sir A. Lusk talked it out, because he disapproved of the direction in which the bishops were going now-a-days. Mr. Cowen made a vigorous, eloquent, and most effective speech against any increase of the episcopacy. In his opinion there was "no attribute in common" between the bishops of former times and "these modern ecclesiastical creations." It was true that in Newcastle they wanted a "purer atmosphere and a higher, nobler, and more artistic life," but they did not desire a new bishop "to weaken the springs of intellectual liberty." They had one at Durham; that was near enough. The Tories being still thankful for the help which Mr. Cowen had rendered them on more than one occasion treated him very politely, and Mr. Cross was extremely gentle in his brief reply to a very forcible denunciation of the Establishment. In the subsequent discussion, the Bishop of Manchester was put forward as a model of all episcopal virtues, while Mr. Richard contrived to extort a laugh from the most orthodox Churchmen by describing the society for promoting an increase of the Episcopate as "a society for the Propagation of Bishops."

The Jewish World, writing last week on the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill and Sunday Amusements, states that at the monthly meeting of the Jewish Board of Deputies, Mr. E. A. Franklin deprecated any attempt to secularise the Christian Sunday, and reminded the Board that the Jews had a very severe Sabbath of their own. The editor, however, points out to Mr. Franklin that it is the duty of Jews to co-operate in every way possible in promoting the cause of rational freedom and charitable progress irrespective of the consequences that may accrue from their policy to any particular sect or party, whatever, and he adds: The Moloch of Sabbatarian bigotry—though his eyes be more dim than formerly, and his natural strength considerably abated—still sways over millions of superstitious minds; and for any Jew or Gentile to refuse sympathy to the talented, philanthropic and devoted members of the Sunday League and kindred associations which aim at emancipating the Sunday from clerical thralldom here, as it has long been emancipated from that influence on the Continent, is to sacrifice to this monster of fanaticism. We are grateful for those exceptional clauses in the Amended Factory Acts which protect Jews engaged in certain industries during part of Sunday after observing their own Sabbath on the day preceding. But we demand not only for Jews—for we write as Englishmen—but for all fellow citizens who conscientiously object alike to the services of Christian churches on the one hand and swilling over stimulants and narcotics in a tap-room on the other—the opportunity, if they should so choose, of visiting a first-rate drama, oratorio, opera, scientific, literary, or theological lecture, horticultural or pictorial exhibition, or public library on Sunday.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE TROUBLES OF THE SCOTCH CHURCH.

The members of the Established Church of Scotland have sustained a great blow by a decision given by Lord Young. They were under the impression, when the Patronage Abolition Act passed in 1874, that their Church had been set free from lay control, or that, in their own ecclesiastical language, "the headship of Christ" had been re-affirmed. They, therefore, proceeded to regulate patronage as if it appertained to the Church—the Assembly, for example, extending the term within which the congregation of the parish of New Deer might elect a minister, and excluding certain new parishioners, because their names were not on the communion roll when the term of election was settled. The case, therefore, was sent up to the Lords of Session, and Lord Young decided that the General Assembly had no power to extend the election or to reject the new communicants, and that, in fact, the congregation merely took the place of the old patron, was subject in the election to ordinary civil law, and as it had failed to act its patronage devolved on the Presbytery. This decision, though it does not revive private patronage, makes patronage a function possessed by the congregation independent of the Church.

AN IMPORTANT INQUIRY.

THE Edinburgh Daily Review, indefatigable in its advocacy of the Disestablishment movement, has begun to publish in its columns reports from all parts of the country for the purpose of showing that the time has now come for the Liberal party in Scotland to adopt the Disestablishment of the Church as a part of its programme. This "Extra-Parliamentary Inquiry" effectively proves that in the Scotch burghs public opinion is ripe for the change, while the unhampered expression of similar sentiments in the counties is only prevented by the tyrannical influence of the Tory landlords, who are not ashamed to apply "the screw" even in these enlightened days.

REV. DAVID MACRAE ON THE DECLARATORY STATEMENT.

REV. DAVID MACRAE, of Gourrock, contributes an article three columns in length to the New York Independent, which is intended to show what the United Presbyterian Synod of 1878 has done for toleration. "The way into church," writes Mr. Macrae, "is still the Confession of Faith; but the Declaratory Act now announces that the back wall is knocked down, so that the licentiate, though he has to pass within the Westminster portal, is free to walk out at the other side into the open air of the Bible. This will remove the difficulty from many minds, but the sense of inconsistency will remain. . . . If the Declaratory Act registers on the creed the progress made by the whole Church, the finding in the Ferguson case shows that the way for further progress is open; that independent thought, though cautioned, is not forbidden; and that the free fresh study of God's Word and works, in the ever-increasing light, with the results that this may bring, are neither to be precluded nor circumscribed by the views of the Westminster divines. The United Presbyterian Church has thus made an onward stride and probably cleared the way for other Churches to follow."

AMERICAN NOTES.

"THE SMALL SECT."

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE has made an important new departure, reports the Christian Register, by electing Gov. Benjamin F. Prescott, a Unitarian, to its Board of Trustees. By the terms of their charter, the trustees are a self-perpetuating corporation. This year, for the first time, they invited the Alumni to vote for three trustees to fill vacancies, with the understanding that those receiving the highest number of votes would be taken into "favourable consideration." Those receiving the highest number of votes were Gov. Benjamin F. Prescott, Hon. Charles H. Bell, and Hon. Walbridge A. Field, all of whom chance to be Unitarians. The first-named was confirmed by the trustees.

THE WESTERN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE AT CHICAGO.

THE goodness of a Church Conference cannot be reported. It lies in the heartiness of hand-grasps, the welcome in eyes and tones, the brightness of the platform and the quick response from listeners, the eagerness of discussion, nor least in the out-of-sight preparation, which makes the "business" move on with a snap, keeps little matters little, and brings main subjects forward with emphasis; perhaps, too, in the bringing of one or two matters so far to the front that the churches will remember each meeting as "that on which he did such or such a thing." In some of these respects, the twenty-fourth session of the Western Unitarian Conference, held in the Church of Messiah at Chicago, June 4-6, was thoroughly "good." It was an ideal "sociable" from first to last, and a long lesson in hospitality. Everyone you met—and you met many—seemed ex-officio an acquaintance. There was no whit of wrangling theological. As Mr. Collyer put it, "The Conference did not contemplate its own inside much, nor look at its own back." Nor were there any very hard hits at Orthodoxy. Of course, we were the Liberals! But then, why hold the Conference if we were not? "Limp Liberalism" was not at all in favour. Our responsibility as teachers of the Liberal belief and temper was the theme constantly touched. Mr. Snyder's opening sermon gave the key-note in urging us to "Work with God," instead of leaving God to do all the work himself; and Mr. Cutter's fair paper on the true and false Sectarianism, Mr. Hunting's practical suggestions for western work; Mr. Woolley's thoughtful words about the Liberal woman's part in that work; and Mr. Gannet's essay on the Constructive liberal, all turned on that point.—Pamphlet Mission.

The late Rev. Robert Gibson, B.A.

THE Rev. Robert Gibson, B.A., whose death we announced in our obituary column last week, was born May 6th, 1806, in the rectory house of his father, the Rev. Robert Gibson, L.L.B., who for upwards of thirty years, held the valuable living of Flyfield, near Chipping Ongar, in Essex. His grandfather was the Rev. John Gibson, M.A., vicar of Ronaldkirk, Yorkshire, and Myerscough, Lancashire, in which counties the family of Gibson then held considerable estates. His mother belonged to an old Essex family, the Bullocks, of Shelley House and Faulkburn Hall. Mr. Gibson was thus by family ties as well as education nurtured in strong Church and Tory principles, and taught to look down on Dissent and Liberalism with scorn and horror. From his father, however, a fair type of the country clergyman of fifty years ago, he inherited that force of will and independence of judgment which were afterwards so strikingly manifested in his entire emancipation from these early prejudices. Mr. Gibson's mother, a woman of singular simplicity, tenderness, and religious fervour, joined to much quiet shrewdness, exercised no small influence on the formation of her son's character. Her memory is still cherished in the parish for her untiring labours of love among the poor and the afflicted for more than half a century.

Mr. Gibson received his first education in a private school, then held in high esteem, in Woodford, Essex. His life there was by no means a happy one. Himself of an affectionate, conscientious, and religious disposition, he was too often pained and disgusted by the coarseness and profanity at that time too generally tolerated even in high-class schools. From school, where amongst his companions was Lord Morpeth, afterwards the well-known late Earl of Carlisle, Mr. Gibson entered Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where, after graduating, he read for holy orders, his father intending him as his successor in the living of Fyfield. Partly through the powerful influence and preaching of that remarkable man, the Rev. Charles Simeon, who for fifty-three years as rector of Trinity Church, Cambridge, laboured with unwearying zeal to promote the religious life of all classes in the town and university; partly through the example of his mother, to whom he was fondly attached; and in no small measure from his own natural propensity, Mr. Gibson became deeply imbued with the spirit, and actively engaged in promoting the views, of the Evangelical party in the Church of England. Ordained by the late Dr. Bloomfield, bishop of London, he became curate in his father's parish, where his impressive appeals from the pulpit, his fervent rendering of the Church services, and not least his unflinching zeal in every good work among the parishioners, especially the young, are even yet, after more than forty-five years, gratefully remembered.

In the year 1830 Mr. Gibson married Anne, daughter of Mr. W. B. Morgan, of Bristol, a cousin on her mother's side to the late Dean Alford. Of sweet and winning manners, modest and utterly unselfish temper, and sincere piety, his young wife was in every way fitted to be a true helpmate. She threw herself at once, with delighted energy, into all the labours of his parish, aiding to establish a Sunday school, then comparatively rare in that part of England, in teaching the young during the week, and in visiting the sick. For nearly twenty years of their married life the religious differences which subsequently arose between them, after her husband's change of opinions, never once cooled their strong mutual attachment and esteem. And now, in the midst of these busy, happy labours, surrounded by loved relatives and attached parishioners, able to look forward to the honoured position, in a few years, of chief pastor of the parish he loved so well—there came to him the voice of the Master, calling upon him to leave all and follow Him. We quote his own words, spoken long afterwards in a sermon preached before the Unitarian congregation at Plymouth, entitled "Conflict of Personal Convictions with Clerical Obligations" (1852):—

Early in life I became acquainted with several of the best works of the Puritanical and Evangelical Church writers of the seventeenth century, and with those of the leading modern divines of the same school, such as the two Milners, Thomas Scott, Henry Venn, and Daniel Wilson. These chiefly quickened my devotional feelings, and contributed to form my opinions. It was, therefore, by no means to be wondered at that when I came to prepare for taking orders, and in that preparation to examine carefully the contents of the Book of Common Prayer, my mind revolted from those parts of the services which, taken in a natural sense, assert that Church ordinances effectually convey pardon and grace. The Church doctrine of the Sacraments, and especially the light in which baptism is exhibited, caused great difficulty to me when I was seeking ordination. For the Bishop, having discovered my tendency to heterodoxy on this point, kept me some time in suspense as to whether he would admit me or not among the candidates for ordination, and put me on a course of reading which resulted in my adoption of a view of baptismal regeneration satisfactory to his lordship, and accordingly I was ordained a deacon. No sooner was I settled, however, in my curacy than my former difficulties returned. . . . In my perplexity I obtained temporary relief by adopting one of several schemes of interpretation, devised and proposed by evangelical divines, with the design of reconciling the statements of the baptismal service with their own doctrines. With this explanation I was for a time satisfied; and though my return to heterodoxy in regard to baptism when I offered myself as a candidate for the priesthood was more than suspected by my diocesan, he admitted me to that order.

After enlarging on his growing conviction of the existence of an irreconcilable contradiction between the sacramental doctrines of the Church and belief in the spiritual life inspired by Christ in the individual soul, between the damnable clauses of the Athanasian Creed and the charitable prayers of the burial service, Mr. Gibson goes on to observe:

I felt imposed on me this alternative—to relinquish my office, and with it the standing it gave me in the world, or to renounce freedom and truthfulness, and all that ennobles and blesses the life of man. Loss of caste, obscuration of worldly prospects, altered looks and bitter lamentations of relatives and friends, dismal forebodings of Christian brethren, who pronounced the step I was taking to be the beginning of an evil and disastrous course, the abandonment of a deeply-loved profession, and perhaps most of all the necessity of separating myself from the people to whom I had ministered—these were troubles and anxieties severe but endurable, and such as time would control and subdue, if not destroy; but to live at variance with myself, to contradict my inward thoughts and feelings by my words and deeds, to exhibit myself one man in my individual and another in my official character, in short, to think one thing and tell another—this would have inflicted torture which time could mitigate only by deadening my moral sense and stupifying my spirit. The choice, therefore, which I then made I can never regret, the resolutions I then formed and executed I can never wish rescinded till I come to doubt that "tis liberty alone that gives the lustre and perfume to life," till I come to believe that outward and material good excels inward and spiritual, till I come to be persuaded that it is right and wise for a man to gain the world by the hazard of his soul, or that by artifice, disguise, and hypocrisy, salvation can be promoted and secured.

After leaving Fyfield, he and his wife spent seven months with an elder brother at Curry Rival, near Langport. The curate there was highly evangelical, and the tendency of his preaching to make Christ obscure, instead of revealing the Father, and his denunciations of Unitarians, led Mr. Gibson to study the Trinitarian controversy; reading carefully, on the one side, Drs. Pye Smith and Wardlaw, on the other, Yates and Dr. L. Carpenter. He subsequently stayed with an aunt at Seaton, when he read the Anti-Nicene Fathers, while he preached to a small Independent congregation. When he had given up the Trinitarian doctrine he settled with the Sidmouth congregation for two years; but after 1838, when he removed to Bristol, he never engaged in the ministry as a profession, though he often gave his valued and disinterested help to the ministers of the neighbourhood. At Bristol he became the intimate friend of the late Dr. L. Carpenter, whose colleague, the Rev. G. Armstrong, B.A., and one of whose hearers, the Rev. S. C. Fripp, B.A., father of the eminent artists, had also been clergymen of the Establishment. Of Dr. Carpenter, he used often to say—"His kindness was that of a father to me, then quite a young man, almost a stranger to every one." At Bristol, and in the neighbouring village of Westbury, Mr. Gibson spent his next dozen years, chiefly engaged in reading with private pupils, some of whom he received into his house to educate with his sons. For their use he published selections from the "De Rerum Natura" of Lucretius, with English notes. In 1849 he experienced the great grief of his life, in the loss of his wife; and, desiring a change of scene, he shortly after removed to Plymouth, where (being now possessed of a moderate competency) he devoted himself to the education of his family and literary pursuits. Here, as at Bristol, he took his share in the work of the congregation. It was here, after an interval of twenty years, that he published that history of his retirement from the Church from which we have quoted. The sacrifice which he made seemed to him a necessity, and he never sought for it either notoriety or applause. His simple devotion to truth was always a striking feature in his character. He never ceased to read, and to inquire. "Comfort," he said, "is not the aim of truthseekers. Forward, and let us see what is what!" He relinquished views that once he held as to the authority of Christ; but the law of filial obedience to the Heavenly Father, which was written in Christ's heart, seemed written in his. He was not blind to the deficiencies he saw among Unitarians, and used often to lament a want of spirituality, and a too great regard for mere outward respectability—the goodness that brings a good repute. His heart warmed whenever he saw evidences of that vital faith, or intense conscientiousness that overcomes the world. In 1851 he married, for his second wife, Catherine, daughter of Mr. Wilson, of Stockton-on-Tees, who survives him. Two years later he removed to Chideock, near Bridport, where he spent the remaining five-and-twenty years of his life, with the exception of a short residence in Bath for educational advantages for his younger children, and three winters at Argelès, near the Pyrenees. The house which he purchased at Chideock is beautifully situated, and he could gratify his tastes—"to be among a rustic population, to have a garden to work in, and the ocean within walking distance." He established a village library, and, while health permitted, gathered some of his poor neighbours in a cottage to listen to readings which he thought might cheer and please them. During his early residence there he took an active part in resisting a church-rate, of which he felt the injustice, in a parish where there were many Catholics and some Dissenters. He never lost his interest in the Church of England, and had carefully studied its history and laws. He was a member of the Liberation Society. He resented priestly assumption on the part of the clergy, but disliked it still more if affected by Dissenters. He never asked to be relieved of his priest's orders; but no one was less of a priest, except in so far as a devout man is priest in his own household. He occasionally preached for his friend, the Rev. J. Lettis Short, but during the ministry of his successor, the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, he was prevented from doing so by his failing health; but both at Chideock and Bridport he manifested his warm sympathy for those who laboured among the poor, and strove to maintain the right.

He was never a partisan; and having bought his freedom at a great price, he did not choose to peril it. He preferred, therefore, to bear his individual testimony to joining in associated movements; but when his convictions were clear he never concealed them. He was local treasurer to Manchester New College, and was earnest in the cause of unsectarian education; and when he thought liberty, whether civil or religious, in peril, he was prompt to express his feelings.

He peacefully sank to rest, July 19, 1878, at the age of seventy two, after an illness of six months. His funeral was conducted, as he desired, with the utmost simplicity. Among the mourners were his eldest son, the Rev. R. H. Gibson, B.A., of Manchester; his brother—the Rev. H. Gibson, B.A., rector of Fyfield; his eldest nephew, H. Gibson, Esq., of Ongar; and Mrs. Gibson's nephew, James Richmond, Esq., of New Zealand. The Rev. J. Davies, M.A., conducted the service in the Bridport cemetery, where his youngest daughter is buried. On Sunday last the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, B.A., preached in memory of him, from John xviii. 37, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into this world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one who is of the truth heareth my voice." Mr. Gibson desired no inscription on his monument, besides his name, and the dates of his birth and death; but if anything were added he wished it should be this line from Southey:—

With patient heart, hold onward to the end.

He has left a widow, two sons and two daughters. The youngest son, F. Gibson, Esq., is a magistrate in the Madras Presidency; his second son, F. William Gibson, distinguished in his University career, died in early manhood—a sacrifice to his unshrinking discharge of his medical duties to the hapless poor of a London workhouse.

UNBELIEF.

THERE is no unbelief;
Whoever plants a leaf beneath the sod,
And waits to see it push away the clod,
Trusts he in God.

Whoever says, when clouds are in the sky,
"Be patient, heart! light breaketh by-and-by!"
Trusts the Most High.

Whoever sees, 'neath winter's field of snow,
The silent harvest of the future grow,
God's power must know.

Whoever lies down on his couch to sleep,
Content to lock each sense in slumber deep,
Knows God will keep.

Whoever says "To-morrow," "The unknown,"
"The future," trusts that Power alone
He dares disown.

The heart that looks on when the eyelids close,
And dares to live when life has only woes,
God's comfort knows.

There is no unbelief;
And day by day, and night, unconsciously,
The heart lives by the faith the lips deny:
God knoweth why.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 2, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

PROFESSOR VANCE SMITH ON THE METHODIST CREED.

THE Methodists resemble the Independents in having no express creed to recite in their worship. They resemble them also in taking especial care to allow as little freedom of speech as possible to their ministers. Of this body, however, I must add, I ought not to speak without the most ample acknowledgment in advance of the good service which in some respects it has been the means of rendering to the country. It may very reasonably claim to be allowed to do that service in its own way. Yet, in the judgment of many, this good is not without its alloy; and the action and influence of the body, in relation to religious liberty in particular, are far from satisfactory—being likely, in fact, if persisted in, to lead to deplorable results, by the simple nature of the reaction which they are sure eventually to produce. When men find their old faith in long-established doctrines shaken so as to fall, and when this state of disbelief overtakes them without anything more rational and well-founded to put in the place of what is gone, the only available resource for too many will be the repudiation of Christianity altogether and of religion itself as no better than cunningly devised fables.

This is true, indeed, in reference to all overstrained or superstitious beliefs. From this point of view, therefore, it cannot but be feared that the prohibited system of the Methodists must in the end lead to grave results, especially bearing in mind the particular classes of persons to whom that system is now acceptable.

In illustration let us briefly consider how Methodism virtually binds ministers and people to conform, for all time to come, to the doctrines expressed in certain documents written in the last century by the pen of their venerable founder. On some of the deepest subjects of religious thought they are not allowed to speak or think, except in accordance with his mind.

This is almost incredible, but it is literally true. Wesley, however, was not infallible, and he would probably have shrunk from the idea of being held up as a standard of religious truth for all time to come. Yet we are told that, besides preliminary examinations, each candidate for the Wesleyan ministry must undergo an examination to the following effect: "Before any minister is admitted into full connection he is required to give, in the presence of the conference, a full and explicit declaration of his faith as to the doctrines taught by Mr. Wesley in his first four volumes of Sermons and his Notes upon the New Testament." The president has also the power to put various questions respecting the Eternal Sonship and other kindred subjects, and the candidate is asked in particular whether he has read the prescribed books, "and whether he believes that the system of doctrine therein contained is in accordance with Holy Scripture."* On the satisfactory answering of these questions his ordination depends.

Nor is this all. It is stated that the doctrines of the body are contained in a deed enrolled in the Court of Chancery, and that once a year each minister is asked at the district conferences, which he is bound to attend, whether or not he continues to preach the doctrines held by the connection. Thus the precautions taken to guard the Wesleyan orthodoxy are of the most stringent kind. Effectual care is given that a man shall not speak out freely the thought that is in his mind, unless it be in accordance with the artificial and necessarily fallible doctrinal standard which the body has set up or accepted for itself. The whole system is established in the name of Christ, but it is Christ's only as authenticated by Mr. Wesley. It may be spoken of as preaching Christ, but truly and literally it is preaching Wesley. And, as before, why should not a man, who wishes to do so, have the liberty to read the New Testament, and to judge for himself without dictation from without as to what the Christian Master has said? Are the great essentials of Christianity so obscure as to need this kind of interpretation and safeguard? Or is it that the man is not to be trusted; and that it is feared that the progress of knowledge from age to age may pervert his mind and lead him astray?

That the Wesleyan ministers usually believe, at present, the standards to which they conform sufficiently in harmony with the Scriptures, I do not doubt. Nevertheless, a wider and deeper knowledge, especially of the philosophy and religion of the times from which the New Testament books have descended, will probably teach them to think differently. That better knowledge may come in time. Meanwhile, if they are not to be blamed for adhering to what they deem true, yet in the interests of both truth and charity they might well consider whether it be necessary to pledge themselves in effect never to open their minds to anything of new truth, in case the Great Spirit, by His providential leading, should please to put this within their reach.—Contemporary Review.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

IN a letter to the daily papers Mr. RICHARD, M.P., has described the result of the visit of himself and other prominent advocates of peace to Berlin with a view to submit to the Congress the question of international arbitration. It was hardly to be expected, and we dare say the deputation had no hope, that these august believers in the supreme virtue of "blood and iron," as developed in gigantic armaments, including Lord Beaconsfield, would give them much encouragement; and the Plenipotentiaries had a valid excuse for ignoring the question by their preliminary resolution to entertain nothing outside the provisions of the Treaty of San Stefano. Still, the petition of the delegates of the Peace Societies of Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands was laid before the Congress, though no action was taken upon it. The weighty views set forth in that document in favour of arbitration as a means of terminating international disputes have been once more placed before the statesmen of Europe and the world at large. In due time, we doubt not, they will bear substantial fruit. The progress that has been made in the recognition of this rational principle is, indeed, illustrated in the petition presented to the Congress. Not only can the advocates of peace point to its endorsement from time to time by several of the Parliaments of Europe, including our own, but the Treaty of Berlin indirectly reaffirms the Declaration of Paris, which, it will be remembered, expressed the "wish that States between which any serious misunderstanding may arise should, before appealing to arms, have recourse, so far as circumstances might allow, to the good offices of a friendly Power." The peace delegates to Berlin, it appears, met with a very cordial reception from several of the plenipotentiaries; and their prayer, though not granted by the Congress, will be echoed and re-echoed till it is realised in the international relations of the several communities of Europe.

* See Grindrod's Compendium of the Laws and Regulations of Wesleyan Methodism, pp. 14, 15 (5th ed.).

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Pamphlet Mission, Chicago, keeps up the high quality of its articles in all the departments. No. 10, for July 1st, contains a sermon by Henry Lang, late pastor of St. Peter's Church, Zurich, Switzerland, on "My grace is sufficient for Thee," translated by the Rev. Charles W. Wendte. It also contains numerous interesting items of news and notes.

The Freethought Journal, of Toronto, is an ably-edited monthly paper. It shows its good sense by refusing to publish accounts of clerical scandals, in which some "infidel" papers take so much vulgar delight. The Journal wisely prefers to help mankind up, rather than to spend so much time berating their faults. "Such descriptions are necessarily coarse and vulgar, and we shall continue to rigidly exclude them from our pages. Apart from their coarseness, however, we object to giving such scandals prominence."

Modern Spiritualism has its ablest literary representative in the Psychological Review, the second number of which has been issued. (London: E. W. Allen). The best article in the number, however, is one which has no direct relation to spiritualism—the article on "The Two Schools of Thought"—Intuitionism and Utilitarianism—by Mr. St. George Stock. The Rev. H. N. Grimley conducts us pleasantly to Issoudun, and tells graphically of impressive services he witnessed there in September 1874 and 1875. "The Psychology of the Bible" is a review of Dr. Delitzsch's work in the interests of "psychical vision." The notice of the late James Hinton is very scrappy; and the rest of the articles, which are devoted to the special purpose of the Review, leave us as unconverted as before. Something worthy of "spirit revelation" has yet to come.

A century and a half ago that malicious wit, Voltaire, who never knew how to do a generous thing without mixing it with some malignant stab at somebody, paraded the Servetus story in its worst light by way of exhibiting Protestants as equally intolerant with Catholics. One of the most eminent of the Geneva pastors, Vernet, set himself to the task of refutation, and made application to the city council for access to the official documents, which at that time were kept under lock and key. He was surprised at the delays and discouragements which he encountered. The syndic Calandrini advised him that silence seemed better than anything that could be said. Vernet begged him that at least three questions which he wished to put might be answered from the documents, and pressed his petition with some importunity. He received a letter at last from the syndic, of which he could not complain as wanting in explicitness. It ran in this wise: "The council considers it important that the criminal procedure against Servetus should not be made public, and does not wish it to be communicated to any person whatever, either in whole or in part. The conduct of Calvin and of the council was such that we wish it to be buried in profound oblivion. There is no defence for Calvin. Plead the state of your health for dropping a work which will either be damaging to religion, to the Reformation, and to the good fame of Geneva, or will be very unfaithful to the truth." More than a century has gone by, and the archives of Geneva, and many a sorrowful document beside, are now accessible to every comer. But the advice of syndic Calandrini, to any who would attempt the vindication, on this head, of the otherwise illustrious memory of Calvin, is as good advice to-day as it was then.—Scribner's Monthly.

The July Unitarian Review, of Boston, U.S., is full of good things. The Rev. N. P. Gilman, taking Miss Edith Simcox's Natural Law as a text, gives a thoughtful paper on "Ethics as a Science." The elaborate essay on "The Serpent in Genesis," by Lewis J. Dudley, works up the historical facts and critical considerations on the doctrine of a devil with which most of us are familiar. Professor William Everett, in "Christ and the Demoniacs," puts in arguments in favour of the plea that Christ spoke in accordance with the notions of his time, knowing that they were erroneous, but humouring the feelings of those who held them. "The Natural Meaning of the word 'Ought'" is analysed in a careful philosophical article by the Rev. George Batchelor. A paper of special interest is that of Caspar Gregory, of Leipzig, on "Religion and Theological Scholarship in Germany." The Editors' Note-book is occupied with a sketch of the late William Cullen Bryant, and a note on the communistic perils of America. In "Things at Home and Abroad," Mrs. Lowe refers to the Congregational Union, the death of Earl Russell, and the loss our own churches have sustained in the removal from our midst of the Rev. T. E. Poynting. The number is quite worthy of the high reputation the Review has deservedly attained.

DERBY: FRIARGATE CHAPEL. HISTORICAL SKETCH,

WITH SPECIAL NOTICE OF THREE OF ITS EARLIEST MINISTERS AND THEIR SERMONS.

[A LECTURE delivered in the above-named place of worship by Rev. C. D. BADLAND, M.A., on Sunday evening, July 7th, 1878.]

I know also my God, that thou triest the heart, and hast pleasure in uprightness. O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, our fathers, keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of Thy people, and prepare their heart unto Thee.—I. Chronicles, xxix., 17-18.

It is one of the characteristics of the Hebrew religion, which applies also to Christianity as distinguished from philosophical Theism, that history holds in it an important place. Our faith, even if it were in itself unchanged, would be deprived of much of its beauty, interest, and strength, were our connection with the past, and our memory of it, obliterated. In calling ourselves Christians, we are at once referred to the fields of Galilee and the streets of Jerusalem; and a long history of alternating progress and decline, but on the whole of advance and victory, is further suggested. It will be, therefore, in conformity with the genius of our religion that I shall endeavour to bring before you something of history of the religious society with which we are connected. Even matters that have no direct bearing on religion may yet deepen our interest and affection for this house of God, which has been a home for many souls, and so become religious in their effect. I shall not attempt to arrange into a narrative all the bits of information respecting it that have been preserved, chiefly in the form of accounts, but shall direct your attention to a few points only, and in order to do that more effectually I have taken the trouble to hunt up, in an old library in London, three sermons which were preached in the first half of last century by former ministers of this chapel. (Dr. Williams's Library, Funeral Sermons, 9, 3, 7, and 9, 35, 31.)

The first of these was preached at Hackney, September 19th, 1714, by Rev. Ferdinando Shaw, M.A., on "The death of Queen Anne, the Happy Accession of King George to the throne, and his safe arrival in the British dominions." Ferdinando Shaw was appointed minister to this congregation in 1699, the year after the present chapel was built, and remained here till his death, in 1744—a ministry, therefore, of forty-five years. The congregation is older than the chapel. As early as the reign of Elizabeth it assembled in various places, "hidden away from a magistrate." In the reign of Charles II. it met for worship in a chapel near St. Mary's Bridge, which was licensed by the Bishop in 1662, and which I believe is now used as a Church mission-room, so that it is still employed for religious purposes; and in the reign of James II. in a building at the corner of Irongate. The first two ministers—at least, the first whose names are preserved—were W. Cross and Robert Moore, who were clergymen ejected from the Church of England, no doubt because they could not make the declarations required by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. For many years they were liable to continual persecution, and to confinement in filthy unwholesome dungeons, "in which eight thousand Dissenters died during the reign of Charles II." (Brooke Herford's Story of Religion in England, p. 249.) In 1689 the Act of Toleration was passed by that great benefactor of this nation, William III.; and in that year many Nonconformist places of worship were erected. But for some reason the building of that in which we assemble was delayed for nine years longer. W. Cross lived just long enough to see the work completed, or nearly so, and was then succeeded by F. Shaw, Robert Moore still remaining a minister till 1704. Mr. Shaw may also have been brought up a Churchman, shown perhaps by his degree; but all that I know of him is, that he married nine years after he had been settled here, that he survived his wife only three years, and that he died much respected, at least by the Nonconformists of the surrounding district; which is shown by the list of pall-bearers, including the ministers, from some distance round, among other places Burton and Wirksworth. (Wilson's Biographical Collections, Dr. Williams's Library.) [There is a notice preserved of him in the chapel account-book which indicates that he possessed a generous and amiable character. See notes at end of lecture.] And now that we know a little of the man and his circumstances we may turn to his sermon.

I shall not trouble you with an analysis of it, but will confine myself to the salient points. It shows him to have been a strong opponent of Popery, an ardent politician, and a sound Radical; that is, he was an enthusiastic Hanoverian, and gloried in the supremacy of the laws above any hereditary rights of the Crown. The first extract I will make shows that he entertained the views respecting divine judgments upon nations which were prevalent, if not universal, among religious men of his time. After speaking of the mercies that had been enjoyed in the reign of Queen Anne—peace, toleration, &c., for which he says, and rightly, "we ought to praise our God"—he continues: "And if in any respects things happened contrary to our wishes, yet let us consider that our sins deserved far worse, and might have provoked God to have suffered far greater evils to have come upon us, as the just punishment of our iniquities; and since these were so heinous and so numerous, 'tis really a wonder that we enjoyed so many mercies—nay, any at all—and were not wholly given up into the hands of our enemies, whose tenderest mercies are cruelties" (p. 12). I will not pause to put that into terms of modern thought, and in so doing to point out the mingling of error with profound truth which it contains. I give it to show that we are dealing with past time, when men's thoughts, and still more their forms of thinking, were different from ours.

I will now pass, without preface, to another extract. "I shall not enter into a long and unprofitable discourse about the divine, hereditary, and indefeasible right of kings" [no doubt he called up his best sneer in delivering those words, the watchword of the Stuart party], "it shall suffice me to say that though our present king has no such right, yet he is, by the providence of God, by the laws of our land, and by the voice of the people, our king, and our only king" (p. 14). The italics are his. And a little further on, after showing that with the exception of Catholics, who were declared incapable of reigning, George I. was the nearest heir to the throne, he says: "But if he had no such title, yet since the laws have settled the crown on him that would be a sufficient title, and is indeed the best. For 'tis enacted that the Prince, Lords, and Commons have a power to limit and settle the crown as they see fit, and whosoever by speaking or writing shall affirm the contrary is guilty of high treason by the 4 and 5 of Q. Anne. But not to lead you into politics" (p. 15). That former minister of ours was not a Republican, but he unhesitatingly preferred the laws, the constitution, and the rights of the people before the prerogative of the crown. He evidently considered that the king's authority existed by the will of the people, and for the sake of the people. His attachment to the House of Hanover, as against the Stuarts, was so enthusiastic that it led him to say the only inducement to George I. to come among us was "to save us from Popery and slavery" (p. 16), leaving out of sight the gratification of his ambition and his great increase of wealth. Also, he was evidently inclined to see something almost miraculous in the convenient shifting of the wind when he wanted to cross over to assume the crown. But the chief foundation of this attachment was the dread of Catholicism, with the absolutism in Church and State, which it still advocates, and the persecutions then a pressing danger, but which it still practices with modifications where it has the power. "What a mercy, then, are we to esteem it," he writes, "that God has not suffered us to fall into the hand of a Popish pretender! Many and unwearied were the attempts made this way, both by pretended Protestants at home, under the ridiculous pretence of an hereditary right, and by professed potent Papists abroad, in order to the rooting out of what they call the northern heresy." (p. 24). I must break off a long eloquent sentence full of living feeling and thankfulness.

With that I conclude my notice of this political sermon, the oldest preached by a minister of the Friargate Chapel that I can find. His successors have worthily followed in his steps, recognising the important influence of political matters upon the highest welfare of the nation. And they have sometimes got into trouble by so doing. The Rev. James Pilkington, in 1796, just after the French Revolution, gave such great offence by a publication, entitled "The Doctrine of Equality," that it caused him to send in his resignation, but at a meeting called to consider the matter it was unanimously resolved not to accept it. (See notes.) I may say here, that three years before that the Sunday school was started by a Mr. Roe: a step by which something would be done towards removing the ignorance that is the chief bar to true equality, and one great cause of the miseries which lead to such political outbursts as that which then filled the nations with wild terrors, and almost wilder anticipations of good. So that we see our predecessors at once sympathised keenly with the flushed hopes of their day, and threw themselves into the struggle for ideal good, and at the same time set themselves to remove one by one the stones which block the advance of its triumphant chariot. And so as long as we recognise the religious importance of daily life, and keep up our sympathies with this world of God and with mankind, our ministers will almost inevitably be politicians. And if you would not have us recluses—recluses of the pulpit instead of the hermitage—you must be content to accept the necessary consequences of an occasional excess of political zeal, of mistakes as to the side adopted and as to the time or manner of adopting it, for the only way to avoid all mistakes in politics is to commit the greatest of all—that of doing and caring nothing.

But we must not delay any longer to take up the second of the three sermons that form our subject. It is a funeral sermon for Rev. John Platts, and was preached at Ilkeston, November 30th, 1735, by Rev. Josiah Rogerson. Respecting Mr. Rogerson I know very little, except that he came to Derby in 1724 (not '45, as stated in Christian Freeman, June, 1868), and remained till his death in 1763; and that when he had been settled here twenty-nine years he received, in addition to his regular salary, the sum of £5. 5s. "for his long and faithful service in the said congregation."

His sermon has four main heads, as well as a lastly which includes the biographical notice of Mr. Platts, and the first of his four heads has two subdivisions, the first of which is again divided into three. The third main head is also divided into two, and all these divisions are duly indicated by figures. The interest it has for us consists in the theological position it takes up, but it is in itself also a simple, earnest, and grave discourse, showing the working of a vigorous reason and active conscience, though with something of the philosophical stiffness, or however it is to be described, which characterises many writings of the eighteenth century. Speaking of the enemies, Sin and Death, that are to be overcome at the resurrection, he says respecting the former: "(1) When we view it in its malignant nature, sin is the transgression of the divine law. In the indulgence and commission of it, reasonable creatures act contrary to the true and known reason of things; contrary to that just and unalterable order and equity which God, the Author and Lord of all, has established in the first constitution of things; contrary to the light of their own reason, the dictates of their own conscience, and the unprejudiced judgment of their own minds" (p. 13). The light of reason and the dictates of conscience are, you see, asserting their right to a voice in questions of religion and morality. I do not mean to say that Mr. Rogerson was much of a heretic, but he had certainly entered upon the course of thinking which was to lead to the startling results that have developed themselves among his successors. He was himself fairly orthodox, occupying very much the position which is now assumed by many Congregationalists and Baptists; but the old landmarks were beginning to be moved, as is the case with the orthodox Dissenters of the present day. That we shall see by examining some of his words.

Again speaking of sin, he says: "(3) It may well be called an enemy when we view it in its dreadful consequences. How evidently does it destroy the health, the reputation, the inward peace and comfort of the sinner. How plain is it whither it is leading him, even to endless and unsupportable misery, unless this be prevented by a timely and sincere repentance." He repeats the expression endless and unsupportable misery a few lines further on, adding "where the worm never dies, and the fire is not quenched" (p. 20). And again he speaks of death as being "a dreadful period" to the guilty, "especially whilst they view it as the forerunner of that wrath which must abide upon them for ever, and from which there is no release" (p. 24). From that you see that the doctrine of eternal punishment, which we so strongly denounce, must have been, something more than a century ago, strongly advocated from this very pulpit. Ours is a free church. Mr. Rogerson was free to preach this doctrine, as I am free to deny it; and both are free to be honest, are violating no legal or honourable conditions in our affirmations or our denials. Mr. Rogerson has also left us some words upon salvation which are instructive. Here, too, he was moderately orthodox, but not strictly so. I may observe beforehand that there is a strong subordination of the Son to the Father, very different in tone from the Jesuolatry, crying Jesus only, which is now the fashion in some quarters (e.g., in a meeting of Baptists in this town which I attended some time ago, there was only one minister who used the word God, all the others speaking exclusively of Jesus). He says of the victory over sin and death (1) "It is the gift of God, of the God and Father of all. It is properly so called since the spring and original contrivance of that salvation, which is accomplished by a Redeemer, was from the wonderful wisdom and the free grace and goodness of God, unasked and undeserved by us. He is all along in Scripture language represented as forming the design, giving his Son, sending him for us, as finding a ransom, providing a Saviour, &c." (2) "It is through Jesus Christ our Lord; i.e., the great God and Governor of all did not think fit to pardon sin, and receive sinners to mercy, but upon the death and sacrifice of his own Son. However good and rich in mercy, he did not think fit to forgive even penitent sinners but in this way and method" (pp. 29-31). There is a subtle odour of heresy pervading all that. Mr. Rogerson may even, perhaps, have already adopted the high Arian doctrine. Christ certainly does not appear like the equal of the Father. Observe also the reason for the sacrifice, that God did not think fit to pardon without it. We are not told that it is the only way—that any other would be impossible as a violation of justice, or anything of that sort—but only that it was the most fitting way, the one which God thought best to choose. The prominence assigned to repentance, in this and a previous quotation, is also to be noticed. And the advancing triumph of moral considerations over theological figments becomes still more apparent a few lines further on, in the same section from which I have just quoted. He writes thus: "This is the redemption we have through his blood, the forgiveness of sins. He has more expressly proposed the terms of faith and repentance" [repentance again, but in conjunction with faith; but observe the explanation he proceeds to give of these terms. I am continuing the quotation], "that if we believe on him whom God has sent, become willing subjects of his kingdom, and honestly endeavour to live according to the rules he has given us, and the example he has left us, to rectify what has been amiss, and to perfect holiness in his fear for the future, we shall be accepted and justified from all those things from which we could not be justified by the law" (p. 31). The value of works is certainly coming to be recognised. And Mr. Rogerson's position is made still more clear at the close of the section. "Christ," he says, "has proposed the most easy conditions of acceptance." And what? Only believe? Take a dip in the fountain? or anything of that sort? No! "Not insisting upon perfect sinless obedience without any failure or defect, but accepting uprightness and sincerity, which is our Gospel-perfection" (p. 32); i.e., works are necessary, but not sufficient, and their defect will be supplied by faith and repentance, and by the mercy of God, which he has thought fit to exercise through the death of Christ. These are the opinions of a man who occupied this pulpit during the second quarter of last century, and a little later, and who was therefore probably born somewhere about the time that the chapel was built. I will close my remarks upon his sermon by a few words of praise which he wrote respecting the subject of it—Mr. Platts, of Ilkeston—showing the conduct and disposition which he thought praiseworthy. "He was a diligent inquirer after truth; he bid it welcome wherever he found it, and was not ashamed or afraid to own and profess what, after the strictest examination, he took to be so. This might raise him some enemies amongst persons in a different way of thinking from himself; but it was his glory with a great many others of no inconsiderable name, and they valued him the more for it" (p. 44). We are proud to own the man who was worthy of that praise, and the man who thought fit so to praise him, as our forerunners in the fellowship of our free churches. Such men were rapidly clearing the way for advancing truth. And we reap the reward of their labours in the honourable and useful, though not altogether pleasant position, which we occupy in the religious world of our day—a true reward, although it resembles that bestowed on Spartan valour, the privilege of fighting in the thickest press of battle nearest to the person of the king. And this we owe, among others, to John Platts and Josiah Rogerson.

The writer of the third sermon, Rev. Ebenezer Latham, M.D., was, I should judge, the most eminent man who has occupied this pulpit. He was ordained in 1707 or 1708, and from that time, I believe, till 1746 when he removed to Derby, he was minister at Findern. He was at the same time occupied in conducting one of those private academies by which Dissenters endeavoured to supply the place of the Universities, from which they were excluded, and to provide a training for their ministers. He was a man of universal attainments—scientific, literary, and theological, as from the want of division of labour, the teachers of those academies were obliged to be. That a considerable amount of learning was communicated may be judged from the fact that he was able to continue the practice of his predecessor, of setting his pupils to sing Greek and Latin psalms. In the course of time his academy fell off, owing to the growing fame of a rival establishment, conducted by Dr. Doddridge, and also (my authority mentions this first) to a suspicion that he was not sound in his faith. (Wilson's Biographical Collections.) With this reputation for heresy he was chosen minister of the Friargate Chapel, as successor to Ferdinando Shaw, and co-pastor to Josiah Rogerson. Throughout last century, it should be mentioned, there were generally two ministers here, their salaries being £30 at the beginning of the century, and rising as the value of money decreased to £50. Ebenezer Latham was "passing rich with £40 a year." But I expect that all these ministers were also engaged in teaching; otherwise I can hardly understand what need there can have been for two able ministers at the same time, for a congregation that, from the size of the chapel, can never have been a very large one. He died in 1754, after he had been settled here eight years.

His sermon is, I consider, the best of the three. It certainly approaches nearest to our modern way of thinking; and on that account it may be dealt with most briefly. It is a funeral sermon for Rev. Daniel Madock, of Uttoxeter, preached May 26th, 1745 (the same year that the Pretender came to Derby), and its subject is "Preparation for Death, and Fitness for Heaven." Its contents and purpose may be indicated by a short quotation: "I doubt not every person in this assembly thinks of going to heaven at last; but the fatal mistake of the way to it" [by which, though he does not say so, he evidently means faith without works] "is owing to the crude, undigested conceptions persons form of it, only as a Place, not as a State, as a scene of ease and happiness without attending to the necessary ingredients hereof: whereas, if they were set right in this respect, it is impossible they should not apprehend that all the purity and holiness . . . to which we are now called when we take in the whole Gospel-revelation, is necessary to the promised happiness. There must be a heaven in the soul now to render it meet for one at last; it must be begun here to be consummated hereafter. This is what I have immediately upon my hands to demonstrate; and in order to make it evident I beg to lay down these two propositions" (pp. 7, 8). He has to elaborate and support them, but I may content myself with stating them in his words: (1) "That the happiness of all beings must be suited to their capacities and dispositions for relishing it." (2) . . . "that, as men leave this world they enter upon another; the soul goes out of this State with all its consciousness, with the same thoughts and inclinations about it that it had in it" (pp. 8, 9). Then he gives his idea of heaven in the following terms: "God himself is represented as the lot of this inheritance: good men are said to be for ever with the Lord; they shall see him and be like him; shall know as they are known. In consequence of which, it must be a State of the greatest intellectual improvement, and of the highest moral sense of virtue and holiness; where there will be the most absolute conformity to the Divine nature, an exact and regular obedience to his will, and an entire resignation to this" (p. 11). He further speaks of this inheritance as one in which we shall be joint heirs with Christ (p. 13) with the saints in light, from which he argues for brotherly love (p. 16) as undefiled (p. 18) and everlasting (p. 21). From this he can easily show—as he does, with power and eloquence—that the preparation for heaven, without which it is impossible to attain it, is piety, kindness, good temper, purity, unworldliness. "Those who have imbibed the spirit of Christ's religion, and in the sacred style put on the Lord Jesus, being adorned with all the graces and virtues of this institution, have the wedding garment on, and may wait his coming with joy" (p. 15, a little altered in grammatical construction). The whole orthodox scheme of salvation he leaves utterly unnoticed. He takes occasion to show that the Heathen might be saved. "Tis true," he says, "as to the Heathen world, this" [viz., meeting with Christ] "could not enter into their notion of heaven; but the good and virtuous among them, having known the Father, and been instructed by his wisdom, the first Christian writers" [in fact, only some of them] "did not hesitate to pronounce they should be well received of the Son; for as they" [viz., the Christian writers] "conceived him to be the Δεσπotes, the word or reason that enlightened every man, all that strictly followed this they numbered among his disciples; and 'tis certain they were not far from the Kingdom of Heaven" (p. 14). He also says, in speaking of the inheritance of the saints in light and brotherly love: "I am sensible there is a sort of religious zeal, that has been made a colour for very unhappy contentions; but, when we consider that we know but in part, where there is so little light 'tis pity there should be any such heat; any of that Jewish spirit among the sects of Christians; that fondness for their own little inclosures, now the old partition wall is taken down." He urges against this, that "we may find in the many mansions—those wide extended territories—several sincere inquirers after truth that were in a different way of thinking from us, even in what we esteem material points. For who art thou that judgest another? To his own master he stands or falls. And if there is reason then to think many who differ very widely now will meet there, since they are both accepted above should they not receive one another mutually to communion and fellowship on earth?" (p. 17).

Fare thee well brave, wise, loving soul, who couldest suffer loss and reproach for truth's sake, and still preach peace and charity! We may no longer listen to thy words here, but we, also, will hope to meet thee there, in the many mansions.

From Dr. Latham to Dr. Hutton, who was minister here from 1852 to 1860, the chasm of thought is not difficult to bridge. And thus in him—the co-pastor of Rogerson (and what wide charity there must have been for those two men to work together), the successor of Shaw, who was third elected minister of this congregation and whose pastorate dated from the erection of the chapel—in him we are connected, through but few links, in one chain of religious communion and faith with those whom we love to speak of as our Puritan forefathers; with those who were persecuted with imprisonment (which oftentimes meant death) for religious truth and liberty. Those who built this place of worship, not knowing, of course, what would be the result, left it free to be used for teaching whatever new truth might be learned as the years rolled on; so that we can still occupy it with perfect honesty. The liberty they granted soon bore fruit, and we have reached our present position not by a sudden revolutionary bound, but by a process of steady, natural growth, honest and outspoken all along. It is a noble history that has occupied our attention; a history of brave, obscure work, of learning, piety, fidelity to principle, and devotion to truth; continued, up to quite recent days, beneath civil disabilities, and many losses of wealth, reputation, and social esteem, and still under religious reproach and outlawry. It is a glorious inheritance to which we have succeeded, and the house in which we pray is hallowed by many sacred memories. May we be faithful to the trust which has devolved upon us, in devotion to truth, in reverence and righteousness; and let us give heed, that we fail not in the spirit of piety and religious trust, nor grow indifferent to the assembling of ourselves for worship, nor to the solemn meeting in the house of God. "I know also, O my God, that thou triest the heart, and hast pleasure in uprightness." (As was taught in this place from the first.) "O Lord God of our father, keep this for ever in the imagination of the thought of the heart of thy people, and prepare their heart unto thee." Amen.

HISTORICAL NOTES.

Notes taken from the chapel account book, containing also occasional minutes of resolutions passed:—

(1.) At a general meeting held at ye New Chappell belonging to ye Congregation of Dissenting Protestants in Derby (in an entry of 1699 it is called the Presbyterian Congregation) upon Thursday ye sixth day of July, 1704.

It was then agreed as Followeth—

Whereas ye late Reverend Mr. Moore, one of our Pastors, is deceased, We doe hereby agree to invite our other surviving Pastor, ye Reverend Mr. Shaw, to take upon himself ye whole Pastoral Care and Charge. At wch tyme the said Mr. Shaw did thereto agree upon these termes Following (viz.) That he should choose an Assistant such a one as the Congregation should approve of who should ordinarily preach one Lord's day in Foure, and Mr. Shaw the other three, And that this settlement should commence from Michaelmas next ensuing, and that in the mean tyme Mr. Moore's widow should receive her share of the profits as if Mr. Moore had been living, Provided she duly supply the Vacancy.

Accordingly, we find the following entries of expenditure for the year:—

Paid to Mr. Shaw	45 00 00
To Mr. Moore	7 10 00
To Mrs. Moore since his death ..	7 10 00

The year before each of the ministers received £30. This year Mr. Shaw acted for the second half as sole minister, which he continued to do till the appointment of Mr. Rogerson as his co-pastor in 1724, receiving a salary of £60, out of which he paid his assistants. Hence there was £15 to be paid to Mr. Moore and his widow. It is a pity that she could not keep the whole of the £7. 10s. without having to "duly supply the vacancy."

(2.) The proceedings of the meeting of subscribers, March 27, 1796, to consider Mr. Pilkington's resignation, are recorded as follows, after giving the names of the persons present, twelve in number, including three members of the Strutt family:—

"It was stated to the meeting that a late publication of Mr. Pilkington's, entitled 'The Doctrine of Equality, &c.' had given offence to some members of the congregation, who had declared their intention of withdrawing their subscriptions unless Mr. Pilkington resigned his present situation as minister.

Resolved unanimously: "That persecution or punishment for speculative opinions would be inconsistent with the principles of the friends of truth and free inquiry, and therefore that the objections urged do not appear sufficient for an acquiescence in Mr. Pilkington's resignation."

Mr. Pilkington, who entered on his ministry in 1781, accordingly remained a short time after this; but his connection with his chapel was terminated at Lady Day, 1797.

From about the same period, apparently the year 1810, the following entry is taken:—

The First Burial (in the chapel) was a child of Mr. Wood's, of Little Chester, which the then Vicar (sic) of St. Alkmund's—Cantrell refused to bury on account that He—had not Baptised it—but after the Child was interred He the Vicar had the impudence (sic) to send for His "fees"—which were not paid Him.

In the same year 1810 it was the opinion of a meeting of subscribers that "if some steps are not taken to interest and animate the members and others, there is reason to fear the society will soon cease to exist."

"Resolved 1st: That the inaudible manner in which the service is delivered is the most prominent cause of complaint, and which after what has already passed the members of the society can entertain no hope of being removed."

Two other resolutions were devoted to making as little unpleasant as possible an intimation "to their much esteemed friend and pastor that there is great reason to believe that the welfare of the society may be promoted by his resignation." Under the next minister, Rev. E. Higginson, the congregation was again brought into a satisfactory condition.

(3.) There is a curious entry in the accounts for 1754—

Pd to Mr. Jeremh. Roe for 43 of Doctr. Watt's Psalms Books	5 6 0
Pd to Mr. Chase for 42 chains for ye Psalms Books	0 17 6

The book for which no chain was provided may have been for the pulpit or vestry, not for the minister, for there were two. Probably there were not many strangers attending; otherwise the 42 chains might have been as great an incumbrance in their way as the original 42 Articles of the Church of England.

(4.) The following is the list of ministers for two centuries:—

- 1662(?) W. Cross, ejected from Beeston. Died, 1698. [1704.
- 1699 Robt. Moore, ejected from Brompton, Derbyshire. Died, 1744.

- 1754 — Thomas White, successor to Latham, co-pastor with Rogerson; afterwards with assistants Hezekiah Kirkpatrick, John Wilding, and 1778, James Pilkington. Died, 1779 or 80.
- 1779 { Jas. Pilkington. Left (or died) about 1797.
- 1779 { N. Philips. Died, 1798 or '7.

- 1862 — W. Oates.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

MANCHESTER: CROSS-STREET CHAPEL.

ON February 5th, 1825, the members of this congregation waited upon the Rev. John Robberds, and presented him with one thousand guineas for his faithful and zealous services, extending over a period of 14 years, and as a cordial and unanimous testimony of the high estimation in which he was held by the members, and as a mark of their high regard. Again on the 20th of April, 1853, Dr. Ashton in the chair, the congregation, limiting themselves in amount, presented to the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., a silver salver, coffee and tea service in grateful remembrance of his ministerial services during a period of 25 years, and as a tribute of their respect and affection. On that occasion the Rev. John Robberds, the senior minister, said he did not know whether the idea of this testimonial had originated with any of their German friends, but it reminded him of a beautiful German custom—that of celebrating a marriage day under the name of a silver wedding. And as they went further, and distinguished the 50th like anniversary as a golden one, so, though he himself and others present might not see it, yet he could not but hope that there would be occasion for a similar extension of the present proceedings. The hope thus gracefully expressed is now fulfilled. On Sunday next the Rev. Wm. Gaskell will have been the minister of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, 50 years. Mr. Gaskell will conduct the service in the morning.

BRADFORD.

OPENING OF A NEW UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

A BRANCH Sunday school (an offshoot from the Chapel Lane School) was opened in Laisterdyke on Sunday, July 28th. The circumstances of the opening were most favourable, and there seems every reason to believe that the school will supply a long felt want, and that it has before it a career of great usefulness in the neighbourhood. The room that has been rented for the purpose is the ground floor of a two-storey building (the upper storey being used as a workshop), and is about 12 yards long by 6 yards wide; it can be made, it is expected, to accommodate 80 to 100 scholars. During the past few weeks the members of the committee have been hard at work making ready, and the result of their labours is very gratifying. The room has been made to look comfortable and inviting, and an excellent harmonium has been placed in it which will contribute much towards making the singing successful.

A thorough canvas had been made of the immediate vicinity, and a good number of promises of scholars had been obtained, but the result on the day of opening surpassed all expectation. During the day 61 scholars were enrolled, of which number 6 only had belonged to the parent school, and 22 were over 12 years of age.

At the close of the school in the morning a children's service was held, [conducted by Mr. R. W. Silson. Parents had been invited to attend the service, and several responded by being present. Mr. Silson chose for his text 1 Sam., iii. chap., 10 verse, and impressed on his hearers that God speaks to us just as much now as he did in days of old. He dwelt on the various ways in which God speaks to us—through conscience, through the glorious works of nature—and in terms and with illustrations admirably adapted to the children's comprehension—urged them to listen to God's voice and obey it. The discourse was exceedingly well conceived, and no one could listen to it, whether child or grown-up person, without being benefited.

After lessons in the afternoon Mr. Brewer gave an excellent address to the scholars, dealing with the work it was proposed to do in the school. It is intended after a time, if found practicable, to hold Sunday evening services, but at present the work will be limited to the Sunday school.

It has long been felt by those who have at heart the cause of Unitarianism in Bradford, that an effort of this kind ought to be made, the population having gradually left the centre of the town, where the parent school is situated, thus making it almost impossible that that school should ever have, in point of numbers, any very high measure of success. It is therefore very cheering that the new school should open with such good promise, and we may be encouraged to hope, now that the first step has been taken, that we may ere long see more branches of a like nature planted in other parts of the town.

ASTLEY AND CROFT.—On Saturday last a number of our friends at Croft drove over to Astley and spent a pleasant day with their Astley friends in a field at the farm of Mr. Grundy.

CHELMSFORD.—In the absence of the Rev. W. A. Pope, who had been invited to preach at Ipswich, the services at the Board-room of the Corn Exchange last Sunday were conducted by James Youngman, Esq., of Woodham, who delivered two sermons, that in the morning from Genesis, v., 24—"And Enoch walked with God," and in the evening from Luke, xvi., 31—"If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." At the close of the latter service a meeting was held to consider the proposed purchase of land for building on, and also to hear the reply of the Eastern Unitarian Mission to the request of the congregation for its assistance in the matter. We are informed that the application has been favourably considered.

COSELEY.—On Tuesday, July 23rd, the members of the Old Meeting House, choir, and a few friends, numbering 35, paid their annual excursion to Hodge Bower. The splendid ride was much enjoyed by the party, who were accompanied by the Rev. Henry Eachus, the minister. A capital dinner was provided by Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, to whom a hearty vote of thanks was passed. After dinner the party visited various points of interest in the vicinity. At 6.30 they returned home, arriving about eleven o'clock. During the pleasant journey some excellent music was sung, which added much to the enjoyments of the day. Much praise is due to the Secretary, Mr. James George, for the excellent arrangements which he made.

DEVONPORT: THANKSGIVING FOR PEACE.—A service of thanksgiving for the preservation of peace was held in the Unitarian Chapel, on Sunday evening last. After appropriate introductory religious exercises, the Rev. W. Sharman, who took as his text Psalm 147, 14th verse, said that, however various might be the opinions held by thoughtful persons concerning the Treaty of Berlin, there could be only one feeling among all Englishmen concerning its immediate result—a feeling of thankfulness to the Supreme Disposer of events that the nation had been saved from the calamities of war. It might be that the peace secured by the treaty would prove to be only an armed and hollow truce, and that the unsatisfied aspirations of Slavs, Greeks, Italians, Russians, Armenians, and Austrians would in a few years give rise to a terrible conflict. Certainly the Congress had shown that it represented the dynasties, not the people, by its failure to take any steps to put an end to the gigantic armaments that curse all Europe. Yet whatever the future might have in store, they could not fail to be thankful that a time of peace had come which, rightly used, might avert the evils that threatened the world. If the acquisition of Cyprus should really lead not only to the restoration of that island to civilisation, but also to the amelioration of the condition of the barbarously misgoverned peoples of Asia Minor, there would be no cause to regret the fact, whatever might be said about the manner of its accomplishment. He should rejoice in such a result for the sake of interests near home, because he could not believe that Englishmen would much longer consent to postpone everything that affected their homes and hearths to the consideration of foreign matters. When they saw that the arm of England could make Cyprus again populous and wealthy, could open closed harbours, purify pestilential places, and make serviceable waters now running to waste in destructive floods, they would begin to ask why is not this power used at home also? Why does Parliament meet year after year without doing anything to lessen drunkenness, pauperism, crime, and injustice? Why do we strive so long and so vainly to prevent floods in the valley of the Thames, or to get wholesome water and good sanitary conditions for our country villages? Such questions would in due time bring their answer in the election of a Parliament which, while neglectful of no Imperial interest, will not postpone England to India, and Ireland to Cyprus.

DUNDEE.—Mrs. Caroline A. Soule, president of the Woman's Universalist Centenary Association of America, and Evangelist, delivered two discourses, afternoon and evening, in the Unitarian Christian Church, last Sunday. In addition to persons identified with the church, there were present numbers of strangers who had in most cases never before ventured to enter the building. The discourses were characterised by the best qualities, and although based upon the Unitarian Christian position, it was evident no one seemed to have occasion to find fault even from the orthodox side. On Monday evening the Sunday-school teachers invited Mrs. Soule to a social meeting. About a hundred friends assembled; the chair was taken by the minister, Mr. Williamson. Mrs. Soule delivered an earnest and interesting address, in which she exhorted the friends to get into some really philanthropic work individually and collectively. The following resolution was moved by Miss Howie, seconded by Mr. Rogers (linguist), a visitor, and carried unanimously—"The presence of Mrs. C. A. Soule in Dundee offers to the meeting called by the Sunday-school teachers of the Dundee Unitarian Church a fit occasion to give her a hearty welcome, and to express the regard of the brothers and sisters of Dundee for her." Addresses were also delivered by Mrs. M. Parker, of Newport, and Mr. David Jobson. The ladies of the Universalist Church in America have sent Mrs. Soule to give a labour of love to the cause of Liberal Christianity in Scotland, for at least one year. Her mission has already been productive of good.

GLASGOW.—Our friends at St. Vincent-street intend to give their Sunday school a holiday. They announce in their calendar for July that "The Sunday school will be closed during the month of August."

HULME: EMBDEN-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Saturday last, the second pic-nic of the season was held at Northenden. The weather being fine, a large party assembled, some enjoying themselves by boating, while others betook themselves to rambles round the neighbourhood. An excellent tea was provided, and the excursion was in every respect a very pleasant one.

KING'S LYNN.—On Sunday week the Sunday school anniversary services of the Free Christian Church were held by the Rev. Barnard Gisby. The subject in the morning was "Spiritual Influence, conscious and unconscious;" that in the evening, "Immortality the Solution of the Present." The congregations were excellent, and the response on behalf of the school fund was most encouraging, far exceeding that of any previous year. In the school there are 150 children, who were present at the morning service, and at a special service for the young in the afternoon. Addresses were delivered by Mr. A. P. Allen (superintendent), Mr. G. A. Prince (Leeds), and the pastor. The singing and recitations of the children showed that much care had been given by their instructors to their training. On Monday the annual "outing" of the children to Hunstanton, a rapidly improving watering place on the Norfolk coast, took place. This "outing," could it be witnessed year by year by those whose ideas are opposed to Unitarianism, might be an unmistakable demonstration to them of what our faith, when rightly understood and loyally supported even by a few, will accomplish, notwithstanding persistent opposition. The procession was headed by the drum and fife band of the school, and banners borne by the children of various descriptions, but most of them bearing mottoes suggestive of the spirit of our faith. Messrs. Allen, Green, and Bridges, and Mrs. Cawston, Mrs. Green, and other ladies, were unceasing in their endeavours to conduce to the pleasure of the occasion.

KINGSWOOD, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—On Sunday last the Rev. John Trist, of Diss, preached the anniversary sermons to large and attentive congregations, when collections were made to defray the remaining debt for the restoration and improvement of the chapel. The present building was erected in 1792. The original chapel was erected prior to the Reformation, which was burnt to ashes at the time of the Birmingham riots in 1791. After the destruction a new site was given by the Government, on which the present building was erected in 1792. It has now been restored and renovated at the cost of £1,000, and more. The society has been struggling for the last three years to relinquish the debt, which, by the efforts and sacrifices of friends, has been reduced to a very few pounds. The collections on Sunday amounted to £75. 14s. 6d., meanwhile other friends have contributed £51.

LEEDS: MILL HILL CHAPEL.—The chapel on Sunday morning and evening was crowded to excess, when the great "Blacksmith preacher of the West," Robert Collyer, preached. The two sermons were of marvellous power and eloquence, touched with genuine humour, and at times tinged with sadness. From the evening text, "Antipas, the faithful martyr," Mr. Collyer preached a sermon that deeply impressed the congregation, amongst which were a large number of prominent members and ministers of other churches. The closing hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," was sung with a hearty feeling but rarely heard. On Saturday afternoon, the Sunday scholars and choir were invited to St. Anne's, Burley, by the Mayor and Mayoress of Leeds. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the treat was thoroughly enjoyed. The choir from the terrace sang a number of glees, and races, cricket, &c., were indulged in in the field. After tea about 200 assembled in front of the house, and on the proposition of Mr. Wilberforce a vote of thanks was passed with hearty cheering. The Mayor replied on behalf of the Mayoress and himself, and stated what a pleasure it always was to him to meet school children, but more especially to meet those with whom he worshipped. Previous to departing, the choir sang "Good night."

LONDON AND WELCOMBE.—The marriage of Mr. W. E. Price, M.P. for Tewkesbury, and Miss Phillips, daughter of Mr. R. N. Phillips, M.P. for Bury, took place at the Little Portland-street Chapel on Monday, the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., officiating. The bride received many presents, including a clock and vases of Pompeian pattern, accompanied by an address, from Mr. Price's constituents, asking her to accept, for herself and Captain Price, their hearty congratulations and highest aspirations for their happiness. The Birmingham Post reports that a large party of friends and relatives were entertained at breakfast by Mr. R. N. Phillips, M.P., at his residence in Berkeley Square, and the newly-wedded couple afterwards left for the United States. The wedding was made the occasion for much rejoicing and great festivities in Stratford and the district around, where the bride's relatives are well known and widely esteemed for their benevolence and hospitality.

MERTHYR TYDFIL.—On Wednesday, July 24th, the friends connected with the English Unitarian Chapel of this town, gave a treat to their Sunday school scholars at Pontsarn, a most pleasant and romantic spot, and a favourite resort for the Merthyr people. About sixty of the scholars were regaled with a plentiful supply of tea and cake. Several friends from other denominations joined in the festivities, as well as the majority of the members of the congregation. About two hundred in all were present. After tea various innocent amusements were carried on with great spirit, the adults and young people assisting most kindly to amuse the little ones. Towards the end a few dances were gone through by the votaries of terpsichore. Three cheers were given for the ladies, who were indefatigable in their exertions to please, and at eight o'clock the party returned by train, highly pleased with the "outing."

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—On Saturday afternoon last, a united picnic of the teachers in connection with the above Association was held at Dudley Castle. A pleasant afternoon was spent in rambling through the extensive and beautiful grounds surrounding the ruins. Tea was provided in the Baylies' School (kindly lent for the occasion by the trustees), after which a short address was delivered by the president, the Rev. D. Maginnis, who congratulated the teachers on their very successful meeting, and hoped that such a one might be held annually. This wish was responded to by those present in the heartiest manner. The majority of the company then returned to the castle grounds, where they were joined by a number who had been unable to be present at tea, and the rest of the evening was spent in games, rambles to the Wren's Nest, and the inspection of the various workings. Considering the shortness of the notice, and this being the first attempt of its kind in this neighbourhood, the attendance was very satisfactory, eleven schools being represented, and over 120 partaking of tea together. The following ministers were present: Revs. D. Maginnis, Stourbridge (president); T. Bennett Broadrick, Lye (secretary); W. Mellone, Kidderminster; P. Dean, Walsall; H. McKean, Oldbury; W. R. Smyth, Birmingham; J. Harrison, West Bromwich; H. Eachus, Coseley.

NEWCHURCH.—On Saturday, July 20th, a tea meeting and entertainment was held to inaugurate a Bible and elocution class in connection with the Sunday school. Songs and readings were given during the evening by the members of the class.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—On Sunday the Rev. R. Cowley Smith, late of Belfast, having been recently unanimously chosen pastor of the Unitarian Church, Westoe Lane, commenced his ministerial duties, and delivered two discourses to numerous congregations.

STAND.—The marriage of Miss Phillips on Monday last, July 29th, was heartily celebrated by the Sunday school, where she had for many years been a teacher. In a field adjoining the chapel a tent was erected, and a brass band played. Dancing, cricket, and other sports were engaged in, balloons were sent up, and tea and other refreshments were provided. The scholars in Miss Phillips's class gave her on her marriage a handsome Bible, and the teachers and scholars generally presented her with a splendid photograph of Stand Chapel and schoolrooms, handsomely framed, both of which presents the bride has acknowledged in graceful and kindly terms.

TAVISTOCK: ABBEY CHAPEL.—The children of the Abbey Chapel Sunday School had their annual treat on Wednesday, July 24th, on Whitchurch Down, and after they had been bountifully supplied with tea, cake, &c., a large number of visitors sat down to an excellent tea. During the evening various amusements were entered into with great spirit, and before leaving the children sang several hymns. The number of visitors after tea increased to several hundreds, and many enjoyed a dance to the excellent music of a band under the direction of Mr. H. Martin, D.R.V., which greatly contributed to the pleasure of both old and young. Altogether it was the most successful out that has been held for a number of years.

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNITARIAN PROGRESS IN LONDON.

To the Editors.—In what your Oxford Correspondent says respecting Unitarianism in London, the following corrections should be made:—He says the Hampstead congregation used to meet in "what was formerly a coach-house." The old chapel was never anything but a chapel till it was turned into a schoolroom. The coach-house, which no longer exists, was an adjoining building. Your correspondent says also, "Hackney has built a substantial gothic church in place of Carter Lane." It was Unity Church, Islington, not the church at Hackney, that was built for the Carter Lane congregation.—Yours truly, T. SADLER.

THE BASIS OF RELIGIOUS FELLOWSHIP.

To the Editors.—I have just finished reading with considerable interest Mr. Mellor's paper on "The Basis of Religious Fellowship," published in your issue of to-day. One paragraph I have read over and over again, each time with increased astonishment. I refer to the paragraph relating to the devotional meeting at St. Thomas's Square Chapel. This meeting, which to Mr. Charles Beard appeared "an occasion of genuine spiritual inspiration and uplifting," is characterised by Mr. Mellor as an instance of "either unmanly suppression or downright insincerity." I will not question Mr. Mellor's right either to hold this opinion or to express it, but will venture to ask him one simple question. A little further on, in the same paragraph, he says, "The speakers, one and all, seemed supremely anxious to say mild and sweet things, and so managed not to say anything with a bold ring of deep personal and earnest conviction in it." Is this statement the result of a conviction forced upon Mr. Mellor by personal attendance at the meeting, or the result of reports from others who attended the meeting, or is it merely an impression gathered from the thirty lines in which the fullest report of the meeting yet published condensed the speeches of Mr. Tippet, Mr. Beard, and myself? If the first, then I cannot complain; if the second, I venture to refer him to the many ministers of the Unitarian body who, in the vestry at the close of the service and afterwards, expressed their feeling that the service from beginning to end had been earnest, sincere, and helpful; if the third, the absurdity of basing a statement like that given above on so meagre a report will be manifest to all. One question more. Has the test of Unitarianism been found at last? After vain searchings for some doctrinal basis, have we at last discovered one—a refusal to say "Amen" to an Apostolic benediction? Some of us had been told that Paul was a Unitarian, and that whatever doubt there might be about the majority of the Epistles, the first and second Epistles to the Corinthians were pretty certainly the work of Paul. In great bewilderment I venture to ask whether, amid the conflicting answers to the question "What is a Unitarian?" this is the true one—"A Unitarian is a man who cannot say with Paul, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all.'" Is this the test of "advanced" Unitarianism? and is the position of those of us who can and do use that early Christian benediction an inconsistent and insincere one? This is what Mr. Mellor plainly says. Yours, &c., W. CAREY WALTERS.

Whitchurch, Salop, July 26, 1878.

THE GREAT AIM OF UNITARIANISM.

To the Editors.—Like your correspondent, Mr. George Ride, I should much like to see Mr. Cuckson's very admirable paper on "Theism" printed in a form for circulation, but, unlike him, I should prefer to see even greater prominence given to those portions which Mr. Ride would have omitted; because, whatever interpretation the terms "Through Jesus Christ," or "In the name of Jesus Christ," may be capable of, certainly the first suggestion (if not the only legitimate inference of the words) is that of intercession, or mediation—both of which ideas we may surely say have no part in the Unitarianism of to-day.

Is it not one great aim of Unitarianism to supply a religious home for those who, on account of the irrationalism and limitations of other churches and societies, would otherwise be either wanderers in their spiritual endeavours, or what, alas, is more likely, be carried away through indifference to the very Gehenna of utter selfishness?

If there is one thing essential to the vitality of Unitarianism, it is the possession and exercise of a truly mission spirit. Now the mission of Unitarianism is to preach the Gospel of the Fatherhood of God, to shed abroad the spirit of humanity, and to emancipate religion from the slavery of superstition. This, as I gather from very nearly the whole of its current literature, is the essential purpose of Unitarianism. And the exercise of the mission spirit demands that the letter must ever be made subservient to the spirit, and I feel sure that if the most conservative Unitarian could experience that spiritual discord which is caused to so many by the use of the objectionable phraseology to which I refer, he would readily concede its omission, particularly when, as I have so often been told, it is "only a matter of taste." But further, these phrases which Mr. Ride defends are to my certain knowledge a great cause why Unitarianism is not adequately efficient to its position. The downright religious earnestness and intellectual ability of its ministers are as unquestionable as, I regret to observe, are the apathy and objection to reform of a very large portion of its laity. Let me ask your readers whether they really consider that a religious service which suggests, before all things, a quasi-orthodoxy, and a compromise with the crumbling idols (whose devotees are daily becoming fewer), will satisfy those who are rushing away—some to Agnosticism, to Secularism, and, far worse than all, to that Indifferentism which leads to unbelief in goodness and the high possibilities of humanity, and ends in the abyss of selfishness?—Yours faithfully,

BERNARD D. GODFREY.

DOING AND SAYING.

Mr. J. Croston, in discussing a resolution in the Manchester City Council, on Wednesday, to open the free libraries on the Sunday, made the discovery that the object of the motion was to meet the desires of "a handful of people meeting in the Memorial Hall."

The London correspondent of the East Anglian Daily Times writes that there is some three years' more work before the Old Testament Company, but the work of revising the New Testament is approaching completion. Next year, probably, the work will be presented to Convocation. Already it is nearly all printed, the two Universities having given £20,000 for the privilege of printing it, of which they pay £2,000 yearly. The case of Mr. Troutbeck, the secretary, deserves recognition, scarcely less than that of Bishop Ellicott, the chairman, who, presiding for six hours daily for four days every three weeks, is said never to have once lost his temper or failed to carry his colleagues with him.

According to a Kidderminster paper, the curate of a neighbouring parish has been dismissed, "in consequence of the vicar taking objection to the colour of a pair of trousers which he wore while officiating on several occasions." Much sympathy is felt for the curate, and a testimonial is to be presented to him. A canon, which Sir Robert Phillimore recently said was still in force, enjoins "that, in private houses and in their studies, clergymen may use any comely and scholar-like apparel, provided it is not 'cut or pinckt,' and that in public they go not in their doublet and hose without coats and cassocks, and that they wear not very light-coloured stockings."

Dr. Abraham Benisch, the translator of the Bible, died last week at the age of 66 at his residence in London. The Jewish World says that in him the Jewish community loses one of its profoundest scholars, and an active co-religionist, whose heart pulsated for the welfare of Judaism. Dr. Benisch was educated at the University of Vienna, but settled early in this country, where he published with the sanction of the Chief Rabbi the first translation into English of the whole of the Hebrew Scriptures as they are interpreted by the orthodox Jews. His work is valuable to scholars, and some of the volumes are now difficult to procure. Dr. Benisch was the editor and proprietor for 25 years of the Jewish Chronicle, the author of a Life of Maimonides, Judaism Surveyed, and other works. He was one of the principal founders of the Society of Hebrew Literature and of the Anglo-Jewish Association. His own special request on his death bed was that no extended obituary notice should be given of him—and this has restrained his Jewish friends from writing such a notice.

Monday was an eventful day in the history of Wesleyan Methodism. The first laymen were admitted to the conference at Bradford. At the conference of 1876 an overwhelming majority carried a resolution to the effect that the time had arrived for the adoption of a plan for the admission of laymen, and on Monday practical effect was given to the resolution. Among the lay members present were many familiar faces of those who for years had attended the preliminary committees. The novelty of the proceedings drew together a crowded attendance. The President, Dr. Rigg, delivered an address, pointing out the duties and the responsibilities assumed in the new position, and dealing with the questions of importance to be brought before the mixed Conference for discussion and decision. It was decided by what is described as "an almost unanimous vote" to exclude reporters from the meetings—a decision which perhaps will be more satisfactory to the clerical liners attached to the body than to the public interested in Conference literature. On Tuesday it was resolved to employ lay agents on a larger scale than has hitherto been done.

A correspondent of the Christian Word gives an account of a funeral in a Yorkshire village, which was the occasion of a pleasing and instructive manifestation of catholicity of sympathy and feeling. A respected member of the Baptist congregation at Gill having died, the burial was arranged to take place in the parish churchyard, and the service was conducted by the vicar of the parish, the Rev. S. H. Ireson, M.A., and the Baptist minister, the Rev. T. Bennett. The first portion of the service was conducted at the house of the deceased gentleman, when both the officiating ministers assisted. In the parish church the burial service was read by the vicar, the Baptist minister reading the Scripture lesson and leading the responses, and the service was brought to a close at the grave. Surely such an incident, instead of being likely to damage the Established Church—a result which many prophesy will follow inevitably from the admission of Dissenting ministers even into the parish graveyard—can only tend to strengthen its true influence; and such a fraternal spirit manifested on both sides must also tend to—what is more important—the increase of Christian faith and charity.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A DIFFICULTY DISPOSED OF.

NOT long ago an indignant father at the South wrote, says the Boston Congregationalist, to the Faculty of one of our New England colleges, asking them to provide some way whereby his son could be allowed to sit somewhere else than beside a negro who was a member of his class. The letter that was sent back reminded him that the class would soon be arranged according to scholarship, when the place of the negro would come so near the head of the class that his son would have no further annoyance, the fact being that his place would be near the other extremity. Really, those stupid blacks!

PULPIT NOVELTIES.

THE latest American novelty is a new thing in sermons. The preacher is accompanied in the pulpit by an artist, who illustrates his discourse by sketches in chalk on a large black board fitted up at the side. This latest attraction seems very taking, and if introduced into England, would probably vie with Ritualism for popularity. A "chalk sermon," as it is termed, was delivered to an immense congregation in Brooklyn a few weeks since with marked effect, the picture-captions, as they are termed, meeting with considerable approbation. Another divine, however, at a rival establishment has quite thrown the chalk into the gloom of eclipse, and a short time ago delivered a sermon on a certain place, which was vividly illustrated by oil paintings.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

SCOTCH EPISCOPALIANS.

THE Edinburgh correspondent of the Times states that Scotch Episcopalians have shown a marked inclination to favour a policy of disestablishment. "This, there is reason to believe, is prompted by motives of expediency rather than of principle. The Episcopal Church in Scotland, though bound in principle to uphold the theory of Establishments, has every reason to expect much gain from the breaking up of the existing Established Church. A large proportion of the landed proprietors in Scotland are Episcopalians. Several prominent clergymen of the Established Church have lately indicated that in the event of disestablishment they would cast in their lot with the Scotch Episcopal body; and it is certain that, in that case, they would carry with them a very large proportion, if not the whole, of their upper-class adherents. The Episcopal Church would then become, even more than it is at present, the aristocratic and fashionable Church in Scotland; the historic struggle of the seventeenth century would be condoned by the necessitous alliance of the nineteenth, and Presbytery and Prelacy would, at last, join hands."

BIBLE TEXTS AND FOSSIL PHRASES.

PEOPLE who mean to be pretty fair may sometimes catch themselves holding fast to something which doesn't belong to them. A correspondent of the Christian Register calls attention to a case in point. He says the spurious passage in I. John, 5-7, about the "three that bear record in heaven," is still printed as a proof-text of the Trinity both in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith and in the Catechism. He doesn't see how this can be reconciled with honest intentions, as it is precisely what would be called deliberate misleading if it were done in profane and worldly circles. Think of a lawyer quoting from a law-book a confessedly bogus passage to influence a jury! But the Register thinks its correspondent fails to realise how serious an undertaking it would be for our Calvinistic brethren even to begin to take out of the Confession and the Catechism all that was put there by ignorance and mistake. So they drift along helplessly, still retaining and teaching to the children for Holy Bible what is generally admitted to be no part of the sacred text. But who has a right to throw stones? How many services, sermons, prayers, hymn-books, or Sunday-school lessons are wholly free from fossil phrases which no longer represent living convictions?

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Professor Haeckel, of Jena, has answered Professor Virchow's famous speech delivered at Munich at the meeting of German naturalists and physicians. The title of this pamphlet is "Freie Wissenschaft und freie Lehre," the motto "Impavidi progrediamur." Virchow had denied that evolution could ever change an ape into a man. Haeckel re-asserts the possibility, and more than possibility, of that change, and represents Virchow as the ally of the Jesuits.—Academy.

The Chief Rabbi of Corfu has commenced the publication of a monthly Jewish journal, entitled Moses. In the first number it is stated that the Jewish soldiers in Greece are treated very well by their Christian comrades. A Greek newspaper expresses itself in the following terms concerning these soldiers: "We salute fraternally these excellent and noble sons of our country, and we hope that, thanks to their bravery, the indissoluble ties of fraternity which unite the Jewish and Christian religions will be more and more strengthened." The Israelit, in quoting this, says truly that "such tolerant sentiments have never before been heard in Greece."

Arrangements have been made to report and publish the sermons of the Rev. J. A. Picton, M.A., "regularly," that is, we presume, weekly, as they are delivered at St. Thomas' Square Chapel, Hackney. The first two discourses of the series have just appeared. The first is on "Trust in God," the text being "And they that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee; for Thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek Thee" (Psalm ix., 10). The second is on "Jesus the Saviour," the text, "Thou shalt call His name Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins." These sermons are full of suggestiveness and beauty, and are as remarkable for their philosophical cast, and for their extreme accuracy of expression, as they are for their simple devoutness of feeling. That they go beyond the lines laid down by orthodox theologians is also to be expected. Mr. Picton's view of "the supernatural" and "the miraculous" is very different from that which is held by Christian divines in general, but those who are anxious to do justice even to "a heretic" will be careful to form their judgment of Mr. Picton's teaching from his own utterances rather than from the representations of his theological opponents. These sermons in their published form cannot fail to exercise considerable influence upon an important section of the religious public, and the doctrines which they set forth will have to be reckoned with by those who feel them to be out of harmony with the commonly recognised standards of the faith.

KING'S LYNN.—The Rev. H. W. Perris, of Norwich, exchanged with the Rev. B. Gisby on Sunday last. Our correspondent adds; "One is disposed to think that more movements of this kind throughout our churches would be of much advantage both to ministers and congregations."

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

YOUTH AND RELIGION.*

REV. DR. BELLOWES.

YOUNG men, more than any others, are in possession of the world. They are strong—strong in aspiration, in appetite, in desire, in enthusiasm. They are susceptible to all the finer influences of nature and of God. Their natural faith is lively. They possess in their hearts that which actually animates the world, namely, passion, which unhappily has a bad name in the world, because so much of it is bad; but it is really the fire, the sustaining force, which makes men powers to do and to bear. Without passion the world were an ash-heap, and life would cease. And young men have this passion; and because they have it they are hardly expected—such is the folly and blindness of the world—to be either moral or religious. Youth is the passionate age, the age of enthusiasm, of romance, of poetry, and so religion must wait; and then, perchance, young men and women, when the fires of their enthusiasm are slaked, and all its dangerous qualities are subdued by repression, will be ready to look about and take up that dull thing called religion. Now if there is any folly in the world, it is this. Religion a dull thing? Why, all that is beautiful in youth comes from that same mighty Power who rejuvenates humanity by that magnificent freshest of young, believing, enthusiastic, passionate, sensitive life which comes into the world from generation to generation, and without which the world would dry up and rot. This rush of young life is from God. We complain of its imprudence. But what blights of May, what frosts of June, ever teach April the prudence we expect from her? And we may thank God that no prudence of old men or of middle-aged men will ever take the blessed inexperience, the faith, the hope, out of the hearts of young people. They are inconvertible. They cannot be made into calculating, cheese-paring thinkers; and though we may sneer at this glorious season of self-assertion, of ardent passion, of love, of religion (for these are very apt for awhile to go together) the world would go down to destruction if it should cease to be what it is. For every vessel that perishes in the storm or rushes upon the rocks from rash adventure, there are twenty human logs that lie rotting—rotting in their little narrow inlets, without the courage to face the perils of the ocean. We do not want dull, stupid, worn-out, effete, prudent people to come into the Christian Church—in especial. We want young men and young women. And we want them to bring something when they come—their hearts, their faith, their fervour. We want men of all fields of enterprise, moved and animated by a living faith in God as the hero of his own universe, and in Jesus Christ as the captain of romance, of religious poetry, of true passion, of the true crusade. We want men of a chivalrous, crusading, self-devoted spirit. Whenever anything has been done in the world, it has been done by such as these, whether clad in Puritan garb, armed or without armour. They trusted in God. Their fear of God was not a servile, slavish, crouching anxiety about their souls. They wanted to help God, to do His will and to make Him loved and honoured, because they knew that the knowledge and love of God are the consolation, the ennoblement, the everlasting blessedness, and the only youth, of the soul. I wish we could think of Christ as he really was—the greatest, noblest, most devoted, most manly, most courageous, most gentle knight that ever stood upon the face of the earth. Is there anything in this Jesus Christ for a young man to think of with aversion? And why should there be aversion to religion? I would like to know if young men are averse to religion because it is hard? I never knew a young man worth his salt that did not glory in hardship. It is difficulty, it is peril, it is the precipice, that tempts the young man, because it brings out his nobleness. It is because our present circumstances do not seem to challenge us to cope with difficulty that virtue is grown so pale and maidenly, so ascetic, so thin-blooded, that we put her in cotton-wool to keep her out of sight. But religious is a male warrior, who, with fire in his eye, and taking his life in his hand, goes out to fight evil and sin wherever he finds it. Young men should not be deceived by parodies of religion. Nor should they believe anybody who makes them think that one should be a dried-up specimen, with all the juice of life gone out of him, before the proper time comes for him to be a religious man. We want the whole hearted love and devotion of the noblest youth of both sexes if we are to carry the world.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

TWO LITTLE ROGUES.

SAYS Sammy to Dick,
"Come, hurry; come, quick!
And we'll do, and we'll do, and we'll do!
Our mammy's away;
She's gone for to stay;
And we'll make a great hullabaloo!
Ri too, ri loo, loo, loo, loo,
We'll make a great hullabaloo!"

Says Dicky to Sam,
"All weddy I am
To do, and to do, and to do.
But how doeth it go?
I so ittle to know:
Thay, what be a hullabawoo?
Ri too, ri loo, woo, woo, woo!
Thay, what be a hullabawoo?"

"Oh! slammings and bangings,
And whingings and whangings,
And very bad mischeif we'll do:
We'll clatter and shout,
And pull things about;
And that's what's a hullabawoo!
Ri too, ri loo, loo, loo, loo!
And that's what's a hullabaloo!"

"Slide down the front stairs,
Tip over the chairs;
Now into the pantry break through;
We'll take down some tinware,
And other things in there,—
All aboard for a hullabaloo!
Ri too, ri loo, loo, loo, loo!
All aboard for a hullabaloo!"

"Now roll up the table
Far up as you're able,
Chairs, sofa, big easy-chair too;
Put the poker and vases
In funny old places:
How's this for a hullabaloo?
Ri too, ri loo, loo, loo, loo!
How's this for a hullabaloo?"

"Let the dishes and pans
Be the womans and mans:
Everybody keep still in their peccos!
Mammy's gown I'll get next,
And preach you a text.
Dicky, hush with your hullabaloo!
Ri too, ri loo, loo, loo, loo!
Dicky, hush with your hullabaloo!"

As the preacher in gown
Climbed up, and looked down
His queer congregation to view,
Said Dicky to Sammy,
"Oh, dere comes our mammy!
Se'll thould for dis hullabawoo.
Ri too, ri loo, woo, woo, woo!
Se'll thould for dis hullabawoo!"

"O mammy! O mammy!"
Cried Dicky and Sammy,
"We'll never again, certain true."
But with firm step she trod,
And looked hard at the rod:
Oh, then came a hullabaloo!
Boohoo, boohoo, woo, woo, woo!"
Oh! then came a hullabaloo!

THE RHUBARB PIE PLAN.

DURING a discussion in a certain church, on the question of the duty of giving, a brother well-known for his generous benefactions was asked what part of his income he was in the habit of contributing to the Lord's treasury. "I do not know," said the brother; "I do very much as the woman did who was famous for the excellence of her rhubarb pies. She put in as much sugar as her conscience would allow, and then shut her eyes and put in a handful more. I give all my conscience approves, and then add a handful without counting it."

We commend this plan to those who believe that "he that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully," and who wish to err upon the safe side. Many men seem afraid of giving too much; but among all the failures in business of which we have heard, we have never known an instance where a man has ruined himself by giving to the poor or to the cause of God. Men have failed in business through dealing in stocks, through speculating in corn, wheat, pork, apples, oil, coal, real estate, patent rights, bank shares, newspapers, steam-boats and almost everything else that men can discover, make, buy or sell,—they have lost their money by trusting friends, endorsing notes, neglecting business, and selling whiskey, but we have never yet seen the man who was ruined financially by liberal giving to the Lord's poor, or to the Lord's cause. A business so safe as this ought to attract the attention of investors, and we hope some will commence operations on the "rhubarb pie" plan,—give all they conscientiously can, and then shut their eyes and put in another handful, and report the results of the experiment.—The Wayside.

JOTTINGS.

No one has a right to express an opinion, or even to suppose that he can have an opinion, upon any of the arts, unless, first, he naturally loves it, and, secondly, has some knowledge of good examples.

Mr. Ruskin's writing will always be looked upon as the one vitalising force that has knit together into some shape the endless threads of art procedure, and bequeathed for ever to artists whatever hope and stimulus can come from external sources.—Spectator.

A lazy girl, who liked to live in comfort and do nothing, asked her fairy godmother to give her a good genius to do everything for her. On the instant the fairy called ten dwarfs, who washed and dressed the little girl, and combed her hair, and fed her, and so on. All was done so nicely that she was happy, except for the thought that they would go away. "To prevent that," said the godmother, "I will place them permanently in your ten pretty little fingers." And they are there yet.—Laboulaye.

Because I have reached Paris, I am not ashamed of having passed through Newhaven and Dieppe. They were very good places to pass through, and I am none the less at my destination. All my old opinions were only stages on the way to the one I now hold, as itself is only a stage on the way to something else. I am no more abashed at having been a red-hot Socialist with a panacea of my own than at having been a sucking infant. Doubtless the world is quite right in a million ways; but you have to be kicked about a little to convince you of the fact.—Cornhill.

I don't disparage or undervalue education in schools; but I don't confine myself to education in schools; and he who believes that the education of the human being is confined to the schoolroom will turn out in the long run to be very imperfectly educated. The education of a human being is the education of a life. It is an education in lessons which you are receiving every year of your life, every day of your life, and every hour of your life. There is no time at which you can escape from those lessons. You may neglect them, you may pervert them, you may substitute bad teaching for good, but the teaching is flowing in upon you at every period of your existence—every morning and night its influence is affecting your whole life.—W. E. Gladstone.

John Macleod Campbell, writing to his daughter, said: "Our several lives are several webs—ourselves, the warp; our friends, the woof; and not friends only, but all persons and things which modify our being: the pattern resulting being the joint result. My own dear child, this is but a most imperfect simile: for the pattern is not determined by the warp or the woof—by what we are in ourselves, or by what persons and circumstances are—but by the attitude of our spirits towards God in all things. For 'all things work together for good to them that love God.' So the weaving of the web must be going on in love to God if the pattern is to be the 'divine ideal' realised in us. So, darling, 'keep thine heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life.' Keep it, by giving it to God."

THE TRUE ACCOUNT OF LIFE.

REV. W. GASKELL, M.A.

'Tis not the days, the years we've seen,
That make life's true account;
Many, alas! may these have been,
Yet nothing its amount.

It is the deeds to virtue given,
The growth of holy strength,
The graces garnered up for heaven,
That shows its real length.

'Tis wasting life, and not to live,
To let it wing its flight,
And no bright hallowed memories give
To cheer the coming night.

Let each one pause, and think him well,
How thus his reckoning stands,
What are the gains which he can tell,
Snatched from Time's niggard hands.

Oh! if too much the past hath been
An empty race to death;
From this point be our wisdom seen,
In treasuring every breath.

And when our sum of years is gone,
May their rich fruit remain,
And heavenly hopes and graces won
Prove them not lent in vain.

OUR BIRMINGHAM AGENCY.

In future our friends in Birmingham may obtain the HERALD from Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons, Union-street, who will deliver the paper at the residences of subscribers and to whom orders therefore should be given at once, or to the Special Agents at the various Chapels.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 9, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

A MINISTRY OF FIFTY YEARS.

THE privilege is not often given to a man to pass through a distinguished, patient, quiet, useful ministry of fifty years. That the Rev. WM. GASKELL has done so is a matter of sincere congratulation. His services through all these changing years have made him an institution in himself. We know that in the Manchester district, and indeed far and wide, he is regarded with the deepest affection. It seems but yesterday, and yet fourteen years have passed away, since we heard him address one of our present ministers, when he was entering upon his labours, in these words: "I have known you from the day when I held you as an infant in my arms, and your parents solemnly pledged themselves to do their part in training you to become a faithful disciple of the Lord Jesus. I have seen with satisfaction the course which you have pursued ever since you were called to take the burden of individual responsibility. With special pleasure I marked the earnestness with which you gave yourself up to the great work of helping to educate the children of the poor. And when your heart turned in the direction of the Christian ministry, as the kind of labour which would afford you the most congenial occupation, I felt no hesitation in recommending you to follow its promptings, and was glad to render such assistance as I could in removing any hindrances that lay in the way." To how many others in various forms has it been permitted to him to speak words of similar encouragement? May we not be permitted in brief to join in the rejoicings of our friends at Cross-street, and express a wish that Mr. GASKELL may long be spared to grace our meetings by his presence, and to give his wise counsel to the Unitarian body at large?

THE HIBBERT LECTURESHIP.

THE London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian states that the appointment to the next lectureship under the Hibbert Trust has been announced, and presents some points of interest. The subject chosen for exposition is that of the religion of ancient Egypt, and it has been placed in the competent hands of M. LE PAGE RENOUF, a liberal Roman Catholic, of the school represented by Lord ACTON. At the commencement of Professor MAX MULLER'S lectures in April last, the opinion was held that the lectures ought, in accordance with the terms of the bequest, to present a distinctly anti-Trinitarian aspect. This opinion was expressed by way of complaint, not only against the lecturer, but against the delivery of the lectures in the chapter-house of Westminster, as being locally antagonistic to free speculation; and yet Professor MAX MULLER dealt with his subject so daringly as to lay himself open to misapprehension as advocating atheism. It may be expected from M. RENOUF'S faith and communion that he will at least approach no nearer to the standard of polemical anti-Trinitarianism than did his more latitudinarian predecessor.

EDUCATION IN HOLLAND.

THE new law upon Elementary Education in Holland has passed the Chamber of Deputies, after a series of debates which lasted five weeks, and which gave rise to several passages of arms between the Ultramontanes and the Liberals, the latter of whom eventually got the best of the fight. The object of the new law, as stated in the preamble, is "to give children instruction in subjects useful to them and suited to their age, to develop their faculties and prepare them for their duties as Christians and citizens." The new system is, however, to be strictly undenominational; for, in spite of the efforts made by the Ultramontanes, the law enacts that "teachers shall not do, or allow to be done, any act which is inconsistent with the respect due to the religious sentiments of those who profess other creeds" than the Roman Catholic one. There was a division upon this clause, which the Liberals carried by a majority of fifty-three to twenty-eight against the Ultramontanes. Another clause which gave rise to one or two heated debates was that by which the development of undenominational education is so far favoured that the State is to have the disposal of thirty per cent of the amount allotted to each commune for public instruction. The Liberals were anxious to increase and the Ultramontanes to reduce this proportion, but amendments in both senses were rejected, and the clause was passed without alteration.

MISS NIGHTINGALE ON THE PEOPLE OF INDIA.

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE contributes to the August number of the Nineteenth Century a paper on "the People of India," which forms a heavy indictment against our government of that land. She declares that "we do not care for the people of India," and do not care enough to know about their daily lives of lingering deaths from causes which we could so well remove. Several glimpses are given of one or two provinces, showing the terrible condition of the bulk of the people of India, who are paupers, only just able to pay their cesses in a good year, and who fail altogether when the season is bad. Between five to six millions have perished in the Madras famine, but in the districts where the famine does not exist the condition of the people is terrible.

The representations given by Miss NIGHTINGALE of the misery of the ryots, even when they are fairly prosperous, and her comparison between them and the condition of the English labourer, should be carefully read. "We will speak," she says, "of the sober English labourer, the family man, with the gallon of beer a week, the half-pound of tea, sugar, tobacco, untaxed salt, good water and the rest, and the Hindoo living on inferior grains for the most part, and too little of them; a little vegetable curry, a little salt (too little), and his very salt, as has been said, is taxed. The tax amounts now to £7 a ton, the salt itself being worth 12s. 6d. a ton in India. The people make earth salt, by washing the earth and boiling the food in the salt water, and for this miserable product they are punished." The questions with which England can and ought to deal, Miss NIGHTINGALE insists, are three: The great money lending question, which overshadows all; giving the people water (which includes irrigation, cheap canal communications, improved methods of agriculture and forest plantations); and, lastly, systems of representation, by which the people may virtually rate themselves and spend the money locally.

THE KIRK IN THE HIGHLANDS.

THE Constitutional movement in the Highlands, though not now much before the public, is yet being quietly fostered by some active intriguers. There has recently been brought to light "a Constitutional code of regulations for the reconstruction of the Church of Scotland in the Highlands," which, it is said, is being extensively circulated in the North. The document is curious, but still more so is a prayer appended to it. It does appear strange that a form of prayer should be prepared for the benefit of Constitutionalists who have a contempt for liturgies and such like, but the thoroughly orthodox spirit which it breathes will no doubt atone for this seeming breach of propriety. The Almighty is entreated to look down with compassion upon their fellow-sinners in the Free Church, who, as leaders and followers, have broken their covenant with Him by forsaking the distinctive principles of the Disruption; and who since then, handed over to judicial blindness and hardness of heart, have supported men that have been labouring to undermine the inspiration and supreme authority of His Holy Word; and who, like another backsliding Church of old, are continually proclaiming to the world, "We are rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing," and know not "that they are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Such is a specimen of the stuff by which it is sought to gain over the minds of the poor Highlanders, and arouse their bigotry.

AN ANTI-DISESTABLISHMENT MOVEMENT IN SCOTLAND.

THE Scotsman says that a new stage in the disestablishment controversy in Scotland is marked by the launching of the "Scottish Association for the Maintenance of the National Religion," whose programme that journal has printed. The Association is to have its headquarters in Edinburgh, with local branches organised by secretaries and committees throughout the country. With the view of rendering the Association as powerful as numbers will make it, two important conditions of membership have been determined on. In the first place, it is arranged that "no payment shall be required as a condition of becoming a member of the Association." Secondly, the Association have arranged to take "Christians of every shade of political and religious opinion." The diversity of religious opinion which the Association is prepared to tolerate in its membership finds (the Scotsman observes) a remarkable illustration in the very first couple of names that meet the eye in the list of the large "interim committee" who are strenuously engaged in floating the Association. The "Right Rev. John Tulloch, D.D., principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, moderator of the General Assembly," and the "Very Rev. William Robinson Pirie, D.D., principal of the University of Aberdeen," are "Christians" whose "shades of religious opinion" are so very divergent that good judges in such matters have doubted whether such differences do not amount in practice to different religions. As regards the contrasted "shades of political opinion" that are likely to be found within its membership, matters seem in the meantime not quite so promising. Of about sixty members of the "Interim Committee," only some seven or eight are Liberals. All the rest are Tories of the deepest and darkest dye.

MANCHESTER: CROSS-STREET CHAPEL.

THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE MINISTRY OF THE REV. WM. GASKELL, M.A.

ON Sunday last the congregation at Cross-street Chapel, commemorated the fiftieth year of the Rev. W. Gaskell's ministry. A special order of service had been prepared and neatly printed, and the venerable edifice, which was completely filled, was adorned with choice plants and beautiful flowers, the work of a number of the young ladies of the congregation. This is the only charge which Mr. Gaskell has held, and the congregation have taken steps to present him with a memorial of their esteem. He is now the oldest Nonconformist minister in Manchester. To carry out this object, a committee, to which Mr. H. J. Leppoc is chairman; Mr. E. C. Harding, treasurer; and John Peacock and G. W. Rayner Wood, hon. secretaries, has been formed, and has obtained from past and present members of the congregation, and from persons outside that body, subscriptions amounting to about £1,200; but it is expected that the fund will ultimately reach £2,000. It will chiefly be applied to founding a scholarship in Mr. Gaskell's name, but part of it will go to purchase some small souvenir, which, with a suitable address, will be handed to him personally, when he will have the privilege of deciding the nature of the scholarship, and what institution it shall be connected with; but he has not yet stated his wishes in the matter.

The Rev. W. Gaskell took for his text the fourth chapter of Deuteronomy, part of the thirty-second verse—"Ask now of the days that are passed." He said: It is one of man's distinctions that he is able to profit by the times that are gone. From the records of these he learns in what respects his fellow-creatures have erred and in what they have excelled, so as to avoid the courses by which they have been injured and to adopt those by which they have been benefited. In this way the very mistakes of the past become conducive to the instruction and progress of the race. We see as in a mirror, and without the intervention of our passions, what has been hurtful and what beneficial, and we are thus quietly, but not the less effectively, taught how we may shun the evil and how secure the good. But it is not in regard only to bygone ages and other people who lived that this process may be carried on. Some of our best and most useful lessons may be learned from a review of our own personal experience. As the poet says:—

"Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven."

This, indeed, comes most effectually home to us. We have passed through a variety of scenes, some of a pleasing, some of a mournful, some of an impressive character. We have suffered from the misapplication of our powers. We have benefited by the proper use of them. The effect of this is not surely to be confined to the immediate occasion. It has a voice for all future time; lessons of warning or lessons of encouragement to give. It tells us in the emphatic language of facts that as we value our welfare certain courses of action must be avoided, and certain other courses be pursued. For even the most superficial attention to events will convince us that nothing takes place by chance, or apart from its own particular causes. A certain order is clearly established, an invariable sequence of events maintained. Fixed and intelligible principles regulate whatever occurs. Errors of plan are sure to be followed by defects of execution. Improper courses of conduct infallibly lead to mischievous consequences. Vice inevitably produces punishment, and virtue necessarily brings reward and happiness. In the nature of things it cannot be otherwise; if it might, the world would be a chaos, without law, without order, without object, without anything intelligible and certain—a mere wreck drifting blindly and hopelessly on to destruction and oblivion. As, however, in all its departments it is pervaded by universal relations and dependencies, their foundation is laid for our instruction and guidance. By these means the sciences are built up; by these means the laws of nature are ascertained; by these means the ultimate object of the world's existence is discovered; and by these means we turn from the present to the past, and bring back to us lessons of an important and valuable kind. When we find that two events always happen in a certain order and relation, that the one invariably comes before and the other invariably follows, we have gained a principle by means of which we may securely traverse the unseen future. It is to us in the moral guidance of our lives what the mariner's compass is to the seaman in the navigation of his ship. It indicates the direction in which we are steering, the dangers to which we are exposed, and how we may most safely reach the end of our course, and make our life voyage something like a success. So important, indeed, is the school of experience to our welfare that we cannot neglect it without incurring loss, and subjecting ourselves more or less to suffering and regret. Undoubtedly, therefore, it is a duty as well as a dictate of wisdom to recall frequently to mind the scenes through which we have passed, and to bring under careful review the course of conduct we have been pursuing, to make rigid inquiry into the moral character and natural consequences of our actions in particular cases, to trace our errors and vices to their issues and our miseries to their causes, to take warning and derive caution from the mistakes we have made and the perversion of which we have been guilty, and to bring the satisfaction and joy which we have experienced in the pursuit of truth and the practice of holiness to reinforce us in our efforts at patient continuance in well-doing. Undoubtedly, too, it would be well if in the same spirit we read the teachings of wisdom and the revelations of human light. Thankful should we be that God has thus made the past the instructor of the present and the guide to the future. Gladly should we avail ourselves of the treasures of wisdom and knowledge which time has accumulated for our benefit. With reverence and gratitude should we receive the lessons of bygone days, elaborated as many of them have been by pain and toil, by intense thought and study, and by the suffering and self-sacrifice of the worlds best and greatest, sanctified as they have been by the earnest affections, the noblest sentiments and the purest wishes of humanity, and impressed as they have been by the tears of the timid and the blood of the brave. And especially should we give heed to the testimony of our own lives, carefully consulting the volume of experience which we ourselves have written, looking with a thoughtful and intelligent eye on those faithful pages of memory which here, perhaps, have been blotted with the stains of sin, and there have been brightened with the lives of virtue. Thus would it be wise in us to ask of the days that are past; of all the various lessons which might so be learnt, time would not avail to speak. It will be enough for my purpose on the present occasion to touch only on one or two that are of an encouraging nature. There are times when, surveying the moral and religious condition of the world, when, seeing what vast numbers of our race are still enveloped in heathen gloom, and how fearfully vice and crime prevail in so-called Christian lands—I say there are times like these when one can hardly help feeling somewhat disheartened and tempted to think that it is in vain to struggle with such an enormous mass of evil. But when we turn to the days that are past and listen to what they have to say, they speak to us in hopeful tones, and bid us work on cheerfully and zealously for the right. They show us clearly that amidst all the alternations and reactions of human events, in shade and sunshine, in calm and storm, there is a law of progress in steady operation, that the empire of evil is growing less and less and the dominion of good extending more and more, confirming the great truth—which above all others it imports us to know—that the Supreme Ruler of the universe cares for our welfare, and justifying the consoling "trust that somehow good should be the final goal of ill." So, too, notwithstanding some appearances to the contrary, there seems to me no reason to doubt that the great principles of the Gospel, the singular affinity of which with man's moral sentiments and spiritual wants even unbelievers admit, that these are surely, though it may be slowly, making way in the world, gradually entering more and more into its laws and usages, and working, according to our Lord's simile, like "leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened." This is a faith from which all other motives to work for the advancement of our Master's holy cause may well derive strength. In asking again of the days that are past they might receive encouragement from them, I think, as members of a religious community who have felt bound for conscience' sake to separate themselves from the popular churches. They bring before us the changes which orthodoxy has undergone and is undergoing as we cannot but think for the better. More than one of its peculiar doctrines, sternly once insisted on as essential to salvation, are losing much of their reality, becoming milder in spirit and more apologetic in tone, and preparing, we may trust, before the great movements of modern thought, to pass away and leave behind only the simple but sublime truths which admit of no dispute, but in which all Christians without exception agree. Comparing thus the present with the past, we cannot but find reason for gratitude in the different spirit now shown towards us from that which formerly prevailed. There is now no longer any call upon us to vindicate our claim to the Christian name as some years back I had to do against a zealous clergyman in Salford. None, I am persuaded, save bigots, ignorant as well as narrow-minded, would think of denying it to us at present; and with some little feeling of pride may we bring to mind the respect and honour in which our fellow-citizens have held not a few of those who have belonged to our little household of faith. Passing from topics outside our denomination, let me turn to changes which have taken place within it in the district with which we are more immediately concerned. Going back to the time, fifty years to-day, when I entered on my duties here, and asking of the days that are passed since, they afford in this respect likewise some ground for encouragement. I remember that then the congregations at Sale, Platt, Dob Lane, and Blackley, had fallen into so low a state that they threatened almost to become extinct; but as most of you are aware, they are now in a sound and healthy condition, and showing their vitality. The three last mentioned have built large and commodious schools, and are all of them doing a good work, as I need hardly tell you. Within the same period the congregation formerly meeting in Greengate have raised for themselves a much better place of worship in Strangeways, and the one which assembled in Mosley-street has transferred itself to the handsome chapel in Upper Brook-street, and churches of no mean architectural beauty have been erected at Dukinfield, Gee Cross, Bolton, Bury, Todmorden, Rochdale, Swinton, Altrincham, Gorton, Pendleton, Sale, and Monton. During the time of which I am speaking entirely new congregations have been formed at Heywood, Middleton, Stalybridge, Miles Platting, Ardwick, and Pendleton. As institutions which were not in existence when I came, and to the establishment of which I am happy to feel I have given a helping hand, I need only mention the Lower Mosley-street Schools, the Manchester District Association, the Memorial Hall, the Home Missionary Board, and two Domestic Missions, the interests of which I have always had deeply at heart, and been anxious in whatever way I could to promote. I might also just mention in passing that I took part with my friends, Dr. Beard, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Brooke Herford in founding the Unitarian Herald, of which, as you know, I was for a number of years one of the editors, and which I believe to have been of service to our cause in a variety of ways, and may be made still more so. Now, though we have not done all that we might or should have done, it must be admitted that these things to which I have referred are proofs of vitality and growth, and show conclusively that we are not as a religious body going to die out, as an eminent divine connected with the Independent College at Whalley Range some years back confidently predicted. If rightly applied the answers thus made as we ask of the days that are past will not induce us in anywise to rest satisfied, but will only stimulate us to still greater efforts. We shall not be disheartened by such obstacles as still lie in our way, but feel that they must be removed, and whatever our measure of success or non-success, may keep a true, consistent, upright course through the sneers of the selfish, the misrepresentations of the ignorant, and the falling away of the worldly and faithless, with a calm, quiet, triumphant confidence, bating not a jot of heart or hope. Now I hope you will forgive me if, leaving topics like these of a general kind, I very briefly touch on one or two of a more personal character. Though obliged to admit it, I feel as if it can hardly be true that half a century has gone over since we began to work here, and that I am now, I believe, the oldest Nonconformist minister in Manchester. When about to pass from the quiet air of college life into that of the busy world four spheres of service were open to me. It was an anxious time for me, as you may easily imagine. Not without hesitation was my choice made, for I knew what able ministers had filled this pulpit, and not without many misgivings did I enter on the duties to which I was called; but I had the kind sympathy and encouragement of him who came to be one of my dearest friends, who was ever ready to give me the benefit of his experience and lend me his valuable help; and though one or two somewhat tempting invitations were given me to do so, I not only have not changed but have never wished to change my place. And now, as I asked of the days that are past, great reason have I, first of all, to thank God, who brought me through such a lengthened term of service with so few interruptions or failures of strength. I have had my trials, as every child of earth must have, some sharp and severe, but He has dealt mercifully with me, and devoutly do I bless His holy name. Among my various reasons for thankfulness I count it no small one that I have been so happy in the four colleagues with whom I have been associated. There has seldom been a difference of opinion between any of them and myself, and never a difference of feeling, but we have always worked most amicably and harmoniously together. The same, too, I may say in regard to my brother ministers of the district, who have invariably treated me with consideration and respect far beyond my deserts. I have the utmost reason also to be thankful for the confidence which the congregation has reposed in me from the first, and the generous kindness and indulgence with which my services have always been received. Coming hither as a young and untried man, no pledge of any kind was required from me as to my belief, but I was left, as would that all ministers of the Gospel were, perfectly free to set forth what approved itself to me as right and true. I made up my mind, then, to say what I had to say simply and sincerely out of my own convictions and not those of others; and though you may not always have agreed with me, I have always found you ready to listen to me with a candid and teachable spirit. In preaching my great aim has been not to amuse you with any nice disquisitions on curious questions, but to bring before you those great and solemn truths which have a direct bearing on the conduct of life, and nothing has afforded me such unfeigned pleasure as knowing that what has fallen from me in the way of exhortation has been of real service in the way of consolation, encouragement, or support. In asking of the days that are past it would be a sad reflection if, after setting it forth for 50 years, I felt any serious doubts as to the power of the simple faith which I have sought to recommend. But I do not. I have seen it manifested in too many varied ways, giving strength to battle with strong temptation, to conquer difficulties, to bear up under trials, to meet death with a calm and tranquil spirit. Brought home as it should be, it is able, I can testify, to prove itself of a verity the light of life, brightening its darkest shadows and shedding over it the radiance of immortal hope. Believe me, my friends, you need never doubt its power; and, if you only apply it in sincerity, you will come to recognise this, and bless God for it as life advances and deepens in seriousness more and yet more. And now, to bring these few reminiscences to a close, I cannot but feel conscious, as I look back over 50 years of service, of very many shortcomings and defects in it. As the poet says—

"Vain was the man, and false as vain,
Who said we were ordained to run
His long career of life again
He would do all that he had done."

Nothing of the sort have I to say; but this I may say, that my heart's desire has been to work with you and for you to the best of my ability. One thing often occasions me special regret, and that is, that with multiplied claims and increasing strength I am unable to cultivate that close intimacy with many of you which I could wish. But I trust I am never found wanting in a readiness to sympathise with you both in your joys and in your sorrows, and in a willingness to give you such help as I can. I have reached that time of life when I cannot hope to minister to you much longer, and when you find that I am not doing so as effectively as you could wish, I trust you will not scruple to apprise me of it, and I can honestly assure you that you will find me ready to give place to one who will be able to serve you better. Most of those who welcomed me at the entrance on my work—blessed be their memory—have passed away to higher scenes. Few, very few indeed, of them are left, but the descendants of some have risen up worthily to fill their places, in whom it is but natural that I should take a peculiar interest. But to all of you my best wishes extend. Most sincerely do I thank you for the great kindness and consideration which you have ever shown to me, and devoutly do I pray that God may bless you and yours with His richest blessing.

The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steintal.

The Rev. John Robberds, mentioned in our last in connection with Cross-street Chapel, was always known during his life—and is still affectionately and reverently remembered—as the Rev. J. G. (John Gooch) Robberds, with which initials he uniformly subscribed himself.

The late Ellen Jane Thompson.

ELLEN JANE, wife of Mr. Andrew Thompson, of Mansfield, died on Sunday, the 21st July, 1878, in her 78th year. She was the daughter of Mr. Samuel Walch, who was brought up as a member of the Bank-street Chapel, Bolton; but in early life removed to Bulwell, near Nottingham, where he married, and afterwards settled in Mansfield. He adopted Calvinistic opinions, which were inculcated upon the mind of his daughter, a woman of peculiarly earnest spirit and clear honest thought. She was deeply impressed with the doctrine of election. Holding that the Lord would take one of a city and two of a family, and bring them to Zion (Jeremiah, iii., 15), modesty forbade her to suppose herself as chosen in preference to her sisters. From the depths of such despair, she gradually won her way to a more genial faith in the fatherhood of God. The conflict was long and painful, and involved the necessity of controversial intercourse with her own minister, in which she defended her new opinions by an able application of Scriptural knowledge. In course of time she became acquainted with the Rev. W. Linwood, minister of the Old Meeting, Mansfield, from 1842 to 1848, and became a member of that congregation, of which she remained a faithful and highly-respected member till the time of her death. When conscious that her end was approaching she described her conflict of faith, beginning in agony and ending in peace, and referred to the words of Psalm xl., 1, 2, 3—"The Lord hath brought me up out of an horrible pit, and hath put a new song in my mouth"—as summing up her experience in life and in death. The honesty of her mind, the faithfulness of her friendship, and the virtues of her life are known to her family and friends, and need not be set forth beyond their circle. But considering how frequently it is said that Unitarian views are "good to live by but are not good to die by," there may be some who will value the testimony of a woman who had compared the experiences of orthodox and Unitarian views, and who found in her release from Calvinism, and her belief of God's paternal love, a song of praise, which at the end of thirty years she could renew amid severe sufferings, which heralded the approach of death. A NIGHT'S EXPERIENCE.

MARION KING lived with her father just outside the large commercial city of Shuttlesworth. Her mother died when Marion was a mere child, and with the exception of the five years spent at a good boarding school, the young girl had been very much her own mistress.

One winter evening, after Marion had taken tea with her father, she set out for the weekly meeting of the Mutual Improvement Society connected with the Unitarian chapel, that Mr. King had attended for 40 years. Her father not inclining to leave his comfortable fireside, Marion intended to call for some young friends, and begun her walk in high spirits. The night was intensely cold, and the wind blew about a light sleet, that threatened a snowstorm a few hours later; but Marion was warmly clad, in excellent health, and only just 17 years of age. She was walking quickly, when she was stopped by two poor women, the thinner and poorer-looking of the two asking, in an anxious voice, to be directed to the house of a Mr. Longman, an active High Church clergyman, with whom Marion was slightly acquainted. Marion was beginning to reply, when she heard the wail of an infant, carried evidently by the woman who had addressed her. "Surely," said she hastily, "you have not brought a little baby out such a night as this. It is nearly two miles to Mr. Longman's, and the child will be perished with cold. Do, pray, take it home; it is wicked to have it out in this bitter wind. Is it your own child?" The poor mother burst into tears, and bent closer over her helpless burden, but the other woman replied for her. "Yes, it is her own little 'un, and it's the only one left out o' five, but it's dyin', poor lamb, so she's takin' it to Mester Longman's to get it christened."

Marion's grief and astonishment overcame her indignation, and, speaking much more kindly than before, she said: "But what good can it do to have it christened now? Perhaps it will die before you reach Mr. Longman's, then how dreadfully sorry you will feel." The mother sat down on a doorstep unable to answer, but her companion was again spokeswoman. "Well, you see, I want her to let it die peaceful in its bed, but she's a religious sort of a body, and it says some'at in the Bible about God sending the babies to hell if they're not christened, so she's bound to have it done, whether or not."

"Oh, no, no," said Marion eagerly, "do not believe anything so dreadful. Who could have told you so wicked a thing? God is the fulness and perfection of love; how could he make a little child suffer for what it could not possibly help? Oh! what shall we do? The baby will die, and the woman, too, if she sits there long." And Marion's anxiety was becoming painful, when a middle-aged gentleman passed without noticing the little group. Marion, however, saw him, and rushed after him, exclaiming, "Oh, Dr. Gunton, do help me; here's a baby dying, and I don't know what to do." The doctor turned quickly, and deferring questions until a more convenient season, stooped over the poor crouching mother, put his hand under her shawl for a few seconds, and then said, in a very gentle voice, "Bring baby round to my surgery for a few minutes." Too weak and ill herself to resist, the mother walked on with the doctor, followed by her companion and Marion. As soon as he had seated the poor thing comfortably, the doctor took from her arms the little body, and, laying it down on a couch, told her that the baby spirit had departed, and that no earthly help could restore it. Her grief was terrible to see, but after awhile the doctor sent for a cab, and himself went with the women to their home, the poor mother insisting on taking herself the remains of her darling. And by the time the doctor rejoined Marion he knew as much, and a great deal more about the case, than she did; for he did not leave the lonely woman until he had given her such true comfort as those only can give who themselves have known deepest sorrow, but who have a constant belief in the ultimate predominance of omnipotent love.

Marion had, however, to explain where she had been going alone so late in the evening. The subject for the evening's discussion was to be—"The Position of the Unitarian as compared with other Churches." "But," added she, "I am glad I did not go; for although this night's experience has been very painful to me, I am quite sure I needed it. I had no idea that the so-called orthodox churches were still teaching such horrible doctrine as that poor woman seems to have learnt."

"My dear child," said the doctor, "if by what you have seen and heard this evening your mind has been roused to the state of things around you, and the need for earnest practical effort on the part of liberal churches, your time has not been spent unprofitably. We Unitarians are a little too apt, in our mutual congratulations about our own religious position, to neglect the responsibilities it brings upon us; rejoicing ourselves in some degree of light, we forget how many of our fellows are still in thick darkness; satisfying ourselves with a certain amount of diligence, the fruits of fertility and freedom, we leave the ill weeds of superstition and ignorance to spring up around us. Such men as Mr. Longman are numerous now—men who are trying by their zeal and activity of life to atone to their consciences for the persistence with which they silence the remonstrances of their minds; they bring much mental pain on the very people whom they profess to enlighten. But they are surely not more blameworthy than we professedly liberal Christians, who pass all our time in providing feasts for each other, when thousands of souls are hungering and thirsting around us.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

LONDON: WELCOME TO MRS. SOULE.

ON Wednesday week a large meeting assembled at the College Chapel, Stepney Green, for the purpose of giving a welcome to Mrs. Caroline Soule, the president of the Universalist Woman's Centenary Association of America. Mrs. Soule has only recently arrived in Great Britain, and this was her first public appearance in London. After tea, which was served in the school-room, a public meeting was held in the chapel, at which the Rev. R. Spears, the pastor, presided, supported by the Revs. C. Boros (from Transylvania), T. Dunkerley, J. Marten, T. Rix, George Carter, and several well-known members of the Unitarian churches of the metropolis. Upon her arrival in the chapel, accompanied by Mr. Spears, Mrs. Soule was greeted with a burst of applause, which was prolonged for several minutes.

The CHAIRMAN then rose, and in a short speech explained the object for which the meeting had been called. Mrs. Soule, he said, had come a great distance to tell them of what was being done amongst the Unitarians and Universalists of America, and they were met that evening to give her a very hearty welcome to London. (Cheers.) He would not detain the meeting with any observations of his own, but on their behalf, and on behalf of all the Unitarian congregations of London, he desired to say that they were greatly rejoiced to see amongst them a sister who had so greatly distinguished herself as a preacher on the other side of the Atlantic. (Applause.) In conclusion, he had only to say that he prayed God to bless their visitor and her labours, and to preserve and protect her during her sojourn in England, so that she may return to her own country in peace and happiness. (Cheers.)

The Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLEY joined heartily and cordially in the expressions of welcome to Mrs. Soule which had fallen from the chairman. As a missionary to this country Mrs. Soule had a great work to perform; as a Universalist she had glad tidings to bring of the spread of the glorious Gospel in that far-off country, and he felt certain that the whole Unitarian body would greet her as an earnest co-worker in the cause for which they all laboured. (Cheers.) In matters of belief the distinction between the Unitarian and the Universalist was scarcely perceptible, and he rejoiced that Mrs. Soule as a member of the latter had come amongst them to lend a helping hand in the work upon which they were engaged. (Cheers.)

The Rev. C. BOROS said it was very pleasing to him to see that in England women were not afraid to occupy the pulpit. In his own country they had not yet reached that advanced state, but he hoped that they would soon take courage from the example set them by the ladies of England, but more particularly the ladies of America. (Cheers.) As regards Mrs. Soule he could only say he was very glad to give her a welcome, and he trusted that her work in this country would be as successful as it had been in the land which she had come from. (Applause.)

The Rev. THOMAS RIX defined a Universalist as one who bore the universal love of God for all his creatures; and as a missionary of that faith Mrs. Soule was preaching a grand doctrine. It was not possible, he held, for a good being to be miserable either in this world or in any other, and those who condemned him to eternal torment were really condemning the Almighty himself as a merciless and cruel tyrant. He did not believe in any such doctrine, and if he were to be sent to hell for not doing so, then to hell he must go. (Cheers.) He concluded by endorsing the expressions of welcome which had fallen from the speakers who preceded him.

The Rev. JOHN MARTEN and the Rev. G. CARTER also joined in expressions of welcome.

Mrs. SOULE then rose to thank the meeting for the reception which had been given to her, and she was received with prolonged cheering. She began by saying that in America, as well as in England, there was a custom when a wedding took place of strewing the path of the bride with flowers. Since her arrival in Great Britain in May last, when she visited Glasgow, she might say that her position could be likened to that of the bride whose path is strewn with flowers. Everywhere she went (even in Scotland, that land of orthodoxy) her path had been literally strewn with flowers of welcome, for which she felt exceedingly grateful. In London she had met with an equally kind reception, and she cordially thanked the meeting for the flowers which they had strewn in her path. (Cheers.) She had not come to England as a representative of the Liberal Christian Churches of America—she had been sent by the women of those churches as president of the Universalist Woman's Association of America; she had a realm almost as wide as that of Queen Victoria—(cheers)—and it was at the request of that Association she had come to this country. She had not come as a "missionary," but as an "evangelist," to tell them of the work going on amongst the Liberal Christian Churches of America, and to speak to them of the great Gospel of universal love. (Cheers.) She was a Universalist—they called themselves Unitarians. She would like to get rid of those two words altogether; not that they were not two good words in themselves, but she would like a word that would blend the two. It was time that the distinction between the two bodies were done away with, and some such name as Liberal Christian substituted in their place. Her own belief was that God would be as liberal in the next world as he was in this—(applause)—and upon that profession of her faith they might call her what they liked. She was as much Unitarian as they were, and they were as much Universalists as she was, and she might very correctly be described as Unitarian—Universalist—Evangelist—a veritable Trinity, in fact. It was to her a source of great comfort and satisfaction that the body to which she belonged was assuming such wide dimensions in America. In 1770 there was only one Universalist congregation in the United States, now there were nine hundred—(cheers)—and they stretched away from north to south—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. (Cheers.) Everywhere in the United States sentiments of Liberal Christianity were making progress, and they hoped to see similar progress in England. (Cheers.) After a few words specially addressed to the female portion of the meeting, urging upon them the importance of the duties devolving on them as Christian women, Christian wives, Christian mothers, and Christian daughters, Mrs. Soule concluded by again thanking the assembly for the reception they had given her, and resumed her seat amidst great cheering.

Mr. H. SOLLY ANTHONY thanked Mrs. Soule for her beautiful address; and a few remarks from one of the ladies of the congregation brought the business of the meeting to a close.

A hymn was then sung, and the chairman having pronounced the blessing, a very pleasant and instructive evening was brought to a conclusion.

BALLYCLARE.

WELCOME TO REV. ENGLISH CROOKS.

THE Rev. English Crooks, who has just completed his studies under the tutors of the Manchester Unitarian Home Missionary Board, has been ordained by the Northern Presbytery of Antrim to the pastoral charge of the Northern Presbyterian congregation of Ballyclare, in succession to the late Rev. J. M'Fadden, the first minister of the congregation. As the present was the first occasion of an ordination conducted by the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, a body founded sixteen years ago, more than a merely local interest attached to the proceedings, which were of the most hearty and encouraging character throughout. Previous to the public service a meeting of Presbytery was held, when Mr. Crooks, whose admission to its ranks had already on a former occasion been unanimously voted, was introduced to that body. Mr. Crooks's application to be admitted a member stated that he fully embraced the principles held in common by the members of the Presbytery—namely, the divine mission and authority of Christ, and the Scriptures a record of divine revelation. This statement, cordially volunteered by Mr. Crooks, being considered perfectly adequate and eminently satisfactory, and, further, the testimonials to his literary qualifications from Rev. W. Gaskell and others being honourable and sufficient, the Presbytery, according to its established usage, admitted Mr. Crooks to take his place among them without hesitation or further question.

On Tuesday, the 30th July, a little after twelve o'clock, the public service was begun by Rev. Classon Porter, of Larnie, who led the devotions, reading, as a Scripture lesson, John xvii. The sermon was preached by Rev. J. Scott Porter, of Belfast, from John xviii., 17, "Sanctify them by the truth, thy word is truth."

After the sermon the Moderator of the Presbytery, Rev. C. J. M'Alester, ascended the pulpit, and explained the nature and uses of the Presbyterian form of church government. He then asked the congregation present if they adhered to their call to Mr. Crooks. A unanimous show of hands being the response, Mr. Crooks was asked whether he adhered to his acceptance, and replied, "I do." The Moderator then, in the usual terms, proceeded: "Such being the case, I have further to inquire whether you are determined, by God's help, to study the sacred Scriptures diligently and impartially; to order your walk and conversation as becometh a minister of Christ's Holy Gospel; to preach, expound, and enforce with your best ability the doctrines and precepts of that holy faith; to visit the members of your flock from house to house; to comfort the sick and the afflicted; to instruct the young and ignorant; to labour for the recovery of them that are out of the way of life; and to exhort all, without respect of persons, to the zealous performance of their duties as disciples of Christ?" This vow of pastoral fidelity was responded to by Mr. Crooks in the words, "God helping me, I will." The Northern Whig, in its report, adds: It is worth noting, inasmuch as misconceptions are not unfrequent on this point, that no doctrinal questions were proposed, either at the public service, or in any of its preliminaries.

Mr. Crooks was then invited to make any statement of his views and feelings on entering the ministerial work which he might desire to offer. In a few clear words he expressed the hopes and purposes with which he came to the congregation, as a servant of Christ, and pledged himself to be a willing helper for every useful and philanthropic enterprise in the neighbourhood.

The Moderator then invited any ministers not of the Northern Presbytery who might be present to join in the act of ordination by prayer and laying on of hands.

The members of the Presbytery and friends dined in the court-house of Ballyclare, under the presidency of the Rev. Classon Porter. In the evening a crowded and overflowing company assembled in the gaily-decorated schoolroom, and a long programme of sentiments, recitations, and musical pieces was gone through. The chair was occupied by W. C. Anderson, Esq., of the Northern Bank, who, though not a Unitarian, is always pleased to assist on occasions of showing goodwill to any and every denomination.

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of Toxteth Park Chapel, Liverpool, has received and accepted an invitation to the pulpit at Monton.

ACCRINGTON DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—On Sunday last the annual scholars' service in connection with the above Association, was held in the Cloth Hall, Colne. After tea service was held, the devotional part being taken by the Rev. William Mathews, and the address given by Mr. John Denny, Jun., of Worsley, from Luke x., 27, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." Appropriate hymns were sung (taken from Hymns and Choral Songs, sent out by the Manchester Sunday School Association) very creditably. There was not a very large gathering, owing to the inclemency of the weather, about 70 persons being present. The service was brought to a close by prayer, and the singing of the Lord's Prayer.

ADELAIDE (SOUTH AUSTRALIA).—The Unitarians of this city have been gratified by a visit from the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, formerly of Scarborough, who conducted the services and preached for the Rev. J. Crawford Woods, B.A., on the first two Sundays in June. There were large congregations on these occasions. Mr. Hirst's sermons were greatly admired, and were described in the leading local journal as "very eloquent and impressive."

BIRMINGHAM: NEWHALL HILL.—On Sunday morning last (August 4th) the annual distribution of prizes to the pupils of the school, was made by Mr. Thos. Cross, when 38 girls and 61 boys were rewarded for punctuality and good conduct, in addition to 13 girls who received special prizes, presented by Councillor H. Payton, to all girls not late or absent the whole year, and two prizes given annually by the Rev. Cuckson to the pupil in each school that has been longest on the register. In the afternoon the teachers of both schools held their annual meeting, the chair being taken at three o'clock by Mr. John Cross, when the reports of the schools were presented, and the superintendents and other officers elected for the year. The following are a few extracts from the reports:—Boys school, number on the register, 257; increase 18 over last year; average attendance 84 per cent; teachers, 46, but of this number seven have leave of absence from school duties for various causes, leaving 39 actually engaged in teaching, the 39 giving an average attendance of 90 per cent; 12 were regular the whole year. The parents of every pupil absent the whole of any Sunday are expected to be visited by his teacher, and the reason given for such absence reported on the following Sunday. During the year 417 visits have been made, the principal excuses given being illness, no clothes, and too frequently parents' account. In the savings club there has been deposited £113. 18s. 2d., in 2,120 deposits; and 208 withdrawals, amounting to £117. 19s. 10d. The girls' school numbers on the register at present time 123, a decrease of 11 from last year; average number during the year 129, giving an average daily attendance of 84, or 65 per cent. The number of teachers is 18, a decrease of two; the average daily attendance 95 per cent. The amount deposited in the savings club was £89. 11s. 5d., and withdrawn £96. 3s. 6d. The Rev. J. Cuckson conducts a class every Sunday morning of the elder pupils. Evening classes are also held during the week for sewing and general instruction, conducted by some of the lady teachers. At the close of the business a very excellent paper was read by Mr. J. Archer on "The Sunday-school work of the future," which was followed by a very interesting discussion, a hearty vote of thanks being passed to Mr. Archer. Votes of thanks were also passed to the various officers of the school for the past year, and to the chairman for his conduct in the chair.

BELFAST: DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Saturday, August 3rd, the teachers, scholars, and friends of the above Sunday school had their annual excursion to Clondeboye. The scholars met at the Mission House, and the party marched in procession to the Holywood and Bangor railway, upwards of forty of the youngest children being conveyed to and from the station in two drays kindly sent for that purpose by Dr. Ritchie, The Grove. A delightful and successful day was spent. The whole party, numbering about 250, returned home fully satisfied with the day's enjoyment.

COMBER.—On Saturday, July 27th, the Sunday scholars, to the number of 110, made an excursion to Scrabo Hill. The children and teachers assembled at the meeting house at ten o'clock, and, after singing a hymn, proceeded to their destination on 16 cars. The earlier part of the day was fine, but the rain came on about three o'clock and continued for about an hour. Notwithstanding the interruption, the games were carried on with great vigour, and much enjoyment was experienced. A party from Killinchy, consisting of the Rev. John M'Caw and friends, Mrs. Garrett (so long an earnest worker in connection with the school), Mrs. Isaac and Mrs. John Andrews, were present. Shortly before the time appointed for the return home, the Rev. H. A. M'Gowan addressed a few appropriate words of counsel to the children, and the Rev. John Orr, superintendent, thanked the teachers for their labours, and congratulated them on the prosperous condition of the school, returning thanks also to other friends who took an interest in the work.

DEVONPORT.—On Wednesday, 31st July, the Christ Church Sunday School went by the S. W. Railway to Plym Bridge for their annual outing. Fifty children and about forty adults sat down to tea, and the day in this lovely spot was thoroughly enjoyed by all.

DORCHESTER.—Under the head of "Dead or Sleeping" we find the following letter in the Dorchester Telegram: "Sir,—A few weeks ago I came to Dorchester from Bristol. Coming from the stronghold of Western Unitarianism, and under the influence of a grateful recollection of the ministry of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, it never struck me that my future home would be without a place of worship for Unitarians. A day or two after my arrival I made inquiries. The first person I asked has never heard of such a denomination being in Dorchester; the second seemed thankful that my inquiries were in vain; and the third told me that 'some years ago the Unitarians had a meeting-house or chapel, but that they were all dead now.' Whether they are dead or not I cannot say. They may perhaps be only sleeping." . . . He adds: "I shall be glad to communicate with anyone upon this subject, the communications in the first instance to be addressed to you for VERITAS VINCI." [We shall be glad to hand over any such communications sent to us if "Veritas Vincit" will send us his name.]—EDS. U. H.

DUNDEE.—Introduction of an organ: At a meeting of the congregation held on Sunday last, it was intimated that Mr. William Speed, having come into possession of an organ, had generously placed it in the church, for the use of the congregation, for an indefinite time. A resolution to acknowledge the gift was moved by Mr. David Johnson, and seconded by Mr. D. S. Hodge, and was heartily adopted. Miss Clark, who has for a long time played the harmonium most efficiently, found little difficulty in transferring her skill to the organ. The church finances: The treasurer reported that he found the state of the funds for the half-year now completed about £15 better than for the corresponding period last year. The freehold of the church site: The minister has been appointed to make an appeal to the friends of the cause, to relieve the local congregation of poor people of the annual ground rent of £35. If this were done the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association would be set free for other needy places. Summer flower service: A very successful and satisfactory meeting of Sunday scholars, their parents, and friends, was held on Sunday afternoon. In addition to the flowers obtained in the neighbourhood, a box containing some of great beauty was received on Saturday night from the Stockport Bible Class, and of course were thought a great deal of both for their own beauty and their being symbols of the Christian affections of distant brethren and sisters.

LONDON: AVONDALE ROAD.—The third anniversary social meeting took place on Tuesday, D. Martineau, Esq., presiding. The secretary of the chapel (Mr. Fabritius) offered explanations he had received of the absence of Revs. R. Spears, T. Dunkerley, Jeffery Worthington (all of whom were out of town), and H. Ierson. Among the visitors was Mrs. Soule, who had preached in the chapel on the preceding Sunday morning. The chairman, in his address, struck the keynote to some very practical addresses on church finance, insisting upon the duty of a congregation in the contribution of its means, according to ability, for the proper support of public worship. Mrs. Soule, in the course of some exceedingly interesting remarks, pointed out the desirability of regularly setting apart something, however small, towards the formation of a fund for ministerial pay. The secretary, in a most fervid address, proved that the congregation, notwithstanding many demands upon its resources, had not been unmindful of its minister, by passing over to Mr. Carter, on behalf of the church and friends, a sum of £50, which was offered rather as some slight token of esteem than as being in any degree a recompense for the time and ability devoted to the interests of the church. Among the speakers were Rev. J. Martin, Messrs. Davis (Stepney), Bredall, Carling, Cox, Fischer, Stephenson, Warren, Whittaker, and Miss White. A very cordial acknowledgment was made of the invaluable services of the secretary, Mr. Fabritius.

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET.—On Thursday, August 1st, the tenth annual flower show in connection with the Windsor Gardening Society was held. There was a good competition of plants, and numerous prizes were taken. The geraniums were not quite so good, nor the musks so numerous as last year; but the fuchsias and some other things were both finer and more in number. As usual, Mr. White, gardener to Thomas Avison, Esq. (this time assisted by Mr. Morton, gardener to George Jevons, Esq.), judged the merits of the various trees. The awards were distributed by Robert D. Holt, Esq. (in the chair), assisted by Miss Florence Melly, the secretary of the society. The meeting was addressed by the Revs. J. Harwood, B.A., J. Shannon, and F. Summers, and Mr. White and Mr. Currie. Miss Leighton and Mr. R. Robinson favoured the company with music.—On Sunday, August 4th, the annual flower services were held, when the chapel was tastefully decorated with trees, flowers, &c. The Rev. J. Shannon preached in the morning, and the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., in the evening. There were good attendances.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—As another instance of the possibility of practical "Religious Communion," in spite of intellectual differences, we have to report that during the Rev. J. J. Wright's holiday absence in July, the following gentlemen, who take an active part in the public life of Leicester, have preached in his place:—Frederick Mott, F.R.G.S.; W. Stanyon, Esq., a prominent member of the now venerable and Rev. J. P. Mursell's (Baptist) congregation; and also H. Major, B.A., Sc., the inspector of Leicester Board Schools, a Churchman and a Conservative. On Sunday last a beautiful floral service was held in the above church. The place was profusely and tastefully decorated with evergreens, ferns, and flowers. Over seventy bouquets were brought by the children, teachers, and friends. The children sang appropriate hymns. In the afternoon Mr. Wright gave a special address to the children, and in the evening preached on "Beauty and Utility." Considering the weather there were good attendances and a good collection.

SAFFRON WALDEN: GENERAL BAPTIST CHAPEL.—On Sunday the 4th inst., the 167th anniversary of this ancient chapel was held, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth. The morning congregation was smaller than we anticipated, whilst the evening was much larger than last year, and the largest we have yet gathered to an extra evening service. The afternoon was specially devoted to the anniversary of the Sunday school. Quite a number of strangers were present at this service. Hymns, specially selected, were sung by the scholars with ability. Time and tune were well sustained, the children winning well deserved praise for their singing. Our collections were more than double those of last year, or any other collection we have ever taken up here. On the 24th July the Dissenters of this town held their third amalgamated Sunday school treat, wherein all the Sunday schools of our town joined together during the afternoon and evening, but we were, as heretofore—excluded. Being considered non-Christians we are not recognised. In the town there is a growing sense of the wrong done to us, which is making itself felt, and presently it will be—

Ever the right comes uppermost, and ever is justice done. On bank holiday (5th inst.) our scholars and a number of the congregation assembled at the chapel at 9 45 a.m., and by ten o'clock we were in our waggons. With music and singing we started through the town for the old manor farm at Sampford, Essex, and received a hearty welcome from Mr. and Mrs. Starling, whom we repeatedly cheered. Our first care was to have a good dinner. Games, amusements, &c., followed. After tea, prizes were competed for. Then the scholars gathered in front of the residence and sang their anniversary hymns. The warmest thanks of the entire company were given to Mr. and Mrs. Starling for their great kindness to us. The adult friends say that for thirty years they have not spent another such a day.

THE BASIS OF THEOLOGICAL FELLOWSHIP.

To the Editors,—Though Mr. Walters has read the paragraph in my paper on which he comments "over and over again," I hope he will not be at all offended if I recommend him to read it once more, for, while he has evidently had no little trouble in reading it, he has but mis-read it after all. As a consequence of mis-reading it he has also mis-quoted it, and so made me say what I did not say, and what I never wished to say. The statement which he professes to quote was made by me relatively, but he quotes it as if I had made it absolutely. I did not say that the devotional meeting to which I referred was an instance of "either unmanly suppression or downright insincerity." I said that such was its character "in my way of looking at things." I used these qualifying words with great care and deliberation because I wished to speak for myself in particular and not for any other man whatever. I still regard the meeting in question in the same light. But this does not prevent me from believing that Mr. Charles Beard spoke out of the sincerity of his heart when he said that that meeting was to him "an occasion of genuine spiritual inspiration and uplifting." All that requires to be done in this case is that Mr. Beard should be true to himself, and that I should be true to myself. If he and Mr. Walters cannot see with my eyes, neither can I see with theirs. This is all I need say on the first item of difference between my paper and the letter of Mr. Walters.

In reply to Mr. Walters's question as to the foundation of my characterisation of the attitude of the speakers at the St. Thomas's meeting, I have to say that all I said on that point rests on the two latter of the three sources of information which he indicates, and on all other sources of information which I could possibly get at. I read all that I could find on the whole subject, on both sides, and I got to know all I could from personal talk with all whom I knew who could tell me anything about it; and it was upon the information so gained that I formed my "conviction," and made my statement.

Mr. Walters asks, "as one question more," "Has the test of Unitarianism been found at last?" I do not see why I should be asked a question like this, for my paper had nothing whatever to do with it. I do not know whether the test of Unitarianism has been found or not. I was not seeking any such test. Nor am I much concerned as to whether Paul was a Unitarian or not, nor as to how many or how few Epistles he wrote. These are questions of pure speculation, about which I have for some time past been comparatively indifferent. Nor do I say what my critic attributes to me with regard to the "early Christian benediction" which he says Paul wrote. I have my own opinion as to what that "early Christian benediction" meant when it was used by the early Christians, but I cannot look upon that benediction apart from its history and apart from the meaning which that history has given to it. No matter what it meant with those who first used it, it is a matter of common fact that, for long generations past, it has been all but completely monopolised by the orthodox churches as a distinctively Trinitarian formula; and I naturally assumed that it was so used by the Trinitarian chairman of the St. Thomas's meeting. If I was right in this natural assumption—and I do not see how I could be wrong in it—it seems to me beyond all question that the Unitarians who followed the chairman in that benediction committed themselves to a form of faith which they profess to utterly reject, and were thus guilty of insincerity. And as to any alternative to this insincerity, I cannot even imagine one except the "unmanly suppression" which I indicated in my paper. Mr. Walters asks, "in great bewilderment," whether, amid the conflicting answers to the question "What is a Unitarian?" this is the true one: A Unitarian is a man who cannot say with Paul, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." I should be sorry to add to Mr. Walters's great bewilderment by attempting to fully define a Unitarian, but I will venture to remind him that, whether or not a Unitarian is a man who cannot join Paul in repeating the "Apostolic benediction" in question, no honest Unitarian can join a Trinitarian in saying that Jesus Christ is God, and that what is called the Trinity is a fact, and not a fiction.—Truly yours,

W. MELLOR.

REV. EBENEZER LATHAM, M.D.

To the Editors,—Permit me to thank Rev. C. D. Badland for his very careful and instructive outline of the congregational history of Friargate Chapel. I had expected to find another name on his list of pastors, namely that of Rev. Thomas Hill, A.M. (son of Rev. Thomas Hill, B.A., Cantab, who was ordained presbyterially, 1652, and ejected from Shuttington, Warwicks.) This second Rev. Thomas Hill was tutor and preacher (V.D.M.) successively at Derby, Hartshorn, and Findern. The preface to his edition of those "Greek and Latin Psalms" which his pupils sang, is dated "Derbiae, vii. Calend., August, Ann., 1714." He died 2 March, 1720. From his name occurring in Mr. Badland's list I presume that, though he lived and taught at Derby, he preached elsewhere.

Ebenezer Latham, the most conspicuous name on Mr. Badland's list, was born 1688, the son of Rev. —Latham, of Wem. He was educated under Rev. Dr. Samuel Benyon, at Shrewsbury, and privately ordained in his tutor's house, 1707 or 1708, as Mr. Badland says. Thence he went to Glasgow, and graduated M.A. and M.D. His first pastorate was at Cauldwell, near Burton-on-Trent. He removed to Findern in 1720, and in all probability remained there as a resident till his death, 13th January, 1754. Certainly the academy was not closed till 1754. He seems to have been associated with Hill in its management from 1714. Mr. Badland speaks of Latham as "passing rich with forty pounds a year;" but it must be remembered that he had at least two sources of income in addition to his stipend, namely, his boarders, and his profession as a physician, which he practised at Findern, and perhaps in Derby. This combination was more common then than now, and commoner still at an earlier date. Rev. J. Eaton, M.D., and Rev. Adam Holland, M.D., were well-known Cheshire ministers. Latham's sermons were published in two vols., 1774, with a meagre biographical sketch by Rev. William Willetts, of Newcastle-under-Lyne, his brother-in-law and former pupil. Rev. Thomas White, who succeeded him at Derby, had also been his pupil. His most distinguished pupil was Rev. William Turner, of Wakefield, who married the eldest daughter of Willetts. Latham's most famous sermon was preached on the death of Rev. Matthew Bradshaw, of Kidderminster, 1742. It sketches the characters of some dozen of the recently departed Midland ministers, and contains a strong persuasive to the establishment and preservation of church records, 9, Upper Crescent, ALX. GORDON, Belfast, Aug. 6, 1878.

DOING AND SAYING.

Orange riots have occurred at Ottawa, in Canada, during which a priest's house was attacked and one of the hotels was demolished. Many of the rioters were wounded.

The Protestant Bond or Liberal Union of Holland now numbers nearly 10,000 members, having increased nearly 40 per cent in the last fifteen months. There are also more than 400 "modern" or liberal preachers.

The German Ultramontanes are making common cause with the Socialists in the second ballots, and either vote for Socialist candidates or else refrain from voting altogether where a Liberal is opposed to an adherent of the Communistic doctrines.

The Bishop of Lincoln has had a memorial from 115 of his clergymen in distress at the idea of having to marry a Jewess and a Christian. His lordship consoles them by telling them that if the parties have been married at the registrar's office they are not bound to go through the church service.

On the Bank Holiday the Leicester and Leicestershire Baptist Lay Preachers' Association held its tenth annual conference. In ten years its members have increased from five to forty. During the past year, it appeared that, by these forty accredited preachers, 137 places had been supplied; 5,524 miles travelled over; 830 sermons preached.

On Tuesday the Rev. George Gilfillan died after half an hour's illness at the house of Mr. Valentine, banker, Brechin, whither he had gone to officiate at the marriage of a niece. Mr. Gilfillan preached twice on Sunday in his usual health, and as he was of robust and powerful frame the news of his sudden death caused a great shock in Dundee.

The seventy-first annual Conference of the New Jerusalem (Swedenborgian) Church was opened on Tuesday, in Salford. Delegates attended from the New Church Convention in America, and there were also present 19 ministers and 68 representatives. The number of societies in connection with the Conference was given as 63, representing 4,842 members.

The Palestine Exploration Committee state that it is recommended to organise and despatch a special expedition, with the object of examining, by means of excavation where necessary, the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and the determination by this method of the sites of Capernaum, Chorazin, Bethsaida, and other places on these shores connected with the New Testament history.

The Right Rev. Dr. Sandford, Bishop of Gibraltar, has—as arranged by the Foreign Office—undertaken the Episcopal superintendence of any congregations, churches, and clergy of the Church of England in Cyprus. The Bishopric of Gibraltar was specially founded that the bishop therefore might "superintend the British congregations in Gibraltar and Malta, and on the shores and in the islands of the Mediterranean Sea."

Mr. Henry Irving laid the foundation-stone of the Harborne and Edgbaston Institute on Monday afternoon, and was afterwards entertained at luncheon in the Masonic Hall, Birmingham, when he delivered an address upon Education and the Drama. Speaking in defence of the drama he said that what sensible men had to do was not to make futile attempts to destroy an institution which was bound up with some of the best instincts of human nature but to strive to remove its abuses and to elevate its tone.

The Swiss are anxious about the increase of divorces in their midst. Recent statistics show in Belgium to every one hundred marriages there are 0.27 per cent of divorces, in Saxony 1.19, and in Switzerland 4.92. The Cantons compare with each other as follows: Berne, 5.14; Zurich, 8.87; and Schaffhausen, 14.02. One third of all these divorces are obtained within five years after the marriage act. To one at all familiar with the social and religious atmosphere of the Swiss republic, these facts are very suggestive.

Miss Nightingale's severe sentence "We do not care for the people of India" has soon found confirmation where it should have been refuted. On the night of the Indian Budget, members of the House of Commons made it a point to be absent. A Correspondent says:—As I anticipated, the attractions of the naval review entirely overshadowed those of the Indian Budget. The House was a really melancholy spectacle, and the proceedings which passed in its empty benches were of the most dreary description. The House, in fact, was a mere ghost of itself, and everything about it was correspondingly ghost-like.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Thoughts on Theism, with suggestions towards a Public Religious Service in harmony with Modern Science and Philosophy. Fifth thousand. Trübner, London.

THIS is a pamphlet of some sixty pages that aims to indicate the path of theological and ecclesiastical changes which volumes might not exhaust, and which may require long years to complete—if ever they are to be worked into practise. There would be a reform spreading far wider and deeper than that which is associated with the names of Luther, Cranmer, Knox; for it would go to recast the entire basis, substance, and tone of our theological and moral teaching. Cast loose from the authority of old Hebrew and Greek books, this reform would aim to gather up all the light which modern civilisation and knowledge have given to the world, bearing along with it whatever is good and true in the aforesaid Hebrew and Greek writings. For although the authors of this pamphlet are, in one view, very Radical, they are also in another view, very Conservative. For instance they say: "It is far from our purpose to imply that the religious life of our country is incurably diseased. On the contrary it is, we believe, sound at heart, though not at this moment in robust perfect health. Beneath the aberrations and eccentricities that disfigure the religious sentiments of the day, it is yet pervaded by an earnestness of intention by a spirit of reverence for things deemed sacred, and especially by a conviction of the importance of speculative truth, which is so justly opposed to a barren blank indifference—the caricature of genuine philosophy, and the offspring of universal scepticism."—p. 38. So far well sounding and conciliatory.

The authors of the pamphlet are not alone in fancying that "the religious work, especially in England, Germany, and America is in our day sadly out of harmony with modern thought and the air heavy with coming changes. Not yet, however, has the tempest actually burst upon us in its fury, &c."—p. 3. We are calmly of opinion that the tempest is not so near bursting as the authors suppose. It may take a long time yet before the advanced ideas of the few can procure the acceptance with the many. This is no reason for relaxing our efforts, or for desponding of the final result in the battle of Truth against Error, but it is a reason against the speedy fulfilment of literary prophecies. Take a single instance, from one of the most advanced denominations in the world, the Independents or Congregationalists. Forty years since Dr. Pye Smith, in his book on geology virtually conceded the modern view—the discrepancy between geology, as now understood, and the letter of the Genesis record. Yet how slight is the impression which even this immense concession has made, upon the general body of believers who rank themselves as Independents or Congregationalists. For, grant a few clear and undeniable mistakes in the record, and the high claim of plenary infallibility is gone. For ourselves, we wish a much fuller measure of success than it has acquired to the movement promoted by those liberal and enlightened Independent ministers—Messrs. Picton, Wood, Wilks, &c. Their proposal to overleap the boundaries of sect, to recognise the kinship of good men beyond the limits of a theological creed may be an augury of what is in the far future. But the general body of Congregationalists, as shown in their late annual meeting, is not with these advanced gentlemen, and what are these few, however worthy, among the thousands of Israel? And supposing the volume of Dr. Smith on geology had produced its full and legitimate effect on those for whom it was intended, this is but a small part of the work which has to be accomplished in the general mind in order to prepare the way for a rational theology, and a radical measure of church reform. As long as the existing Bibliolatry endures, it is vain to hope for progress. The Bible stops the way, or rather, the superstitious notions respecting the letter of the Bible stop the way. The attempt to measure the rate of the world's progress must always, in our hands, yield only a vague result. Perhaps the progress, though slow and inconspicuous, is greater than appears on the surface. We believe progress has been made, and that great changes are sure to come at length over the religious world, so called. We cannot persuade ourselves that our teachers will always persevere to repeat on the first day of the week ideas and notions that clash with ascertained facts and established knowledge; an end must come to this. We do not question the fact of progress, but only its rate.

The authors take their stand on a Theistic basis. There is of course no pretence to lay down a final creed, nor indeed any theological creed. The spirit of reverence is inculcated throughout. Prayers for fine weather and against potato disease and cholera, and all that class of prayers, are discarded. Supplication or petition is altogether struck out from exercises of devotion; all assumption to tell the divine being what he ought to do is set aside as irrational, and instead of supplication we have the higher form of religious feeling—Aspiration. The whole religious animus of the pamphlet, might be condensed into reverence towards the Supreme, and service to man, or in the more familiar language of Jesus, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbour as thyself."

The authors are very strenuous in the assertion of their Theism, and they are almost contemptuous towards every form of Atheism, Anthropomorphism, Pantheism, and Polytheism. As this is the soul and centre of their teaching, we are presented with the argumentative grounds of Theism. "The consciousness of Infinitude, of the Boundless One, the All-embracing Uncreate, which cannot be thought away, may be said to be God's intuitional and elementary gift or revelation of Himself to Man. . . . Had there e'er been nought, nought still had been, and everything that happens has a cause. Nothing in the Universe ever sprang into existence by virtue of its own forces. The world reverberates with fully accentuated affirmations of the belief that God is, that He is first, and that He rules for ever. The Formless Infinite, the Indivisible One changes not position, and is without part or passion. What then, it may be asked, is our conception of this indistructible element of thought? We reverently answer, "That which is, and is A Pure Ens, of which degree is unthinkable." It is not manifold or plural and of time; but simple or singular and eternal. It is always Infinite, never indefinite, not more nor less, not better nor worse."—p. 8. It is immediately afterwards added, "We believe that there is in man the abiding consciousness of an ever present Deity, whom it has been of old, perhaps correctly said, we do not know, and of whom, in his Being, we humbly confess that we have no mental image, picture, or perception." In this way is delivered to us the doctrine of Theism. Something is eternal, else nothing could exist at this moment. That something is the Formless Infinite being, without change, position, part, or passion, a pure ens without degrees; and of this Deity we are told man has an abiding consciousness, whom yet he does not know, nor can he form any mental picture of God. The incomprehensibility of God most theologians would allow; but the apprehensibility of God all would affirm as a basis for the religion of emotion to rest upon. We do not commit ourselves to found the argument for a divine existence, on what is called Intuition. We prefer arguing from undeniable adaptations from the order which we see in the universe, that for this order and the adaptations there must be adequate cause or reason. The abiding consciousness of Deity which is claimed for man, cannot be universal and constraining, else there would be no Atheists. Yet there is a considerable number of men who declare that they have no consciousness of Deity, either abiding or fleeting. Moreover, it is open to an Atheist to contend that even granting this consciousness of the Infinite to be, in some way or other generated in the human mind, that is whether the idea rises intuitionally or experientially, yet he is not driven from his lines of defence. An Atheist may concede an eternal something, but the well known question regards the nature of that something, its qualities or attributes. An eternal chaos would answer to the description of an eternal something. But is that something intelligent or otherwise—powerful, wise, good? This is the interesting portion of the Theistic argument. To present us with a God of whom we know little or nothing, of whom we never can know anything, who is to us only the Formless Infinite, who is neither here nor there, without emotion, therefore without sympathy for man—this formless, colourless, emotionless Divinity advances us but a very little way towards a practical available Theism. There is no trace yet of a Moral Governor of the Universe, far less of paternal Deity. It may turn out that a remorseless logic shall leave us no other God than the Formless Infinite, without emotion; but in that case the old God of our affections and emotions will have vanished from the universe. An Eternal Infinite may be still granted to us, but the question of over-mastering interest is, the character of that Infinite, the qualities, the attributes. Are we justified in ascribing to such a Deity, so apprehended, any moral character in our sense of the word moral? Having cancelled almost all the attributes usually ascribed to God, is it worth while to contend for such a shadow of a Deity—the Emotionless, Formless, Infinite? Surely the human mind needs more to rest on, more for its trust, its reverence, its affections. If we are answered that no more can be allowed us, that this and no more is the outcome of the Bible of the universe and human reason studying the same, then we say Theology is a sealed book and no human mind can read therein. Mr. Beard is quoted (p. 12) as substantially conceding this, when he says, "I believe that in regard to theology proper we know very little, and never shall know much more. The being of God entirely overtops and surrounds and overwhelms and floods and drowns our faculties."

We must not in all fairness omit to state, that notwithstanding the bareness of the ontological argument, the authors throughout assume government by divine laws, a moral government of the world, and paternal Deity in accordance with the loftiest spirit of Christianity. This is put into the conclusion, but it is not in the premises.

Quitting this controversial ground, the object of the pamphlet is to suggest "the ideal of a religious service in agreement with modern science and philosophy, and in harmony with the feeling of reflective and devout minds." On p. 44 we have a programme of the proposed order. It is highly probable that not a few of the clergy in all denominations would be willing to adopt something like the order indicated if they could obtain the assent of their congregations. It may be not so much the unprogressiveness of the teachers, as the apathy, the indifference of the people that is chargeable with the existing backward state of our public religious services. The wholesome reverence for old forms makes most people unwilling to venture on new fangled theories and to quit the old paths. Still it is marvellous that on a subject of such surpassing interest as Religion and Theology, congregations should accept the merest platitudes instead of demanding the best and highest that has been reached by human reason inspired by devotion. Instead of discouraging free thought and inquiry, the preferable way would seem to be, to offer the freest range to the freest thought, to invite the severest scrutiny, because religion, in so far as it is true, can take no harm, but must come out of the fire, like gold, purified the more. In the new proposed order of religious service the authors suggest nothing very revolutionary, nothing subversive, nothing that ought to alarm the most conservative of religionists. Only let the teachers of the people be persuaded that practical religion is the highest thing, and that controversial theology and dogmas, even if they are true, are yet subordinate—this alone will be the beginning of a great reform. Difference of theological opinions might be a slight evil, if only the wicked demons of illwill, bigotry, and uncharitableness were expelled from the minds of men. Such difference might give scope to the exercise of candour, liberality, and kindness. Sects and sectarianism would be no evil if they were stripped of the spirit of illwill and persecution. All religious men of the varying creeds and churches might consider themselves as friends and brethren engaged in a common warfare against ignorance, mental slavery, sin, and human misery in every form. A partial clearance would thus be made, and a field opened for further progress. We might in due time come to have the benefit of the best lights and the highest inspiration of the best minds among us. And this common benefit would be given out by our religious guides, not controversially and for any purpose of sectarian proselytism, but lovingly, in a generous spirit, as feeling that it was contributed toward the common treasury of good for the human race. The authors of this small work on a subject of transcendent interest have done their part to hasten this consummation. It remains to be seen whether they have struck the right keynote of the age, or whether they will be as a voice of one crying in a wilderness, like many other sweet and powerful voices that have preceded, dying away and leaving no trace behind.

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

PRAYER IS LAW.

REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.

WHEN I obey them, laws help me; when I disobey, they hurt me. Thus prayer may set me in new and higher relations to God, so as utterly to change and grandly to elevate my character. When by spiritual, aspiring prayer I reach out after God, I comply with the conditions of spiritual health and strength. If I open my shutters toward the east, the morning sun will shine in. It will shine, any way, but will do me no good unless I obey the conditions of its shining on me. So, if I open the windows of my soul toward God, the light of his divine truth and life will shine in. In this spiritual realm, it is knowledge and obedience to divine laws and conditions, precisely the same as in the material. It is one God and one order in both. Study and work, these are material prayer; and prayer is spiritual study and work. "I will therefore that all men pray everywhere."

For what are men better than sheep and goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, having hands, they lift them not in prayer,
Both for themselves and those that call them friend?
For so our whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

THOMAS CARLYLE ON THE LORD'S PRAYER.

IN a letter to the venerable Saint of Linlathen, Thomas Erskine, the venerable seer of Chelsea wrote, under date February 12th, 1869: "Dear Mr. Erskine, I was most agreeably surprised by the sight of your handwriting again, so kind, so welcome! The letters are as firm and honestly distinct as ever; the mind, too, in spite of its frail environments, as clear, plumb-up, calmly expectant, as in the best days; right so; so be it with us all, till we quit this dim sojourn, now grown so lonely to us, and our change come! 'Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy Name, Thy will be done.' What else can we say? The other night, in my sleepless tossings about, which were growing more and more miserable, these words, that brief and grand prayer, came strangely into my mind with an altogether new emphasis, as if written, and shining for me in mild, pure splendour, on the black bosom of the night there, when I, as it were, read them word by word, with a sudden check to my imperfect wanderings, with a sudden softness of composure which was much unexpected. Not for perhaps thirty or forty years had I once formally repeated that prayer; nay, I never felt before how intensely the voice of Man's soul it is, the inmost aspiration of all that is high and pious in poor Human Nature, right worthy to be recommended with an 'After this manner pray ye.'"

JOTTINGS.

The Mennonites believe in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, but hold that it is unscriptural and therefore wrong to use the words "person" and "Trinity" in expressing their faith.

Go forward as far as we might, we should be sure to find the truth and grandeur of the past still meeting us. God does not leave things that are very precious in his eyes to be long forgotten. The things that have been said remain, if they were said truly and nobly. We go backward because we find that men who spoke in times past said things a long way ahead even of present times; and so we continue to pick up our Homer, read our Plato, study our Aristotle, and shall continue to read the words of Moses, Isaiah, and Christ.—The Rev. Dr. Bellows.

When I was a younger man than I am now, talking with a good orthodox friend, he said to me: "My friend, the one thing that you need is a good dogma." I remember that when Sir Walter Scott came to die, as he lay upon his bed, speaking to his son-in-law, Lockhart, he said to him, "Be a good man, my dear, if when you come to lie in this place you would feel your soul at rest. Be a good man." I have always thought that between the two Sir Walter was wiser than my friend. I have found the good life to be sounder and better than the good dogma.—George William Curtis, at American Unitarian Festival.

It is customary to think of the old Masters as only producing gigantic oil pictures, and to imagine from the number of works ascribed to each that they used to dash them off with a lordly ease, but a collection like that recently exhibited in the Grosvenor Gallery will teach all who hold such an opinion a very different state of things. It will show them that the greatest of these great men made study after study of arm, or foot, or head, before they began their picture, and that their studies extend to all the minutiae of dress or ornament, landscape or flower, and are worked with a delicacy and patient industry which could hardly have been surpassed by a monk illuminating his psalter. And it will also show this very significant fact—that the work was a labour of love. Not for fame, nor wealth, but for real love of their art, did most of these men work and live.—Spectator.

The reign of Truth, of Law, of Rights, of Universal Love, shall gain upon ignorance, superstition, falseness, delusion and crime; these all the more decreasing as those increase, till at last Religion shall come to the light of Divinity shining in Humanity, or the God within, answering to the God beyond in a victorious Reconciliation. The best conception of God, is that which exerts the best regulative influence upon life; the best conception of Christ is that which is productive of the best character; the best conception of Religion is that which is most powerful to bring us into harmony with the Universal Law of the world in which we live. Not miracles then, not Incarnation, not Atonement, not Resurrection, in the sense of past ages do we need to-day, but Miracles of Truth, Incarnations of Virtue, Atonement of Repentance and redemption of time, resurrection of slain or arrested Manhood, from the graves and degradations of falseness, sloth, and base and ignoble living.—Christian Register.

QUIET WORK.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

ONE lesson, Nature, let me learn of thee,
 One lesson, which in every wind is blown,
 One lesson of two duties kept at one,
 Though the loud world proclaim their enmity—
 Of toil unsevered from tranquillity,
 Of labour that in lasting fruit outgrows
 Far noisier schemes, accomplished in repose,
 Too great for haste, too high for rivalry.
 Yes, while on earth a thousand discords ring,
 Man's senseless uproar mingling with his toil,
 Still do thy quiet ministers move on,
 Their glorious tasks in silence perfecting;
 Still working, blaming still our vain turmoil,
 Labourers that shall not fail when man is gone.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 16, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

MR. MCALESTER ON NON-SUBSCRIPTION.

IN a sermon on "Christ our Master," the Rev. C. J. MCALESTER recalls the history of the term "Non-Subscription" among the Presbyterians of Ireland. Mr. MCALESTER points out that such a term may have a proper use, without being made to mean absolutely that nothing is to be subscribed to; and he illustrates his case by comparing the use of the term non-furor, which has a definite historical reference, and was never intended to imply that the non-juring clergy would swear to nothing. They had their name from their refusal to take the oath of allegiance. So a non-subscribing Presbyterian in Ireland was simply one who refused to sign the Westminster Confession, as a document of merely human authority. There was no inconsistency in his being ready to confess his faith in the sufficiency of Scripture, as a book of Divine Authority, and his allegiance to Christ as the only King and Head of the Church.

We have no desire to raise again a controversy which has come to an issue, greatly as we regret the issue in itself. But without saying anything to provoke a new strife of words, we may give utterance to two reflections suggested to our minds in reading Mr. MCALESTER'S Apologia. The first of these is that while Mr. MCALESTER justifies the position retained by himself and his friends in the Non-Subscribing Association, he appears to overlook the circumstance that the principle of non-subscription has found a historical place elsewhere than in Ireland. The tradition of the Presbyterian succession in England and the constantly avowed principle of our Unitarian and Free Christian Societies has been that of Non-Subscription in the wide and general sense of the term. When the Free Christian element was admitted to the Irish Association, it was not unreasonable to suppose that the Non-Subscribing Presbyterians of Ireland desired to associate their own experience with that of other Free Christians, and to embody along with their view of non-subscription, that which was notoriously the view of other Unitarians. Non-subscription has never meant that one believed in nothing, or made no profession of his opinions. It has meant what was so well put by Mr. GASKELL in the gentle and earnest tones of his jubilee sermon, when he said:—"Coming hither as a young and untried man, no pledge of any kind was required from me as to my belief, but I was left, as would that all ministers of the Gospel were, perfectly free to set forth what approved itself to me as right and true." We were rejoiced to notice that at the last induction within the bounds of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim no doctrinal questions were proposed, the principle of non-subscription being thus acknowledged in the sense usual among Unitarians, and not in the limited sense in which it applies to the Non-Subscribing Association.

Our second remark is that however that Association may justify itself in adhering to the terms of the day in which it originated, there cannot but be a growing difficulty in its continuing to do so. The "sufficiency of Scripture" and the "sole Headship of Christ" were phrases to denote the right of private judgment in a time when decisions of Church councils were enforced upon all Christians or Presbyterians. The motto, "Christ the only King and Head of the church," had special reference to the connection of Church and State. In the North of Ireland it meant, as it did quite recently in Scotland and earlier in England, that the Head of the British Empire was not Head of the Church. Such a historical reference, however, offers more hindrance than help amid the controversies of a later day. It was with quite another significance than their original one that both phrases—"the Headship of Christ" and "the Sufficiency of Scripture" appeared in the recent debates of the Non-Subscribing Association. The former phrase was not, in this case, equivalent to a protest against State interference in questions of conscience; nor was the latter employed for the purpose of vindicating the right of private judgment. Perfectly new issues had arisen since the origin of the Association. It has, therefore, become impossible to take up the old language with its primary reference; while, on the other hand it is inconvenient and even delusive to attempt adapting such terms to the questions now agitated. The "Sufficiency of Scripture," when once private judgment is admitted, ceases to have any distinct meaning. It does not express the authority of Scripture, still less its infallibility. In point of fact the phrase has fallen out of general use. Its historical reference alone remains—without any present application. The term "Headship of Christ," again, cannot be introduced into modern discussions without raising difficulties. Orthodox Dissenters would not unnaturally feel shocked that their own motto should be so abused. "Christ alone King" was the cry of freemen who held their conscience before God only. To take their words and apply them to such reverence as we may owe to one under God would be to yield up the very banner of Protestantism to the minions of the Scarlet Lady. We need not inquire what diversities of opinion would be aroused among ourselves by any attempt to gather suffrages for such phraseology in a statement of our principles. As we have already said we look upon the position of affairs in Ireland as altogether a temporary one—one which has the single good feature of rendering peace possible, while all parties may spend themselves in those good works which come of faith and lead to mutual esteem.

SIN MAKES HELL.

WHILE many voices are crying aloud against the old doctrine of punishment endlessly inflicted, and many are crying aloud for its retention as a part of God's Government and of divine revelation, it may be that the line of the New Church, or Swedenborgian teaching, suggested by the following extracts from a sermon of the Rev. L. P. MERCER, will be found wise and timely:—"We cannot run away from our sins, for they fix their consequences in the spiritual organism whose functions they pervert. Affections and thoughts and determinations are attended with variations in the organic substances of the soul, and these variations are by habit made permanent. Where you sowed your seed, therefore, there will your harvest be, in the soul itself. . . . The violinist who took great trouble to procure some pieces of an old violin to mend his own, assigned as the reason that the very vibrations of the music of many years had altered the quality and susceptibility of the wood. It is certainly so with the human spirit which has vibrated to the harmony or discord of life. The effect becomes lasting and permanent. It takes on in itself the form of the affections, passions, purposes, which have most powerfully and continuously played upon it. . . . The law works on whether we heed it or not; and what we sow is growing where we sow it, unto the reaping. We cannot choose how to live. We cannot stop willing, we cannot stop thinking. Life comes by influx to every man; he cannot refuse it; he can only say how he will use it. When it enters into his will, he becomes conscious of it as if it were his own. He has no choice but to determine it to the accomplishment of some desire and thought, good or bad. And by every desire and every thought, whether we think of it or not, we are sowing for a spiritual harvest which we shall reap in the soul here, carry with us into the hereafter, and make the groundwork of our existence there. . . . Two radically different kinds of life lie before us, and not even the Lord himself can choose for us. And the outcome of it is equally plain: 'What a man soweth, that shall he also reap.' Life is within us and this world is before us; the one spurring us on to deeds, the other furnishing the opportunity."

The late Mr. Samuel Balls, of Yeovil.

THIS gentleman, whose sudden decease was chronicled in a recent number of this journal, was born on January 31st, 1810, and until about the age of fifteen received his education from the Rev. David Hughes, after which he became apprenticed to a respectable firm carrying on a large drapery business. Previous to his entrance upon that line of life, however, a very strong wish was expressed by the Rev. Samuel Fawcett, founded upon his observation of the lad's aptitude and spirit, that his studies should be continued, with a view to his regular preparation for the ministry at York. His surviving relatives, an uncle and aunt—his own parents having died in early life—thought it best for him to engage in trade, a decision formed, we believe, largely from the consideration that a Nonconformist minister, as well as a Church of England curate, might not unfrequently be brought face to face with many a claim, impossible of being met, and pressing in a pecuniary point of view.

When he was about seventeen years of age a Sunday school was first opened at Vicarage-street, Yeovil, into the work of which he heartily entered, and where he continued his teaching and active usefulness until his departure for London. Residing there for a year or two, he went to live at Framlingham, in Suffolk, where he brought to the cause of Education and of Liberal Christianity the same earnestness which he had shown at Yeovil, to which place he returned for a few years, and where he was to be found not only teaching in the Sunday school, but, in the absence of the minister, discharging from time to time, and always with acceptance, the duties of the minister in the pulpit. His next move was to Load Bridge, near Langport, where he became clerk to Messrs. Stuckey and Bagehot. Again we find him busy in works of usefulness—opening a Sunday school, and a week evening school as well; whilst, through the kindness of T. W. Bagehot, Esq., of Langport, a large room was fitted up and opened for Sunday evening worship, where he regularly conducted evening service up to the time of his final removal to Yeovil; his employers removing their business thither in consequence of the extension of the Bristol and Exeter Railway to that town. There at all times he was to be found faithful to his convictions, and untiring in his unselfish efforts to spread the religious principles which inspired his own earnest work. To him it is due that the chapel at Yeovil has been kept open; his life seemed bound up with it, and to the very last its interests lay next his heart. The circumstances amidst which his religious professions threw him from time to time were doubtless often calculated to damp a less buoyant spirit than his own, and yet every now and then it was his happiness to find some seed of good sown by himself in past days to have taken root in good ground, and many a letter from those whom he had taught to read, write, and cypher, and who had caught somewhat of his spirit and influence, did he receive from distant quarters of the globe. Soldiers, sailors, railway porters, tradesmen—these were the kind of people who owned his helping hand, acknowledging that but for him they would never have been able to write home to their friends at all.

An instance or two may be mentioned as giving point to what has been already written. A policeman, met by the brother of Mr. Samuel Ralls at Lynn, expressed his gratitude for all the good advice and instruction given to him, through the advantage of which he rose to the rank of sergeant, and is now a superintendent in the county of Dorset. Again, some five and forty years ago a person educated at Vicarage-street Sunday and night school left the town, and from a position in New York which he has won for himself ever has remembered his debt of hearty thanks for that success in life which he attributes entirely to the training he enjoyed under Mr. Ralls, for years sending back to England the American Unitarian and Universalist papers. Other instances might well be added, but enough has been said to prove the real good done, and the effect of the testimony borne by one who, like Samuel Ralls, was ever found trying to do whatever service to his fellows he might be able to render them, that so he might be blessed with the thought that he had faithfully striven to leave the world better than he found it. His end was sudden, but with the bright conviction that to the soul of man death is but transition. The reverent spirit of our friend would have been the first to acknowledge that "the Lord's appointment is the servant's hour."

IRISH NON-SUBSCRIPTION: WHAT IT MEANS.*

TOWARDS the end of the seventeenth, and early in the eighteenth century, we find certain Protestant Dissenters in Dublin and the north of Ireland, generally in their church government Presbyterian, who had ceased to regard as at all authoritative the standards of particular churches. Their great study was the Holy Scriptures; not a few of them were learned expositors of its sacred teachings, and some of them were among the ablest defenders of Divine Revelation at a time when Deistical writings were most widely circulated. Their distinguishing principle was thus briefly expressed: "The Scriptures our sole rule of faith." They put aside Pope and prelate, council and synod; and against all opponents they took their stand on the great principle—"One is our Master, even Christ." The Confession of Faith drawn up at Westminster, and adopted by the Church of Scotland as their standard, was also the Confession of the Ulster Presbyterians; and we can easily understand how those who had embraced broader views of Christian truth would, for themselves and for their brethren, plead for more liberty than the Presbyterians generally were disposed to allow. Hence the controversy which for a length of time was waged, and hence the organisation of a distinct body in Ulster in 1726, which took the name of "The Presbytery of Antrim." . . . It is easy to see why this section of Protestants took the name of Non-Subscribers. Candidates for license and ordination were generally required to subscribe the Westminster Confession as the confession of their faith; against this practice they protested, and they sought to enlarge the liberty of the church by discountenancing and opposing a practice which, as they felt, impugned the great principle of the sufficiency of Scripture, and raised into an unjust importance an interpretation of Christian doctrine drawn up by men as fallible as themselves. Look for a moment at that term "Non-Subscriber." Some have been disposed to think that it means one who subscribes nothing, and moreover who, although he may belong to a particular church or congregation, means to be free to believe anything or nothing, or at any rate to make no profession of any belief whatever. Even if, very loosely taken, the term might be so understood, it would thus imply, in connection with any church, a positive absurdity. There is no church whose members have not some distinct belief, and though it is true they may not subscribe that belief, they nevertheless acknowledge it. I put out of consideration the few eccentric persons, recently termed Agnostics—they might in plainer English be called "Know-nothings"—who hang on to certain churches and societies, but who can have no real connection with them; and I also pass over the Secularists and Atheists, who are not associated in churches, and who can have no worship. Worship is an essential element in every church. We can suppose a church which is not Christian—it may be purely Theistic; but, if so, its members would not hesitate to profess (I do not say subscribe) belief in a God; and thus, inasmuch as they do profess some opinion, even these "advanced" thinkers would, on their own showing, have no claim to be called Non-Subscribers. But every such term, as it arises in the history of opinions, has a distinct meaning, which must be determined by the circumstances in which it has originated. At the time of the Revolution, when James the Second had abdicated the throne, and William and Mary were crowned as sovereigns of these kingdoms, a certain portion of the Episcopal clergy, who believed in the divine right of kings and the duty of passive obedience, refused to take the oath of allegiance, and hence they were called Non-jurors. Now this term did not mean that they would take no oath, that in no case would they swear—they were not Quakers; they would, no doubt, if occasion required, testify on oath to what they knew to be true; but they would not swear allegiance to the new rulers, and hence they were designated "Non-jurors." The word "Protestant" does not mean one who protests always and against every thing, but one who protests against certain assumed authority in spiritual matters. And it is just so with the term "Non-subscriber." We must interpret it historically, and give it the definite meaning which belongs to it. There is happily no difficulty in determining what the meaning is. "Non-Subscriber" is simply one who accepts the Scriptures as his sole rule of faith, and refuses to subscribe the Westminster Confession, or any other composition which assumes to interpret what the Scriptures teach. Such a composition may be a very valuable help, and it may contain much important truth; but Non-subscribers will not accept it as authoritative, or place it on a level with that Scripture which it seeks to illustrate and explain.

Several bodies of Presbyterians in Ireland, possessing separate jurisdiction, but agreeing on the great principle of non-subscription, determined to form themselves into an association, which was formally organised in the summer of 1835, and took the name of "The Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians." The basis on which they thus associated was "the acknowledgment of allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church," and "the maintenance of the great principles of the Reformation, namely, the sufficiency of the Scripture, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority in matters of faith." This basis seems to embody the very essence of Christianity, while at the same time it presents to us in the simplest form the principles—and the only true principles—of Protestantism. Christ the King and Head of the Church—under Him we acknowledge no human leader; in Him we have the exposition of divine truth, and He is our only Master. In such an acknowledgment there would be no meaning if we did not receive Him as divinely sent. The Sacred Scriptures we receive as containing the Revelation which we have in Christ. In the interpretation of those Scriptures we claim the right of private judgment, and thus differ from those who feel themselves bound to receive whatever the Pope or the Church may dictate for their acceptance. We reject all human authority, whether in the form of Creed or Confession, whether emanating from Pope or Prelate or Presbytery. In the recollection of power which has been wielded by human leaders, to the great injury many times of the cause of Christ, and in the consciousness that the beautiful simplicity of gospel truth has been injured by the superstition which in a darker age rested upon it, and by the errors which in the course of time crept into it, we seek to come directly to Christ, and to look to Him and reverence Him as our only Master.

Within the last few years the Association was rendered more comprehensive, under the impression that some who might not be in church government Presbyterian but yet in faith Christian, and in principle thoroughly Protestant, might unite with their Presbyterian brethren in helping on a cause which owes its value not to any particular form of church government, but to its great principles of Christian truth and Christian freedom; and there was added to the original title of the Association—"and other Free Christians." Some appear to think that by this addition to the title the principles of the Association were altered, and that the door was thus opened for any who desired to join it, no matter how loosely they might hold the Christian faith, no matter though they should attach little value to Revelation, though they should be not so much Free Christians as free thinkers. For such an opinion there is no shadow of foundation. The Non-subscribing Presbyterians are free, inasmuch as they reject human authority in matters of faith; their freedom does not depend on their being connected in Presbyteries, although from that connection they think they derive much help in their churches.

GROWING OLD GRACEFULLY.

SOFTLY, oh! softly, the years have swept by thee,
Touching thee lightly with tenderest care;
Sorrow and care did they often bring nigh thee;
Yet they have left thee but beauty to wear.
Growing old gracefully,
Gracefully fair.

Far from the storms that are washing the ocean;
Nearer each day to the pleasant home light;
Far from the waves that are big with commotion;
Under full sail and the harbour in sight!
Growing old gracefully
Cheerful and bright.

Past all the winds that were adverse and chilling;
Past all the islands that lured thee to rest;
Past all the currents that wooed thee unwilling,
Far from the port of the land of the blest.
Growing old peacefully;
Peaceful and blest.

Never a feeling of envy or sorrow,
Where the bright faces of children are seen;
Never a year from their youth wouldst thou borrow,
Thou dost remember what lieth between.
Growing old wealthily;
Gladly, I ween;

Rich in experience that angels might covet;
Rich in a faith that has grown with thy years;
Rich in the love that grew from above it;
Soothing thy sorrows and hushing thy fears.
Growing old wealthy;
Loving and dear.

Hearts at the sound of thy coming are lightened,
Ready and willing thy hand to relieve;
Many a face at thy kind words has brightened,
"It is more blessed to give than receive!"
Growing old happily;
Blest, we believe.

THE WORKHOUSE WOMAN'S STORY.

BY BEATRICE A. JOURDAN.

How long have I been here did you say, ma'am?—a year and ten months, come Tuesday. No, I'm not so very old, but, you see, downright crippled with rheumatics, owing, as I think, to my having had to stand at the wash-tub in a thorough draught, one place where I worked. Comfortable? Oh yes, I'm very comfortable, thankful to be in an infirm ward, and not among the able-bodied; thankful, too, to have a clean place to live in, and a tidy little bed to lie on—a bed fit for a duchess a'most. Of course, we've our squabbles among us, but I keep a civil tongue in my head to these old ladies as I don't care about. I just pass the compliments of the day with them, that's all. Oh, I'm fond of reading, very, and as pleased as can be to get hold of a book, but I never had much learning myself, and I think that has made me value it the more. I was left a widow early, rather, and if ever a woman did work hard for her son I did for my Dick, for I was determined he should have a good education. None of your charity schools for me! No, I sent him to a real good one, where he mixed quite with grand young gentlemen. It didn't answer so well as I hoped, for it put high notions into his head without making a great scholar of him after all. Still, when he left school he could write and cast accounts beautiful, and I got him a place at a tea grocer's, where his master trusted him like as if he'd been his own son. He took to smoking early, and went about a good deal with gay companions above him in station; I found, too, he was often short of money, since for weeks together he would bring me nothing for his board, but I thought young men would be young men, and seldom complained of or questioned him. I was so afraid, don't you see? too much afraid, I now think, of seeming cross to him, and thus of driving him from his home. Still I must own I had often a hard struggle to make two ends meet, and this was particularly the case with me when that long frost begun, nigh upon eleven years ago. We in London haven't had the like of it since. There was ice on the river and on the canals, and ice—such thick firm ice they said—on the “ornamental” of the Regent's Park. It was there my Dick went every moment he could spare, oftener indeed than I thought he ought to, for he was downright mad after the ice, and so was all his young friends. One day—a day I shall never forget, no never—I was cleaning up my place a bit, and crooning to myself the while, “Nearer my God to Thee,” which somehow I'd got into my head, when in comes my boy, quite early, swinging a pair of skates in his hand. “Hollo, mother,” says he pretty sharp, “what are you up to now? humming and buzzing for ever! you'll be turning into a bee next, you will!” “Dear me, Dick!” says I, “going on the ice at this time of day? Can your master spare you?” “Old Kippins ain't my master any longer,” says he, “We've quarrelled!” “Along of your skating,” said I, “bother it, then!—or is it something worse!—oh, Dick, I'm afraid it is.” He looked at me and I at him, and I saw his face was as white, ma'am, as your handkerchief, but just at that moment in bounced a fellow-lodger with a cut finger for me to bind up. She was a person Dick could not abear, and while I was attending to her I heard him rattle out some silver he kept in a teapot on the mantel shelf, and then, before I could stop him, he was gone! I hardly know how it was, but somehow his manner had frightened me, so, as soon as I could, I put on my bonnet and went down to the park, telling myself I'd see for once what a fine figure he cut on the ice. I was standing on the suspension bridge, trying to make him out from among the crowds below, when all of a sudden there was an awful crash, and such a shriek, ma'am! shriek, shriek, shriek, hundreds of voices all shrieking together! The ice had broke through, and people were drowning right and left. I think I turned faint, at first, but soon I was pushing my way along the shore, looking at the poor bodies that was being brought by degrees to land, some dead, some hard at death's door. Not one of them was my Dick, but I knew he might be lying, like many another mother's son, deep in the water under the ice where he could not be got at. I was took home, at last, by some good Christian folks, and I couldn't help hoping I might find my boy waiting for me, but he wasn't there, ma'am, only instead of him I found Mr. Kippins, in a fearful fume, too full of his own bad news to think much of mine! He'd come to tell me he'd sent away Dick at a moment's notice, because he'd just found out he had for many months past been robbing him—he thought altogether of about twelve or fifteen pounds. My Dick as I fancied so honest! I wouldn't believe it till he'd brought sure proof, and then I'm sure my heart trembled just as much as Eli's did, as we read of in the Bible. That he should have done such a wicked thing, and just after be drowned, and I never know he was sorry even; oh, it did seem dreadful! They said that his body was not found, but I made sure nevertheless, he was drowned, and for years I never held up my head. Once I thought I'd pinch and scrape so as to pay Mr. Kippins back, but I found I couldn't manage it, and after that I sank the more. I got lower and lower in the world, for folk didn't care to employ a poor, dull, broken-down sort of body like me, and as my rheumatics grew worse I began to see there was nothing before me but the 'house. I'm afraid I was selfish enough to wish to die first, not knowing the great joy and comfort that was in store for me, thank God! One November evening I, to save a candle, was sitting in the dark in my underground kitchen—as poor a place as ever you see, ma'am, but it was all I could afford—I heard my own name called, and went to the door to see what I was wanted for. My landlady was speaking to some one—an old man, I thought, for his step, as he came down the stairs, was very slow, and his voice sounded hoarse-like as he said, “I don't think this can be the Mrs. Rice I want, her name's Hannah Rice.” “I'm Hannah Rice,” I cried, “who is it? who?” “Mother!” says he, “it's your own old boy;” and the next moment Dick had got his arms round me, and I round him, and we were standing together kissing and crying for joy. But at last he broke away from me, and sunk down into a chair, and began to cough—oh, most fearful! “Not ill, my boy?” said I, running to him. “Yes,” said he, “but I've got through my journey all the way from Liverpool, and have ferreted you out—thank God for that!” I hurried to fetch a candle, for I wanted to look at him, and while I was striking a match he says, in such a sweet, sad way, ma'am—“Ah, mother, there wasn't 'a light in the window for me.” “Always in my heart, my boy,” says I; “there's been one always burning in my heart. But I never thought you was living, Dick. I fancied you was drowned.” “I meant you to think so,” he said. “I didn't go on the ice at all that awful day, and when I heard of the accident I cut away—I suppose you know why?” I told him I did know, as well, leastways, as I could speak, for I'd lighted my candle by that time, and I saw as plain as could be he had come home to die. I think he saw me a-looking at him, for he tried to smile and brighten up a bit; and then he told me he wouldn't come back—no, nor write to me, even—till he had made up the money—every penny of it—he had wronged Mr. Kippins of. He pulled out his purse, and showed me that the whole sum was there, fifteen pounds, in three bank notes; and then he said he would take 'em on the morrow to Kippins, and meantime would I find him a lodging, for he was tired a bit after his journey, and couldn't go about very well? Tired! he was something more than that, and I couldn't help crying again to look at him; but still I was very thankful and happy as my own boy had come back—not to me only, but to his Father, who was taking him to His own home in heaven. He'd had a hard life since he'd left me, working for the most part in the Liverpool docks. He'd gone there in the first instance, and had got employment of a rough kind, for having come as a stranger without any character he couldn't, of course, be nice. But he'd a trifle with him besides the fifteen pounds, and I took a room for him in the house where I was living, and was with him, thank God! till he died. Was he sorry about me, did you say? Oh, yes, as far as I'd let him; but I told him I was very happy now, and you know sick folks has their fancies, ma'am, and I do think he'd got that fifteen pounds more in his head than he had me. Mr. Kippins was out of town we found, ma'am, not likely to be back for a fortnight, so Dick kept the notes under his pillow, and often in the night time when he got worse, and I sat up with him, I see him a-feeling for them to make sure they was safe. No, it wasn't very long, it was sooner than I thought; praise the Lord for it! for the doctor I called in could do nothing to relieve him, and he suffered a good deal at last, though not so much as many. The night before he died he says to me quite sudden, “Why, mother, I thought there was a bee in the room.” He was wandering a bit at the time, I think, but presently he went on: “I used to call you a bee once, you was always humming hymn tunes, mother. I wish you'd sing me a hymn now. ‘Nearer, my God, to Thee,’ I should like best, you was a rare one at that.” I felt at first I couldn't sing it, but I tried and got on better than likely; but when I come to the words—

Then with my waking thoughts
Bright with Thy praise—

he stopped me. “That'll do,” says he, “another time——” and after this he never spoke again, though he held my hand and pressed it strongly less than half an hour before he died. I'd got a little into debt those last few days, and as soon as the funeral was over I sold off my bits of things and come in here. Oh, and about the bank notes? Of course, I gave them to Mr. Kippins. How could I have borne myself else? He was a good deal surprised when he saw 'em, and touched too, but he took 'em. Why shouldn't he? They was his right, and as he didn't know much of me I didn't care to tell him how hard up I was. Bless you, ma'am, I behaved honourable! You're very good to say so, but I did my duty, nothing more. I don't deserve no praise, and you can't think how happy I am, really and truly, for I have God to trust in always. I know my Dick is in His hands, and I am looking forward to meeting my dear boy by-and-by in Heaven.

THE VALUE OF SMILES

CARRY the radiance of your soul in your face. Let the world have the benefit of it. Let your cheerfulness be felt for good wherever you are, and let your smiles be scattered like sunbeams, “on the just as well as the unjust.” Such a disposition will yield you a rich reward, for its happy effects will come home to you and brighten your moments of thought. Cheerfulness makes the mind clear, gives tone to thought, adds grace and beauty to the countenance. Joubert says: “When you give give with joy and smiling.” Smiles are little things, cheap articles, to be fraught with so many blessings to both giver and receiver, pleasant little ripples to watch as we stand on the shore of every day life. They are our higher, better nature's responses to the emotions of the soul.

Let the children have the benefit of them: those little ones who need the sunshine of the heart to educate them, and would find a level for their buoyant natures in the cheerful, loving faces of those who lead them.

Let them not be kept from the middle aged, who need the encouragement they bring.

Give your smiles also to the aged. They come to them like the quiet rain of summer making fresh and verdant the long, weary path of life. They look for them from you who are rejoicing in the fullness of life.—The Christian.

THE KENT AND SUSSEX UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE sixty-sixth annual meeting of this Association was held at Horsham on Wednesday week. There was a large attendance, mainly of Sussex people. The old chapel, surrounded by its spacious and well-filled graveyard, and clothed in its rich garment of ivy, spoke to the heart of the perennial life and freshness of nature, and of the fleeting character of human existence here on earth.

THE SERVICE

was held in the morning at 11 30, the Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON conducting the devotional part. The preacher was the Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, who took as his text Matthew xxi., 12—“Jesus went into the temple of God and cast out all that bought and sold.” It was an earnest and eloquent plea for true spiritual life in the churches, and dealt with what the preacher called the four stages of church life—inwardness, outwardness, worldliness, and worthlessness. In the first of these stages men possessed a noble heroism for the things of God and the soul, and readily sacrificed themselves for truth, or what they felt to be such; in the second, they built grand temples and cathedrals, and thought of music, vanity, and enjoyment in their worship; in the third, they asked how they could make religion pay, to what extent they could profit by its ordinances, which was the state of things among the Jews at the time of Christ; and in the fourth, rottenness, decay, and death were the natural outcome of preceding worldliness and selfishness. With an impressive directness of speech which no one could fail to appreciate, Mr. Collyer expanded these ideas, and gave it as his belief that broad-hearted men were so rapidly increasing in all the churches that we might soon hope to see our theological ideas in the ascendancy, under whatever name this might take place. Our distinction was that of being the “children of those men of the inner life” who laboured nobly for the cause of religious liberty here in England, and laid the foundations of national life on the other side of the Atlantic; and we must be true to our lineage. A true church needed a fiery spirit, fair morals, the fervour which Unitarians seldom or never and the beauty of inward mysticism, in order that these might blend and harmonise in its life, and thus give it the highest power for good in the world.

THE DINNER.

The dinner was excellent. Owing, however, to the visitors being more numerous than was expected, late comers had to be seated at an extemporised table, and had what one gentleman called a scramble to secure what they needed for the sustenance of the outer man. Still all went well, if not as "merry as a marriage bell," at least with that friendly social spirit which gives to a meeting the stamp of almost family life.

The usual loyal toasts having been given in graceful terms by the CHAIRMAN (C. Ellis, Esq.),

The Rev. E. R. GRANT, the secretary, read the annual report of the Society, from which we give the following:—

REPORT.

Your committee have no great success to record—no miserable failures to report. No new mission has been started, and no old chapel has been closed. The story for the year is simply one of steady work, for the most part quietly and faithfully done. Your committee call attention to the fact that out of over twenty chapels in the counties of Kent and Sussex, there are only some five Sunday schools. Little is done to interest the children, whilst the young people of our congregations, having nothing to do, too often drift from us, being attracted by the greater energy and warmer sympathy of other churches. It is not the province of your committee to advise the different societies in this matter, but they cannot be blind to the fact that the congregations having Sunday schools are the strongest and best in the district. Your committee, however, are glad that there are signs of improvement. One school has been opened during the year at Lewes, and another is to be opened at Brighton. The long-entertained project of building new schools and class-rooms at the back of the church at this latter place is being carried out, and the work in progress will no doubt be completed in a few weeks. The congregation at Brighton is spending on this some £600, and though a large part of this amount is subscribed, further help is still needed, and will be thankfully received by any member of the building committee.—Ashford: The movement here continues to prosper. The success, though not great, is of a steady and promising kind. Last year there were only twenty children in the school, this year there are over forty. The evening congregation in the winter months averages from 100 to 120. The Mutual Improvement Society has been unusually successful. A Sunday-school library has been established and is working well amongst the children. Subscribers to the chapel funds increase slowly in numbers, but only for small amounts. There is little hope of the congregation becoming self-supporting for some years to come, still there is a probability of much greater local aid in the immediate future. Canterbury: The services here have been continued through aid generously given by the students of the Manchester New College. Your committee made a small grant towards defraying the expenses of these services, and hope that their successors will be able to do more. Battle and Northiam: There is nothing special to report of these places except that, labouring under great disadvantages, the chapels are still kept open for worship, and with as much success as could be expected under the circumstances. Your committee have forwarded a grant of £18 made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.—Ditchling: Mr. Robert Turner writes:—"We have finished the alterations and repairs required in our chapel, and have been enabled, through the generosity of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Kent and Sussex Association, and some other friends, to do more than we at first contemplated, the total amount of subscription being £120." They hope to continue their weekly service through the coming year.—Chichester: The affairs in this place are a little less hopeless than last year. Your committee has tried in various ways to call attention to the fact that something must be done towards re-opening the Baffins Lane Chapel, or that it would probably soon be lost to us altogether. On account of the executive of the Southern Association being so much nearer to Chichester, the whole matter will be handed over to them in the future.—Lay Preachers: Your committee are indebted to several laymen for services they have so willingly and generously rendered in the absence of some of our ministers, especially Mr. B. A. Igglesdon, of Dover, for his repeated services at Ashford.—Money Matters: As in former years, we are greatly indebted to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its very generous and continued liberality. The total income from all sources for the year just past has been £278. 17s. 11d. The balance in hand, including the Sittingbourne subscription, is £54. 4s.

At the close of the report the CHAIRMAN said he should deviate somewhat from the usual course for the convenience of the visitors, who would be more anxious to hear Mr. Collyer than to listen to business speeches, and might be unable to stay long enough to hear both. He should therefore ask the Rev. J. Hill, of Chichester, to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Collyer before moving the adoption of the report.

Mr. HILL, in proposing the vote of thanks, said that on no occasion had he been more gratified than with the sermon of the morning. The preacher was not a stranger among them, for he had lived in their memories and their hearts ever since his former visit, and they were all delighted to see and hear him again. He only wished that some of the doubting and indifferent of our local congregations could have heard the words of hopefulness and encouragement which had fallen from Mr. Collyer's lips, and he thought that if that gentleman could be cut up into half a dozen preachers and distributed through the country many of those who are now dead to the power of liberal faith would be speedily brought to life.

Mr. I. R. MOTT, of Birmingham, seconded this resolution, and told an amusing story of how he was mistaken for Mr. Collyer after one of the services at Essex-street Chapel seven years ago.

The Rev. R. COLLYER, in replying, said it was embarrassing to be taken for "another fellow," at least under some circumstances. When he was crossing to England this time a gentleman came up to him on the steamer and said—"Excuse me, sir, but you look very much like Mr. Beecher; I always thought Mr. Beecher a handsome man, but when I was introduced to him some time ago I found he was not nearly so handsome." This was the kind of humiliation he had to bear on the boat. Happily, however, in being taken for Mr. Mott, or in Mr. Mott's being taken for him, his experience was of an agreeable nature, for it showed that he must be up to the average. Those present had no idea of what a sweet and good thing he felt it was to be among them. It was impossible for them to be so deeply touched as he was, for they could not have his blessed memories. He well remembered with what feelings of joy he had come among the English Unitarians on his former visit, and the seven years which had intervened were full of pleasant and grateful recollections of the reception they gave him then. With tears in his heart, if not in his eyes, he often talked it all over with his wife as they sat by their own quiet fireside at Chicago. And there was not only their kindness at the time of his visit to keep this flame of tenderness burning in his heart, there were also their noble words, their generous sympathy in the hour of his great distress. When his church had been burnt down, and hope seemed to die in his heart, they had flashed their words of brotherly sympathy across the ocean and lifted him above doubt and fear. For this he thanked them; it was the grateful remembrance of this which made his present visit so peculiarly pleasing to him. So far as liberal principles were concerned, he was glad if his words seemed calculated to strengthen them in the minds and hearts of those present. It was only a question of time. He had no doubt of the spread of our faith; it was the highest expression of God's truth, and must prevail. Having uttered a graceful and touching eulogium of Mr. Brooke Herford, who wished, he said, to be tenderly remembered by all his English friends, "Brother Collyer" sat down amid a storm of applause.

The CHAIRMAN, who is also the treasurer of the Association, now read the balance sheet for the year, and moved the adoption of the report. They were doing good work, he said, especially at Ashford, but they could do more if friends would entrust them with larger means. In concentrating their efforts at Ashford they had acted wisely, he thought; and he believed they had been fortunate in their selection of a man to place there, for Mr. Moden had evidently made his mark in the town, as well as done much towards building up a good permanent congregation.

Mr. WATERFIELD, of Brighton, seconded the adoption of the report, and expressed his satisfaction with the work that was being carried on in the district. The report, if not all they could wish, was at least very satisfactory in comparison. The spread of liberal principles was very slow, owing to the antagonism which they on all sides encountered. This was the case in Brighton, and it was doubtless the same elsewhere. If, however, they could only get more of Mr. Collyer's views, and especially his hopeful tone, engraved into them, they would be able to fight a more earnest battle and make more progress.

The Rev. R. C. DENDY moved a vote of thanks to the British and Foreign Association for their liberal aid, without which it would have been impossible for the local society to carry on the work they were doing. This was seconded by Mr. EDWIN ELLIS, of Guildford, who spoke of the wisdom with which the London committee distributed the funds entrusted to them. The Guildford people, for instance, having done all they could to swell their chapel building fund, went to the British and Foreign for help. But the committee said, "No, you must go and do something more for yourselves," and this was the right thing. It put people on their mettle. Still he and his friends could not do all that was needed themselves, and they meant to make another application for help, whether they got refused or not.

The Rev. H. IERSON said Mr. Ellis seemed to approve of the refusal of the London Committee, and yet he was going to make another application. He could only say that if the Guildford people presented a good case it would sure to command the active sympathy of the committee, who were always guided by the merits of the cases brought under their notice. He had heard the report read with a good deal of interest. It showed, together with the spirit of the meeting, that there was something like a unanimous verdict of opinion as to the value of the work at Ashford. He attached great importance to the Chairman's remarks on the subject. Their Association had evidently counted the cost before they began the work there, and were prepared to wait for results.

They were not of those who enter upon a scheme one year and throw it aside the next. He did not believe in the rose-water statements which were sometimes made in annual reports. The one just read took a sensible view of things. There was nothing flashy about it, no pretension of brilliant success, but a feeling of cheerful yet cautious hopefulness; and this was what he liked to see. He was pleased with what was being done at Canterbury. The state of the congregation there was a representative case. This was not the only instance in which the steadfast few who valued Unitarian services had great difficulty in maintaining them, and he thought the young men of Manchester New College were deserving the highest commendation for the trouble they were taking to keep it up. It would be gratifying to the tutors to know that the services of the students are highly appreciated by the Canterbury people. He hoped more funds would be forthcoming for carrying on this good work, and perhaps the authorities of Manchester New College might be induced to help in supporting services which could not but prove of value also to the preachers themselves. In conclusion, he said he fully agreed with the framer of the report as to the value of Sunday schools. In his opinion they were most important auxiliaries in building up congregations.

The Rev. T. W. FRECKELTON also responded. As far as he understood the policy of the British and Foreign Association Committee, they were anxious, he said, to help those who wished to help themselves. They meant work, and were doing it. What they wanted was to go to the forefront, and Mr. Collyer had struck the right note in his sermon when he urged this upon them.

The Rev. H. S. SOLLY, of Padstow, proposed, and the Rev. W. A. CLARKE, of Guildford, seconded, a resolution expressive of the satisfaction felt by the Association with the work done by Mr. Moden at Ashford, to which the latter replied; and then the Rev. A. F. MACDONALD, of Lewes, moved a resolution indicating the high esteem in which the Association regard the services rendered to the cause of civil and religious liberty by the late Earl Russell, which was seconded by Mr. CLINTON, Chairman of the Aldershot School Board, who said that, judging from what was now taking place, our civil and religious liberties were likely to be curtailed. What we wanted was not merely civil and religious liberty, but civil and religious equality.

Mr. WARREN, of Brighton, moved the appointment of the committee for the ensuing year, and Mr. WOODS, of Horsham, proposed a hearty welcome to the visitors present. Mrs. SOULE, of the United States, responded to the latter, and spoke of the long distance she had come to encourage and help her co-religionists in Scotland. She was delighted to be at the meeting, where she had refreshed by the spiritual food they had afforded her.

Mr. BLESSLEY proposed, and the Rev. W. H. ELLIS seconded, a vote of thanks to the friends at Horsham for their kind and hearty reception. The Rev. T. W. SCOTT, the minister, replied in a brief and thoughtful speech, in which he eulogised the tact and power of the Secretary, Mr. Grant, for having succeeded in getting so good a man as Mr. Collyer to come among them.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, with a suitable response, brought to a close one of the happiest and most successful Unitarian meetings ever held in the South of England.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

LONDON.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER AT KENTISH TOWN.

ON Sunday last this church was crowded both morning and evening to hear the Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, and amply were all repaid by the sermons—full of words of wisdom, with here and there a pathetic anecdote or a touch of humour which tended to more deeply impress the minds of those who heard them. Both services were conducted in a truly devotional spirit, the singing being given with heartiness and force. The choir sang, with excellent taste, an anthem at each service—"O taste and see that the Lord is good," and "Hide thy face from my sins." Different parts of the church had been decorated with flowers and ears of corn, and collections were made in aid of the church funds. The text in the morning was Psalm cxxxi, 2—"My soul is even as a weaned child." From this exclamation of the Psalmist Mr. Collyer gave a sketch of David in his old age, thinking over the past; but now as the old man sits singing this psalm, all the troubles of his past life are forgotten, and he is peaceful and tranquil "as a weaned child." God weans us for what is higher and better, and this was just as true now as it was in David's time; all joy comes through sorrow. Some touching recollections of his own yearnings and longings for the old home in Yorkshire, when he first went to the far west, were introduced. In the evening the texts were Job x, 21—"Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death," and John xiv, 1, 2—"Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me." It would to many of us, he said, be a sore trouble to be out of the body and lose all the pleasures of this life; to the oldest of us life is very dear. "Life—a poor thing it may be; but mine own, I want to keep it. The animals go from the world without longings for the higher life; man's life is different. Have we not a right to demand another life? The thoughts of Jesus present a key to the problem; the truth in Christ ever the simplest and best. We believe in him not because he was God, but a man, like ourselves, thoroughly human, and entering into the joys and sorrows of every-day life. If we believe in him, then we know enough to keep us from trouble. We lose nothing if we are true, says Jesus, for we are transformed and transfigured." Each discourse was closed with a beautiful extempore prayer.

BELFAST UNITARIAN MISSIONARY MEETING.

THE annual sermons on behalf of this Association were preached on Sunday, August 11th, in the Church of the Second Congregation (Rev. J. C. Street's) Belfast, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A., of London. The devotional service was, in each case conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street. The sermons, which were characterised by vigour of thought, tenderness of expression, and clearness of reasoning were on "Seeking for and finding the Living God," and "The Lord's Controversy with His People." The preacher was listened to with the greatest attention by most interested audiences, and the collections amounted to nearly £42. Mr. Voysey's visit will long be remembered with great pleasure.

The report of the annual meeting came to hand too late for insertion this week. We are glad to note that Mr. Vere Foster has offered £400 to build new schools at Hopeton-street, and that the income of the society has been £314. 8s. 9d., and the expenditure £309. 17s. 4d., leaving in hand £4. 11s. 5d.

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

AINSWORTH.—On Sunday afternoon last, by special request, the Rev. Ephraim Turland delivered a lecture on "The Doctrine of the Incarnation," in review of a published sermon by the Rev. J. M. Stott, M.A., of Blackburn. There was a large congregation.

ARDWICK.—The Rev. E. C. Towne has resigned the pulpit at this place, and will terminate his ministry in three months.

BLACKPOOL.—On and after next Sunday, Mr. Hopps's new book of hymns, chants, and anthems will be used by the congregation in this town.

BANBRIDGE.—The children, teachers, and friends of the Sunday school held their annual excursion on Saturday, August 10th. At half-past twelve the young people assembled at the meeting-house, and after singing a hymn, and joining in a prayer offered by the Rev. F. McCammon, proceeded to the railway station en route for Mr. John Smyth's field, and there enjoyed themselves. About five o'clock the children were agreeably surprised at the sudden appearance of two beautiful balloons. Mr. D. M. William superintended the athletic sports. After tea, the Rev. F. McCammon proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Smyth for the use of the field, and the Rev. H. T. Basford asked the children to give a hearty "three times three," which was promptly responded to.

FLAGG, NEAR BUXTON.—On August 3rd a tea meeting was held at this place, when, notwithstanding the very stormy day, 90 persons were present. After tea a very excellent concert was given by the choir and friends from Friarage Chapel, Derby, which proved a complete success, the chapel being crowded by a delighted audience. The Flagg friends feel under great obligation to the Rev. C. D. Badland, Mr. Wiberley, and others, for the exertions they made to make the concert successful. Mr. Allen, a member of Flagg congregation, added to the evening's enjoyment by giving a solo on the violin with great skill. Great credit is due to the ladies of the congregation for the manner in which the tea was got up. Mr. Woollen, of Sheffield, was voted to the chair. There were present several gentlemen who had either helped at the Sunday services or contemplated doing so, and by most of whom short but very earnest and effective addresses were delivered—namely, Revs. R. E. Birks, C. D. Badland, M.A., A. M. Rodgers, Messrs. J. Green, G. H. Bassano, G. Rencastle, C. Wiberley, Luke Pollitt, and J. Rushworth. Rev. A. M. Creery and others were prevented from attending. On the following day anniversary sermons were preached by Mr. Woollen, when the weather was again most unpropitious. The attendance, however, in the afternoon was 45. The service was rendered attractive by the excellent singing of the Northampton choir, who had kindly given their services. In the evening a service of song was given, which consisted of selected readings from the Scriptures, and beautiful singing by the Northampton choir, illustrative of the birth, work, temptation, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The service was a repetition of what our Northampton friends had given in other places, and was very impressive. It was appreciated alike by the aged and the young. There were 60 persons present, exclusive of the choir. The collections amounted to over £2. The proceeds of the concert will be given to the chapel fund. On Monday there was a very pleasant picnic to Monsal Dale, friends from Great Hucklow joining.

KING'S LYNN.—On Sunday evening last the second annual flower service was held in the Free Christian Church. The Rev. Barnard Gisyby delivered a discourse on "The Æsthetic Culture of the Mind." The congregation was exceptionally large, and the floral offerings for the patients in the Lynn and West Norfolk Hospital both many and beautiful. Ferns and plants for decorative purposes were generously contributed by Messrs. Green, Barton, and A. P. Allen. This is the only service of the kind which is conducted in the town, and it will not be very surprising, considering surroundings, if it remains to us an everlasting religious monopoly. "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?"

LONDON: KENTISH TOWN.—A funeral service was held in the church on last Sunday afternoon, being in memory of three members of families connected with the school. The service was solemn, as befitted the occasion, with hymns and appropriate portions of the Scriptures. The address was given by the superintendent, who showed how we ought to place implicit trust and faith in our Father, who is all-loving, merciful, and tender in His dealings with us; and that of our present sorrow comes future joy; and counselling those present, both old and young, to copy the life and example of Jesus Christ in their own daily lives, and so become true children of God in all things. The service, which was about an hour in length, concluded with the playing on the organ of the "Dead March in Saul," while the scholars and friends quietly left the church.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—At the recent floral service, conducted by the Rev. J. J. Wright, in the afternoon a prominent feature was the distribution of certificates gained by successful competitors in the recent examination conducted by the North Midland Unitarian and Presbyterian Sunday-school Association. This school, as in former years, has again come off victoriously, being far in advance of any other school in the number of certificates gained in proportion to the number of pupils. The senior class (mixed), conducted by Miss A. E. Haddon, subject, "Lessons in hymns," gained 6 first and 4 second class certificates; only one failed. The first class boys, taught by Mr. J. Cooper, subject, "Astronomy," gained 4 first and 2 second class certificates; none failed. The second class boys, taught by Mr. F. Bowles, subject, "Life of Martin Luther," gained 4 first and 2 second class certificates; none failed. Third class boys, taught by Miss A. Riley, subject, "Life of Martin Luther," gained 5 second-class certificates, only one having failed. Fourth class girls, subject, "Lessons in Religion," conducted by Mr. S. Mayne, gained one first and one second class certificate, four having failed.—The congregation and friends held their annual picnic on Bank Holiday, in the grounds of Mr. Walker, Birstall Hall. The early portion of the day was spent in various ways according to the tastes of the visitors. Tea was prepared for about 150 under the welcome shadows of two magnificent old oaks. After tea, other amusements followed, and then the party gathered together under the before-mentioned trees, where a few words of thanks were spoken to Mr. and Mrs. Walker for their very great kindness in throwing open their beautiful estate. The Rev. J. J. Wright then informed all round that it was under the old oaks they were now standing that the Free Christian Church had been started.

LEWES.—On Tuesday, the 30th ult., Mr. J. Shelley, on behalf of the congregation worshipping at the Westgate Chapel, presented Miss A. Duplock, who has for several years kindly and gratuitously assisted at the organ in the above place of worship, with a handsome marble mantel clock and an illuminated address, expressing their heartfelt thanks and high appreciation of such services, and wishing her every happiness on her approaching marriage with Mr. W. B. Funnell, of The Retreat, Newick. The wedding took place on the 1st inst. in the chapel, in the presence of a very large assembly, the Rev. A. F. Macdonald, M.A., officiating. As the bride entered the chapel the hymn commencing "When on her Maker's bosom" was sung by the choir, and at the conclusion of the ceremony Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" was played. The chapel was decorated very tastefully with choice flowers and ferns.

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION. The pupils of the day and Sunday schools, with their teachers, numbering about 300, and accompanied by the members of the band, had their annual treat, through the kindness of friends of the Mission, on Friday, the 9th August, at Sefton Park. The weather was very favourable, and the party arrived in the park about two o'clock, conveyances having been provided for the younger children. The afternoon was spent pleasantly at football, cricket, dancing, racing, skipping, and various round games. A bountiful tea was provided. When the evening drew on the party collected together and sung several pieces. Each child, before leaving, received a bun.

NORWICH.—The Octagon choir and Sunday-school teachers, about sixty in number, had a delightful excursion to Wroxham on Tuesday week. The weather was rather showery, but a much heavier rainfall would have been required to damp the spirits of the party. Mr. Chamberlain, with characteristic liberality, placed not only his barn and grounds generally, but also his yacht, at the service of his neighbours. Nothing could have been more enjoyable than the sail to and upon the Broad, unless it were the walk to the station through the glorious avenue.

NEWRY.—The annual excursion of the Sunday school and Band of Hope in connection with the First Presbyterian Church, Needham Place, Newry, came off on Tuesday week. The Rev. J. A. Crozier, ever thoughtful for the children of his Sunday school, had a number of the younger ones placed on a car, which conveyed them from the railway station at Market Hill to Gosford Castle, and back again in the evening. After a pleasant walk through the grounds we reached the pretty spot just before the castle entrance—a rising ground, the scene of many a happy reunion. Mr. Crozier took the opportunity of saying a few words as to the happy circumstances under which they were assembled. During the day the gardens were visited by both old and young, and greatly admired. Before starting for home all the party were regaled with buns, lemonade, and sweetmilk, and a most enjoyable repast it was. Mr. Crozier then said a few words expressing thanks to Lord Gosford, to which Mr. Wann, his lordship's agent, responded, and stated that he would take the earliest opportunity of informing his lordship as to what had just taken place.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ARRIVAL OUT OF THE REV. J. H. SMITH.

To the Editors.—The Rev. J. H. Smith wrote July 7th from San Francisco:—"I sail to-morrow by the steamer City of New York." I see in to-day's paper the announcement that the City of New York, from San Francisco, arrived in Sydney, August 12th.—Yours truly, HENRY IERSON.
37, Norfolk-street, London, W.C.

REV. EBENEZER LATHAM, M.D.

To the Editors.—Let me rectify two mis-prints in my note of last week. At the end of first paragraph it should read: "from his name not occurring in Mr. Badland's list." At the end of second paragraph, the words from "contains" to "records" should be in inverted commas.

Let me rectify also an error of my own, kindly pointed out to me by Rev. C. W. Robberds. Instead of "Rev. William Turner, of Wakefield, who married the eldest daughter of Willetts," I ought to have written: "Rev. William Turner, of Wakefield, whose son, Rev. W. Turner, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, married as his second wife the eldest daughter of Willetts."

ALX. GORDON.

CHRISTIAN INTERCOURSE AT THE GRAVE SIDE.

To the Editors.—I send the following, thinking it will interest your readers if you deem it well to insert it in the Herald:—"On Wednesday the 7th inst., a late member of our Longton congregation was interred in the churchyard of St. John's. We were early at the church, and the Vicar, the Rev. A. S. Maclean, M.A., had not arrived. We took our seats underneath the west gallery, an extreme distance from the lectern. At the conclusion of the service, and while passing out into the churchyard, Mr. Maclean caught sight of me, and, shaking hands, said: "Mr. Williams, I am sorry I did not see you earlier, I should have been pleased for you to have taken part in the service with me; but you are at perfect liberty to conduct any service you like at the grave." I thanked him very sincerely, and, after the usual service at the grave, I gave out the hymn, "Abide with me." The vicar joined very heartily and devoutly in our singing.

Such incidents are greatly pleasing in the midst of the controversy concerning our national burial grounds, and they show us that there are in the church an ever-increasing number of men whose hearts are much broader than the ecclesiastical system under which they minister.—Yours very truly,
J. CLAYTON WILLIAMS.

DOING AND SAYING.

A monthly bicycling magazine has been published, with the Shaksperian motto, "Then may I set the world on wheels."

Lord Townshend is going to offer a prize of fifty guineas for the best essay on the injurious results arising from corporal punishment in schools.

It is reported that the Marquis of Bute has given £5,000 towards a fund for the erection of a Roman Catholic cathedral in Dundee, to commemorate the re-establishment of the bishopric of Dunkeld, which ceased about 292 years ago.

The Church Record hears that a body of clergy in the city of London are engaged in preparing a scheme for the demolition of all the City churches excepting twenty. The scheme was originated by some of the Fellows of Sion College. This is wholesale disestablishment.

The Coffee Public-house Association, London, offers a prize of £200 for an essay on the providing, on an adequate scale, of halls or other places of resort and recreation for the working classes, the arrangements to include the sale of refreshments, but not of intoxicating drinks.

A handsome marble tablet, surmounted by a large size medallion profile of the late Miss Mary Carpenter, has been fixed in the transept of Bristol Cathedral. The memorial bears an inscription recording Miss Carpenter's philanthropic labours in England and India.

The honorary degree of LL.D. of the Dublin University was on Tuesday conferred on a number of the leading members of the British Association, among them being Mr. Spottiswoode (president), Professor H. E. Roscoe, Professor A. W. Williamson, and Professor Huxley.

Dr. Monier Williams states that the population of India, according to the recent census, is 240,000,000. Of these as many as 185,000,000 are nominal adherents of Brahminism. Buddhists number some 3,000,000. Forty-one millions are Mohammedans, accept the Koran as their Bible, and the Sultan of Turkey as their ecclesiastical chief.

A number of persons connected with the "Church of England Working Men's Society," paid a visit to Mr. Toth at Croydon on Tuesday, to thank him for the noble battles he had fought against persecution and for conscience sake. He made a speech expressive of his gratitude in reply to the congratulations offered to him, but chiefly directed against the existence and operation of secret societies.

The Bishop of Cashel, speaking at his Diocesan Synod, gave his impressions of the Pan-Anglican Synod which he recently attended. They were not very favourable. He is not fascinated by Pan-Anglicanism, and thinks the appellation unsuitable and utterly barbarous. He did not think that in Ireland they would desire to be ranked as an "Anglican" communion. They were an independent church, and they rejoiced that their laws could be enacted only by the General Synod of the Church of Ireland.

The Queen suggests two subjects in which female instructors are wanted—swimming and gymnastic exercises. In these days, when the physical training of girls is beginning to receive the attention due to a subject so important, it is inevitable that these two classes of teachers will become a necessity before long. Nor are the qualifications difficult or impossible. A healthy body is the chief essential, and to this must be added those mental qualities with which every teacher should be endued, or have succeeded in enduing herself withal. Here is a suggestion for those who want "something to do," a place in the world where the labourer shall be found worthy of her hire.

The Bishop of Llandaff, in his recent triennial charge, referred to the ritualistic movement in the Church of England. He says he would not venture to assert that there had been a conspiracy in the Church of England to take them back to Rome, but that man must be blind indeed who did not know that such a conspiracy would be compatible, if not with the avowed principles, at least with the secret policy of the Church and Court of Rome in the 17th century. That the dissensions of the Church of England during the last few years had been fomented by the same secret agencies which were at work at that period he would not assert, but there were indications of similarity.

A meeting has recently been held at Marlborough House, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, with the view of advancing the science and art of music, and of founding a Royal and National College of Music. At present the Royal Academy of Music and the National Training School for Music have had no connection. It is proposed, with the assent of the managers of both these institutions, to consider the best means of bringing them into connection, so that they may co-operate in promoting higher education in the art of music and form the basis for a new college on a more extended and permanent footing than any existing institution. An executive committee, under the presidency of Prince Christian, has been appointed, and will confer with representatives of both these institutions.

The Spectator thinks that Lord Beaconsfield has made a good appointment to the vacant Deanery of Peterborough in the Rev. John James Stewart Perowne. Dr. Perowne is a considerable Hebrew scholar, one of the Company for the Revision of the Authorised Version of the Old Testament, has published his own translation of the Book of Psalms, and an elementary Arabic grammar. He also edited "The Literary and Theological Remains of Bishop Thirlwall," and has written a good deal on the criticism of the Bible. No doubt he will make an excellent Dean, and a Deanery will not interfere, as almost any bishopric would, with the prosecution of his studies as a scholar. The English Church has not now so many scholars that she can afford to sacrifice any of the few that she has to the laborious and somewhat too mechanical duties of the Episcopacy.

Methodism keeps a strict guard over its position, but do what it can the spirit of the Nineteenth Century finds its way within the lines. It seems that something like heresy on the subject of Future Punishment has been detected in the Fernley Lecture. The customary vote of thanks has been withheld, and the lecturer, the Rev. G. W. Olver, has declined to accept the honorarium provided by the Foundation. The case of Mr. Impey, an African missionary, and a minister of forty years' standing, has come to a more definite issue. Mr. Impey openly avowed his inability to hold the doctrine of eternal torment in the gross and literal sense in which, as he conceives, it is presented in the Methodist standards. He has accordingly been summoned home, has resigned, and has been "dropped" out of the ranks, without any recognition of his long and faithful service.

The collection of Assyrian antiquities obtained from the site of Nineveh by Mr. Rassam has arrived at the British Museum. It is gratifying to observe generally that the collection is well worthy of an archæologist who learned his first lessons in the practice of excavation under the training of Sir A. H. Layard. The explorations carried on by Mr. Rassam on the site of Nineveh proper—that is, the mounds of Koyunjik—have produced more than 1,400 fragments of cuneiform inscriptions, among which are many specimens of great value. There are, for instance, portions of the famous series conversant about the Assyrian legend of Creation. Mr. Rassam has discovered a vast temple with seats, altars, and all the arrangements of a sacrificial house, which, chronologically speaking, was contemporaneous with the temple of the Jewish King Solomon. Among the principal discoveries may be mentioned a unique monument, consisting of a bronze screen, with bas-reliefs representing the expedition of Assur-nazor-pal, B.C. 870, from his departure from his capital until his final sacrifices of victory at the termination of one of his great military expeditions. The monument commemorative of these events is more than twenty feet high, and will form one of the most imposing additions of recent years to the Mesopotamian antiquities of the British Museum.

At the Cambridge Higher Local Examinations there was this year an increase of 25 per cent in the number of candidates, who were, as usual, mostly women. More than three fourths of them were in the first, or literature and history group. Nearly one quarter of these failed in simple arithmetic, but only one per cent failed in English composition. One fourth of the distinctions awarded were gained by candidates who had attended lectures provided by the Cambridge Association. Either the religious knowledge group is not so attractive as formerly, or the examination does not suit the candidates; only two fifths entered for it this year, and two fifths of these failed. In the language group, French is still the favourite. Mathematics beyond arithmetic as yet commands very few candidates; only two (Cambridge students) gained a first class. The group including political economy, advanced history, and logic is more popular, as are also the science subjects. Geology and botany are preferred to zoology and chemistry. Henceforward there is to be a change in the examination, by which any of the groups can be taken at any time. The amount of literature and history required of candidates in order to pass in the first group is to be reduced. In science two new subjects will be added, physics and physiology. The scholarships offered in connection with the Cambridge Association for the Higher Education of Women will be increased in value by the aid of the Clothworkers' and Drapers' Companies. Mrs. Sidgwick, Hill Side, Chesterton Road, Cambridge, will give all information.

AMERICAN NOTES.

ACTS OF MUNIFICENCE.

THE Philadelphia correspondent of the Guardian says that while there is much in the political life of America to cause anxiety as to the future, it may well be questioned whether there is any real decline in public spirit. There never was a time when great offerings of money for educational or other good purposes were more frequent. In one sense there is almost an excess in this way, for colleges are needlessly multiplied; more good would perhaps result from increasing the endowment of existing institutions. But the wish is natural on the part of one who is devoting a great sum towards the furthering of education that he should direct its application. In the case of what is known as Lehigh University at Bethlehem, sixty miles from Philadelphia, the founder has been at the cost of all the buildings, and he has given a large sum towards the endowment of the institution—his offering from first to last having reached near a million of dollars. He requires that all the instruction given shall be free. The salaries of the president and the professors are paid by him, the yearly aggregate being from fifty to sixty thousand dollars. Another generous giver is just beginning the building of a college for girls, within a few miles of the same city. He has set apart half a million dollars as an endowment for the college. He provides the land, and directs the construction of the college buildings, and all are paid for by him without trenching on the endowment. In all the large cities there are examples of wise generosity of this kind in addition to the bequests for purposes of religion or charity. In New York it is understood that a single family has made the tender of $200,000 towards the building of a cathedral, and that two sums of $25,000 each are offered for the same object. A million of dollars will be required for this purpose, and it is said to be not unlikely that the whole will be forthcoming without much delay.

The Oakland Times says the "Indian must go," but where? That is the question.

An Evangelical preacher, not a hundred miles from St. Louis, said he now had his third congregation in the last six years. Suffering himself to be "intellectually radical," he frightened away the first congregation. Endeavouring to be "ecclesiastically conservative," he soon tired out and disappointed the second congregation. His third congregation is by far the best paying, and is based on pure non-committalism. He no longer emphasises theological belief or ecclesiastical usage; but archly enjoins that the people shall come to church and pay the pew-rents.

The Rev. E. Hale has a good word to say in the Christian Register for Antioch College as a school for educating girls in the higher branches, and he quotes a letter of the Rev. Brooke Herford, who has sent two daughters and a son there, in which he states that his children have been doing "good work" at the college, and have come back with an enthusiasm for Antioch. Any misgivings he and Mrs. Herford had as to the advisability of educating young men and women together in college life has been quite dissipated. As to expense the cost had been rather less than $250 a year each.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

By the new Scotch Education Act, after the first of day of January next, it will be illegal, and a punishable offence, for any person to take into his employment any child between ten and fourteen who has not obtained a certificate of ability to read, write, and cast accounts, or who is not employed under a half-time Act. The slight exemptions permitted will not interfere with the operation of this as the general law of the land. The Act also puts restrictions on the casual employment of children on the streets after dark, which will be effective in putting an end to a crying evil. The Act, however, does nothing to strengthen the hands of School Boards in dealing with the cases of parents who persistently neglect the schooling of their children, nor does it give the Boards power to establish day industrial or feeding schools—provisions which the English Act contains.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Trial of Theism, Accused of Obstructing Secular Life. By George Jacob Holyoake. London: Trübner.

THIS is a new and revised edition of a work issued twenty years ago by the ablest apostle of secularism in England. Our main objection to the book is that it examines a Theism which never deserved such an honour; and that condemning this travesty it appears equally to condemn higher forms with which the author has some degree of sympathy. With the Theist of past years, and of a certain school, who described the Deity in obscure, dignified language, yet much to the same purport as the coloured preacher who averred—"I can see de Lord dis minute. I can see him step to the edge ob de cloud, tip one ear up and the odder down, to listen to de cries of his children," Mr. Holyoake has a just quarrel. The Theism which is on its trial before him is of the ancient and omniscient persuasion, a Theism which professes to know all about God, and which treats him as familiarly as if he were a "man in the next street."

But all that is changed. The cultured Theism of to-day, if it speculates as much as formerly affirms a great deal less, and its affirmations are such as secularists need not dispute, and such as they certainly cannot disprove. Had it been this purer Theism which was on its trial before Mr. Holyoake, in all probability his verdict would have been different. Indeed, he makes the confession, "Had I been taught to conceive of Deity as either of these (Mazzini and Prof. Newman) conceives of him, I think it likely I should never have ceased to hold Theism as true, and if it were not misleading to one's self to covet opinion, I could even wish to be able to share their conviction."

Though ceasing to be a Theist Mr. Holyoake did not become an Atheist in the ordinary acceptance of the term. He makes a distinction between Atheism and Netheism. Netheism is the denial of God, Atheism does not deny God. In that sense he is an Atheist. To prevent misunderstanding Mr. Holyoake styles himself a Cosmist, whose contention amounts to this, that the evidence for the existence of the Deity is insufficient to warrant his belief. Towards a possible God he maintains a position of reverent neutrality, with, however, a marked inclination to the opinions that "the God whom we seek is the Nature which we know." In the philosophy of Cosmism the exhaustive ignorance, the extensive denials, and the surly insolence of Atheism are wholly absent. In the beautiful order of the Great All the Cosmist seeks and finds his highest gratification. He worships the Majestic Universe, whose sublime forms ever captivate his affections anew, and stimulate an insatiable curiosity. With the Nature Worshipers of Greece and India he has sympathies to some extent, since he sees in them men and women who worshipped realities, and no pale dreams. He thinks Nature too glorious to be degraded to a secondary rank, and every way worthy of holding the first place in man's regard. The knowledge which man may attain by a careful study of its laws will daily prove his salvation. Science is the Providence of man. Thus Nature, the only thing we know, is to take the place of God, and the study of law to take the place of worship.

Cosmism, it will be seen, is not unlike Comptism; it is a religion of humanity—a positive religion. Its aims, though purely secular, are truly magnificent. They are, in the words of Mazzini, "Progressive improvement, the overthrow of all idolatries, sham lies, and conventionalities. We want man to be not the poor, passive, cowardly phantasmagoric unreality of the actual time, thinking in one way and acting in another, carrying empty popish or thirty-nine article formularies on his breast and none within. We would make man a fragment of the living truth, the bold seeker of things to come; the gentle, mild, loving, yet firm, uncompromising inexorable Apostle of all that is just and heroic." Cosmism has thus, with a great spirit, set for itself a high ideal. The odd thing about this new position, however, is that it is as old as the hills. It is eminently Theistic. Large-minded Theists from the earliest times (all save Socrates, who condemned men for studying astronomy, the oldest of the sciences, and expressed a contempt for physics generally) have entered deeply into the study of the laws of nature, and it is on record that "Nature never did betray the heart that loved her." These Theists have felt with Mr. Holyoake that salvation of a material kind is to be found in an extensive observation of facts, and a patient deduction of laws. "For ourselves, we will not yield to the Cosmist in our appreciation of the unveiled splendours of the universe in our sense of its sublimity, its awfulness; its capacity to instruct and to elevate. We see in nature all which he sees, and a significance which he does not discern. Nor will we yield him the palm for having studied nature to better purpose than ourselves. It cannot be disputed that in all lands and times Theists have shown themselves in the foremost ranks of inquirers into the secrets of nature; nor will it be denied that the great majority of valuable discoveries have been made by Theists.

Of course, Mr. Holyoake knows all this better than we can tell him. He must, then, know that on the temporal stage Cosmists and Theists are practically one—their aims the same, their methods the same, their hopes the same. Why, then, does he form another camp, and fight for the same cause with another battle-cry? A Cosmism that studies the universe in order to find balm for the wounds of mankind, and that does not deny the existence of God, is not far from the Theism which equally desires to persuade Nature from her taciturnity that she may give gifts to men, and which does not pretend to define the being of God. Between a Cosmist like Mr. Holyoake, who affirms, "I believe in Light, and Life, and Law, and Love," who quotes with evident approval and sympathy the splendid prayer, "Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom," and the Theist who affirms that the Universal Spirit may be felt by a pure heart in duty, beauty, goodness, holiness, truth, there cannot, one would think, be any radical difference. In the Palazzo Pitti, at Florence, Macaulay saw a painting by Raphael from Ezekiel, which was so fine that it almost reconciled him to seeing God the Father on canvas. Is there nothing in the palace of Nature, nothing in the beautiful Cosmos, nothing in duty and self-sacrifice, which may make the Cosmist feel that God is a glorious fact? Surely that subject is not so low that it cannot be elevated and transfigured by the master himself.

The Trial of Theism is very readable. It is always thoughtful, and the thought artistically expressed—perhaps there is too much of art—while sometimes it rises into real eloquence. The chapter entitled "Reasoning on Death," is not only the best in the book, but is the best writing we have ever seen on the subject. Its aim is to show that virtue is the only preparation for death, and that a good man, whatever his religious opinions, need not fear to die. The chapter is aptly closed with a poetical quotation, in which, however, Mr. Holyoake has seen fit to make a singular omission, which robs the lines of their peculiar consoling power. We give the quotation, italicising the words that have been omitted—

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take His chamber in the silent halls of death
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

It is not quite fair to Bryant this dropping out the two hemistichs which contain the most characteristic thought in the lines. The passage occurs in the "Thanatopsis."

In the chapter on Unitarian Criticism of Secular Principles, Mr. Holyoake alleges that Unitarianism makes no progress. It has, he says, retrograded since the days of Priestley and Belsham; and has lost the political vitality it once possessed. Now we cannot admit these charges, because they are not true. There are men among us now who, when impartial history shall have given its verdict, will stand as well before the world as any that are gone; whose influence for good we doubt not will be as great and as enduring. As for what Mr. Holyoake may be supposed to mean by going back in theology, we fancy some of our friends would only too sadly assure him that he is labouring under a gigantic mistake; that, in fact, the left wing of Unitarianism is going straight to, Heidelberg! while the whole body is moving slowly towards the flats of Dutch Rationalism! Frankly, Mr. Holyoake's description of Unitarians is behind the time, if it ever was altogether fair. This part of the work ought certainly to have been re-written. Our feeling in regard to the whole of it is, that it stands in need of revision from a more recent point of view than that which the writer occupied twenty years ago. An added chapter, at least, presenting Mr. Holyoake's estimate of the changes which those twenty years have seen, would be received as the most interesting and instructive contribution his pen could furnish.

HULL.—The ancient chapel in Bowl Alley Lane was unwontedly gay last Sunday, a scholars' service being made the occasion for floral decoration. Such services have heretofore been held in the schoolroom, so it was a bold venture of the minister, Mr. Dixon, to suggest the idea of invading the correct, time-honoured respectability of the chapel with flower-wreaths, garlands, and bouquets. If any of the old worshippers had qualms on the matter they heroically kept them under, and the general expression was that "the old place had never before looked so nice." The children sang several of their special hymns very well, and the minister gave them a very telling discourse from the text—"In the morning sow thy seed," introducing a number of high examples, beginning with Samuel and Jesus from the old records, and ending with Hugh Miller, David Livingstone, and Robert Collyer from our modern English life.

TRUTH AND DUTY.

REV. WILLIAM BENNETT.

THINK the truth, ay, think it out,
 Fear not any harm will follow;
 Evil to us can but come
 From crushed thoughts, and judgments hollow:
 If to self we be not true,
 How can we be true to others?
 The man dishonest to himself
 Must needs be false unto his brothers.

Speak the truth, ay, speak it out,
 He's a coward who conceals it;
 If a treasure has been found
 He's the good man who reveals it:
 Misers, mean, may hoard their gold,
 Selfish slaves may hide their treasure,
 But the true man ever finds
 Sharing good the richest pleasure.

Live the truth, ay, live it out,
 Doing is the highest duty;
 Thoughts and words are but the means,
 Work is the end—service true beauty:
 Living out our noblest thought,
 Acting out the truth we've spoken,
 Is of thought and word the test—
 Of high holiness the token.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 23, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE ATTITUDE OF RECEPTIVENESS.

OUR brethren in America have lately been much interested in a sermon addressed to Unitarians by an orthodox minister on the subject of "Man's Proper Attitude toward the Doctrines of the New Testament." What the preacher (Dr. WEBB) pleaded for was a "recipient" attitude. Who are we that we should presume to question the Doctrines of the Trinity, The Atonement and Endless Punishment? These are revealed in the Bible. Our part is to receive them in the attitude of adoring faith. Dr. WEBB made great use of BUTLER'S Analogy, which shows, in the Baconian spirit, that we must bow to facts; it is no part of our business to say what facts ought to be.

Those who conscientiously and intelligently fall in with Dr. WEBB'S argument, should be delighted with an article in the current number of the Contemporary Review from the pen of Abbé Martin. The Abbé asks nothing more than a recipient attitude. He congratulates his co-religionists on the passing away of prejudices from the English mind (i.e. of course, the prejudice in favour of inquiry and criticism), while facts are regarded with a "calmer and therefore a clearer eye." The facts thus calmly regarded are, indeed, the facts of Roman Catholicism—its assertions, its numbers, its influence. But Dr. WEBB'S facts are included in these; so there need be no difficulty in accepting them together. The Trinity, the Atonement, Eternal Punishment, the Pope, the Confessional—there they are! A mind wisely and modestly receptive will find its reward in bending before these truths; while the spirit that denies hath torment, here and hereafter!

We might reply to Dr. WEBB and Abbé MARTIN that they cannot surely expect more of us than people do from the children whom they treat in the same way. "Shut your eyes and open your mouth," is a pleasant invitation which we have known of old; but if our infantine trust and simplicity were treated to a stick of bitter aloes we did not scruple to spit it out and even to assail the wisacre who cheated us, though his beard were as long as pantaloons'.

Not all facts are to be put up with. And there is a kind of fact peculiarly irritating and disagreeable to the intellectual palate, namely, the fact of assertions being forced upon us, which do not stand inquiry. Dr. WEBB says that the Trinity is a Fact revealed in the Bible. The fact is, so far as we see—and we are conscious of no desire but a very sincere one to see what is—that the Trinity is not revealed in the Bible. Probably Abbé MARTIN himself would tell Dr. WEBB so, and assure him that the Doctrine required the defining power of the Church to make it out. The Abbé has his great Fact in the POPE'S being Vicar of CHRIST. Dr. WEBB will, on his part, call this the Abbé's vain assertion; albeit there is Scripture for the text emblazoned round the Dome of St. Peter's—"On this rock will I build." The fact which we see here is that, on PETER'S personal work a very small community of (heretical) Christians was founded, which lasted only for a generation or two; and that whatever Apostolic foundation there may have been for the Western Church was laid in one who was really anti-Pope to PETER, namely, the Apostle PAUL.

But the fact, obvious above all facts, in this mode of treating religious questions is, that it is an attempt to hush them up. That it has been, and continues to be, so successful arises simply from the other fact, that most people like to have such questions hushed up. They are quite content to do as Abbé MARTIN desires—take the Church and its doctrine as a whole without inquiring too curiously into particulars. But, be it remembered, there is always a point beyond which such receptiveness fails. The Abbé has sugared his pill very skilfully. The British reader will rejoice to be told that his ideas are "expanding," his prejudices "softening, melting away, vanishing," and that he is regarding facts (those of the Roman Catholic persuasion) with a "calmer and a clearer eye." But the awkward British reader, Philistine as he is, has some prejudices left, to which the nineteenth century gives more and more encouragement. Along with the reception of other Roman Catholic mysteries there has to be included such, for example, as the miracle of the Sacred Heart. Abbé MARTIN will protest, no doubt, that this is one of those innumerable historical and theological points, the inquiry into which is "not merely long, but at each step beset with difficulty and the danger of mistake." Brave words! But the British Philistine is not afraid of "difficulties and dangers," although he is too often indisposed to trouble himself about things that do not affect him personally and physically. In the matter of the Sacred Heart and the vision of S. MARY ALACOQUE, he finds a fact that is for him "a chiel that wunna' ding;" the fact, namely, that he must believe it all if he is to be a Catholic. Now we are quite sure that this is a thing which will prove too much for him. Some gentle natures, not of Philistia, but gracious and receptive, may half-shut their eyes, and find a dreamy satisfaction in the shimmering prospect which a half-shut eye creates. The vision of the Sacred Heart so looked at is, conceivably, pathetic. But if the learned Abbé would see how it is regarded by people with their eyes open, let him take the following from the pen of an accomplished writer, who expresses very exactly the view taken by modern thinkers, who look upon the alleged miracle with all due reverence for facts physical and spiritual:—

That men and women should be gravely discussing, in this nineteenth century, the objective reality of what the poor patient (St. Mary Alacoque), probably cataleptic, did or did not dream, that her ecstasies, her visions, should be otherwise interesting than as a physiological psychological problem is sufficiently curious; but when the particular revelation in question is considered—one where the grossly material imagination of the seventeenth century has transfigured the beautiful ideas of the renovation of the heart, the change of affections, the growth of a new sense towards God ("Create in me a new heart, renew a right spirit within me") into a very disgusting physical miracle of the Saviour appearing in person, opening his side, and transferring the flesh and blood organ itself to the body of the poor visionary—the extraordinary absence of taste, and of the sense of decorum or of rational devotion, in thus reviving as a subject of adoration a story only fit for the very twilight of belief, is still more remarkable.*

An educated Roman Catholic would probably save himself from the difficulties of the case by considering that he was not in the least bound to feel personally and individually convinced that the poor girl had undergone any physical change in the cardiac region. He is simply bound to accept, with or without personal conviction, any statement which has been made upon authority. Now the Protestant utterly shrinks from such a state of mind. To him it is uncanny. Abbé MARTIN may well say that those educated in Protestantism have a host of things "to learn and unlearn," that "their intellectual and moral nature needs to be recast in a new mould" before they can be good Catholics. We know not how far the Ritualists, with whom his argument immediately lies, are prepared for the change, but for Englishmen generally we can but pray—From such a transmigration to the land of glamour, the Good Lord deliver us!

Dr. WEBB'S communion takes up a position of finality a good deal more modern than the Roman Catholic one. Much of the orthodox Protestant system, however, is fast growing antiquated, and, even to passive and constitutionally recipient minds, not easily credible. Dr. WEBB'S own "Atonement" bears traces of a compromise with modern ideas, and his suffrage in favour of Eternal Punishment is but one vote on a question which is now well opened up in all the Protestant churches, and which he cannot hope to close with his best argument for Authority.

In fine, all reverence is good, and we shall all agree that in reverence for facts lies the way to truth. But receptiveness is quite a different thing. To our mind it suggests as nearly as possible the opposite of reverence. It is the caricature of reverence. It is the helpless victim of sham facts. We may leave it to Dr. WEBB and Abbé MARTIN to settle, if they can upon their common principle, which has the right of it in each of the many points of difference between them. When receptiveness fails them, we only hope they will try what reverence can do—respect for what can be determined by fair and patient inquiry into the facts which are the sure revelation of the Living God.

UNITARIANISM AT MILAN.

In addition to the sympathy given to Professor BRACCIFORTI by the Unitarians of England, we find from the August number of the Unitarian Review that our American friends have recently sent to him a sum of money, to assist him in his work. It appears, however, that before the money reached him, Professor BRACCIFORTI was compelled to give up the use of the hall in which he has hitherto preached. He was not cast down at this, but fortunately met with a kind directress of a Kindergarten, who generously granted to him her room. We would bespeak for Professor

* From a paper on Dreams, Visions, and Ecstasies in St. Paul's Magazine for January, 1874.

BRACCIFORTI something more than sympathy from our English Unitarians; and to show them how they can help him, we gladly reprint the following letter:—

Milan, 3 Via Fieno, June 3, 1878.

Dear Friend,—I have received the money ($54 of your currency) which you and my other American friends have generously contributed towards the carrying out of my religious work in Milan. I am deeply thankful to you all, and see in your liberal contribution, amidst so many nearer claims on your Christian sympathy, an additional proof that God will have me continue in my efforts, however inconsiderable their results may at times appear to myself.

I am now preaching every Sunday in a kindergarten, the use of which has been generously granted me by the directress, who occasionally has availed herself of the English lessons which I gave in Via Durini, and continue to give in her kindergarten freely to all who choose to attend, on every Sunday morning, from ten to eleven, when the service begins. This kindergarten is in Via Nexino, No 3.

She attended some of the services (two I think) and expressed sympathy with our Unitarian views. But, alas! the priests are so much alarmed, they consider my preaching the worst of all! I received of late an anonymous letter, ending with the words "Scelbrato, scelbrato, scelbrato!" (You villain, villain, villain!) The fact is that the audience is rather increasing, and most people listen from beginning to end,—even such as come only out of curiosity; and then even very intelligent-looking, well-dressed persons come up to me, when the service is over, and shake hands, and heartily approve of what they have heard. Alas! most of them add that they are very busy and cannot attend regularly.

Public opinion seems to be very favourable. Most newspapers announce the subject of my sermons from week to week. They have now been showing me this particular regard for several years. I call it "particular regard," as I don't see that the preaching of other evangelicals is announced from week to week.

Now, reverting to the good directress, who has to struggle very hard in order to prevent the priests from prevailing upon the parents to take away the children from her kindergarten, to punish her for the benevolence she has set the example of extending to such an obnoxious heretic as myself,—don't you think that a little evidence of approbation, in the form of a small present of coloured plates representing animals, birds, flowers, or other instructive subjects, might eventually do much good? Might I not try to make friends of the parents and children of the kindergarten by giving the latter a little explanation of such plates, especially if, beside such plates, you would send me such elementary works as are used most successfully in America? The subject of religion, undogmatic, unsectarian, truly catholic, is so easily, so naturally handled, while talking of God's universal revelation in Nature!

Accept my warmest thanks, dear friends, for the encouragement you have been instrumental in holding out to me. In the but too little sympathy that hitherto I have been able to raise with what is foremost in my thoughts and feelings, it is great comfort to know that even beyond the Atlantic there are already noble-minded men and women, to whom I should have otherwise remained a stranger, that have become to me brother, sister, and mother.

With warmest regards, very thankfully yours,
FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTI.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY!

PREACHING in Paisley at the induction service of the Rev. A. F. FRASER, the successor to the Rev. DAVID WATSON, of "heretical" fame, the Rev. Dr. DONALD MACLEOD, editor of Good Words, delivered an eloquent and thoroughly enlightened discourse on the every-day life of a Christian. In the course of his remarks he pointed out that they should bring their energies to bear on the drunkenness, the immortality, the miserable dwellings and the miserable lives which in every town and part of the country are a disgrace to civilisation. The sin of all the churches—was the looking too much to their own crotchets, while terrible sins had been allowed to grow unchecked. They kept their best ministrations for those who needed them the least. Surely they require the united abilities, the force, the thought, and the consideration of the Christian Church, surely they required a higher enthusiasm than party zeal to be representatives of Jesus Christ on earth, for Jesus Christ had indicated the kind of victory which he would like the Church to win—"To him that overcometh will I give to sit on my throne, even as I also overcame." The object of Christ was not to propagate some pet doctrine or some especially definite ecclesiastical system, but his contest was with the sorrows and evils of the world. His struggles were against the woes, sins, and ecclesiastical divisions which were then the curse of the world. He came to oppose the sin of hatred to men, and not men themselves. But the whole ecclesiastical history of our country showed that people's actions had been beside the solution of the question for which the Christian Church existed on earth. Referring to the luxurious piety of women and men, who indulged in "goody, goody" literature, the preacher said that if they tried every day life by the standard of the Christian spirit, the contrast that was frequently represented was remarkable. The people were often found captious in their tempers, disagreeable, almost impossible companions, and harsh and exacting towards their inferiors. That was not Christianity. Another's religion consisted in attending regularly to forms; he believed in the atonement, he took a lively interest in sermons, in church questions, and other such subjects; but taking him on the week day instead of the Sunday, it would be difficult to say whether he was a worshipper of God or of Mammon. That was not Christianity. Another man delights in speculative opinion, in questions suggested by the reason of faith and the relationship of science with revelation. Without multiplying instances, it would be foolish to deny that each of these aspects is not without religion—the religion of feeling, or the works of Christian evidence in criticism. Nevertheless, the true conflict of the Christian soldier, that victory which is recognised and crowned by Jesus Christ, belongs to a different field and another warfare from these. In the personal growth and conduct of a Christ-like spirit, the real conquests of the Christians are won—to overcome our selfishness, our sloth, our greed, our vanity—and no amount of pious feeling, no sentiments of assurance of any kind, no degree of thoughtfulness or our creed could afford a sufficient substitute for the one thing needful. "Character" is the grand demand of the Gospel. So when it is asked—What are we to overcome in order to obtain the promise of the Lord? the answer to the individual is very much the same as to the Church. It is our own evil. Everyday life and your own fireside and your business will afford ample scope for a glorious struggle and a noble victory. We should discover in the difficulty of dealing with the details of everyday life in a really generous, considerate, and Christian spirit, how many a man is full of religion outside. What had they overcome in their habits, say, within the last six weeks? What evil had they crucified? Mere respectability was often the rock on which men made shipwreck of their soul; but to be respectable was generally a synonym for being comfortable. Let them take care of putting a cross issue to themselves. If they were to overcome and be set down with Christ on his throne, it could only be by fighting Christ's battle, by sharing Christ's character, by taking up the yoke and bearing it after him.

BELFAST.—The members of the congregation of the Second Church (Rev. J. C. Street's) were delighted on Sunday last by a visit from the Rev. E. B. Willson, of Salem, Massachusetts, who preached a most interesting and encouraging sermon on "Faith." It was a great pleasure to the pastor and members of the congregation to welcome Mr. Willson. He returns to the United States in a few days, and will carry away many pleasant recollections of his visit to Great Britain and Ireland.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

RELATION OF THE BAND OF HOPE TO SUNDAY SCHOOL AND CHURCH.

[FROM a paper read before the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union, by Mr. DAVID THOMPSON.]

The school and church aim at the cultivation of a holy human character. Virtues and truths are inculcated. Personal integrity and self-denial are cardinal elements of morality in the religion of Jesus. The scholars look to us, their teachers, for example; our words are the fountains at which their spirits drink, and our lives models to which they strive to conform their own. Now, shall we fail in the duty thus laid upon us, and not rather, even at the sacrifice of small gratifications, try to use every means of good influence over them?

The Band of Hope is one of these means. We do not place it in the stead of religion, nor is it the panacea for all the ills which flesh is heir to. It chiefly aims at emphasising one branch—the necessity of self-denial, and the sin of causing the weak to stumble through another's example. "Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." And again, "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." The Band of Hope takes this high ground—the doctrine of self-denial—and says, on account of the evil wrought, and the good hindered, abstain. It is a voice crying in the wilderness, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God." Many weeds spring up which have to be uprooted, and how long do pieces of living root remain! "As is the gardener, such is the garden." Sunday schools aim at preventing ill-weeds growing up. The Church, when true to her mission, discourages all latent evil. The Band of Hope undertakes to keep the ground clear of the very rankest of weeds. Thus Band of Hope, Sunday school, and Church, work toward the same ends.

As a proof that the Band of Hope works towards Church ends, allow me to quote the following, which I commend to the consideration of every Sunday-school teacher. The statistics are from a valuable paper by Mr. Isaac Phillips, read at a conference of the Bradford Sunday School Union, November 7th, 1876, and embrace returns from Sunday schools in that borough:—

SCHOOLS WITH NO BAND OF HOPE.

Year.	No. of Schools.	No. of Scholars.	Joined the Church.	Per 1000.
1871	17	4976	21	4¼
1872	16	4524	36	8¼
1873	20	5422	68	12¾
1874	21	5678	129	23¼
1875	22	5999	94	15¾
1876	22	6178	140	22¾
			32777	488

Or an average per annum of 14¾.

SCHOOLS WITH BANDS OF HOPE.

Year.	No. of Schools.	No. of Scholars.	Joined the Church.	Per 1000.
1871	18	6529	115	17¾
1872	21	7857	135	17¼
1873	20	7425	198	26¾
1874	19	7112	229	32¼
1875	16	6047	198	32¾
1876	17	6420	327	51
			41390	1202

Or an average per annum of 29.

It will be seen that there has been no exceptional year when the schools having Bands of Hope have not shown considerably greater results than the schools having none, and that the average has been about double. Mr. Phillips further remarks that "in the schools having Bands of Hope the greater number proportionately of the scholars are from that section." Some years ago he found, "from the use of the Church book, that in the schools where he laboured in seven years 137 scholars joined the church. The scholars were about equally divided between those who abstained and those who did not, the latter having the preponderance a little. Of the 137 who became members of the church, 106 were from the Band of Hope section, leaving 31 from an equal number who were not guarded by abstinence principles." Another fact brought out by Mr. Phillips's figures is that Bands of Hope attract larger numbers of scholars to schools.

In many places, as at Bradford, the relation of the Band of Hope and the school is such that Sunday schools are considered incomplete without a Band of Hope. Even in Manchester and Salford the 250 societies working in this movement are chiefly affiliated with the Sunday school, or held in some building where religious worship is performed.

That a close relation should subsist between the school and the children's temperance union, was never more strongly pleaded than in the utterance of the Right Hon. J. Bright, M.P., on Good Friday last. "No one," he said, "will deny, I think, that the cause of temperance owes much to Sunday schools. I think the cause of temperance is advancing in this country, although intemperance prevails to so great an extent. But if it owes much to Sunday schools it asks even more for the future. The children ought to be taught that exhibitions of excess are not exhibitions which should cause so much laughter as sorrow; and they should be taught also that which I should say, perhaps, some millions of our countrymen have discovered for themselves, that there is nothing but an increased safety and increased profit in an entire abstinence from the consumption of articles which, if taken freely, lead inevitably to intoxication. If the children whom you teach can read well, and think well; if they are reared to generous, and kindly, and merciful sentiments, you will find that even in our public affairs, as citizens of a great country, your efforts, as teachers in Sunday schools, will guide them into the highest duties of citizenship."

Sir Charles Reed, also, speaking at the annual meeting of the Sunday School Union, in Exeter Hall, London, asked the question—"How should they better meet the curse of intemperance than by teaching children in the Sunday-school Bands of Hope the folly and wickedness of drunkenness?" It is gratifying to be able to record that temperance is being now taught in Board schools; and in the London School Board books due place is given to this subject, which is certainly a step in the right direction.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

"HAPPY FIELDS OF SUMMER."

Happy fields of summer, all your airy grasses
Whispering and bowing when the west wind passes,
Happy lark and nestling, hid beneath the mowing,
Root sweet music in you, to the white clouds growing!

Happy fields of summer, softly billowed over
With the feathery red-top and the rosy clover,
Happy little children seek your shady places,
Lark-songs in their bosoms, sunshine on their faces!

Happy little children, skies are bright above you,
Trees bend down to kiss you, breeze and blossom love you;

And we bless you, playing in the field-paths mazy,
Swinging with the harebell, dancing with the daisy!

Happy fields of summer, touched with deeper beauty
As your tall grain ripens, tell the children duty
Is as sweet as pleasure; tell them both are blended
In the best life-story, well begun and ended!

—Lucy Larcom, in St. Nicholas.

GOD'S COFFER:

A SHORT SERMON FOR MERCHANTS.

THERE was once a respectable wealthy man, whose name was Benedict—that means "blessed." And he had a good right to bear such a name; for God had blessed him richly with all good things, and all who knew him blessed him, too; and he always sought to make others happy—the stranger as well as the neighbour—particularly the poor and needy. But he did it in this way. When he had passed a joyous day with his friends, he would go into his chamber, and think:—"There are many who have not had such a day of enjoyment. How would it have been if I had invited as many more guests?" Then he would lay by of his money as much as the feast had cost him, in a chest, which he called God's Coffers. In the same way, if he heard that there had been a fire anywhere, he would give largely for the relief of the unhappy sufferers; and then he would behold his own house, and go into his own chamber, and think, "All here is safe and unhurt," and immediately he would lay up some in God's Coffers. Whenever he heard of any destruction of property from thunder or hail, or drought, or other mischances, he would lay up gold on account of it in God's Coffers. Also, if he had occasion to buy wine, or costly furniture, he would purchase it but moderately, only to enable him the better to entertain his friends; and then go into his chamber and say, "So much more mightest thou have bought and have enriched thy stores," and lay up the value in God's Coffers. Besides which, he would willingly give of his best wine if a sick person needed it, and as he lay on his dying bed and death was approaching, the poor, the widows, and orphans lamented and wept, and said, "Who will take pity on us when Benedict is taken from us? As long as he lived we wanted for nothing; but what will now become of us?" But he said, "A good householder takes care that when he is away, his children should not want. Take God's Coffers, with all that is in it. It belongs to the poor, the widows, and the orphans; divide it, and use it well and wisely." And so God's Coffers has remained for hundreds of years, to the comfort of the needy, and the man is remembered with grateful blessings.—From the German of Krummacher.

DUNDEE: THE REV. GEO. GILFILLAN.

ON Saturday last the interment of Mr. Gilfillan took place in Dundee cemetery, and it was estimated that 1,100 persons formed the procession. On the following day many sermons were preached in the district bearing on Mr. Gilfillan's death, and the Rev. Henry Williamson at the close of a sermon on "Immortality" made the following remarks:—"I was led to fix upon the theme of Immortality for my lecture to-night by the announcement of the sudden death of one of the most eminent of the preachers of the Christian Church. There are many reasons why the cessation of the active life and the personal power and influence of a man consecrated to the work of Christ should occupy our serious attention, but in the case of Mr. Gilfillan peculiar interest must be felt. He stood forth as the interpreter of the new thought which has been moving in the minds and affecting the hearts of Scottish people. For generations, under, at times, the impulse of devout gratitude, and then of bitter persecution, the professed Christians of this country have satisfied themselves with the dogmatic interpretations of John Calvin, and a few have ventured to ask—"Must it be Calvin, and not Christ?" Our departed townsman answered this question by claiming the right, and asserting it, of taking the Gospel from the fountain-head, though Presbyteries and Synods should deny him the right. No one, perhaps, has studied the reported sayings of Mr. Gilfillan on the subject of theological reformation more earnestly for the past twelve years than I. Certainly he has made it more easy for every other reformer. Others may well remember him for qualities which he possessed in addition to those which made his life-work of interest to us. At this time we may call to mind all that he did that was helpful to the kingdom of heaven. Had he been free from the trammels of the ecclesiastical system into which he was born, and for which he had evidently a strong personal affection, he would doubtless have left behind him a school, a party—something which would carry on the work. Instead of this he has leavened the churches around his own. He denied the doctrine of infant damnation in plain language. He repudiated the extreme Calvinistic doctrine of election and reprobation. He stood forth to claim charity for poor, misguided, yet grand-souled Robert Burns. He did not shrink from pleading for the Cupar Angus heretics, and we will not forget that he mentioned Channing and Martineau with respect. He is gone, in one sense; no more shall we meet him walking along, alone, with the peculiar manner which betokened that he was no common man. And yet Dundee has inherited him. The crowds that were wont to listen to his lectures will have borne away parts of him, and for years to come what George Gilfillan said and did will move and encourage all who are sure that a reformation is needed in the organisations of this country, which, while offering the bread of Christ, really have given the stones of Calvin's dogmas. Immortality with Gilfillan was a reality, and a consequence of the unlimited goodness of God. Well will it be if we who remain can extend and deepen the work which Gilfillan has begun. If he halted at the utterance of the hope of Universalism we need not hesitate to affirm it. He did not deny it—nothing else we can believe would satisfy his grand idea of the Fatherhood of the Almighty. As heretics and outcasts at present, we can believe he has helped on the time when there shall be room in the charity of all Christians for those who cannot honestly accept the authority of Standards and Confessions, but who have a deep love for Christ, and a desire to be his faithful disciples. Dundee has seen many changes. At one time it was called the Geneva of Scotland. Nearly forty years ago it nearly worshipped Murray M'Cheyne. To-day George Gilfillan is the representative of its popular enthusiasm. And where did Gilfillan direct his followers? To the Gospel as taught and illustrated by Jesus Christ; in that way he showed the Christian he could hold his position against the apparent antagonism of Science and of Agnosticism. But the time is not come for an exhaustive review of his work. I sincerely join in the common sympathy at the loss we have all sustained.

BELFAST UNITARIAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the above Association was held on Tuesday evening, August 13th, in the schoolroom of the Second Congregation, Rosemary-street. There was a large attendance, amongst those present being Mr. J. Ritchie, Rev. J. C. Street, Rev. J. Williams (Nottingham), Rev. A. Buckley, Rev. T. Rix (London), Mr. T. M'Clelland, Mr. J. M. Darbishire, Mr. D. W. Moore, Mr. J. R. Neill, Mr. G. Fisher, Mr. H. Darbishire, Mr. H. Hyndman, Mr. W. P. Jennings, Mr. James Dobbin, Mr. E. G. David, Mr. J. M'Williams, Mr. J. Greenfield, Mr. T. Johnston, Mr. J. F. Mulligan, Mr. David Young, Mr. J. Lees, Mr. J. Jackson, Mr. S. H. Street, Mr. W. Palfreyman, Mr. J. Millin, Rev. J. Pollard.

On the motion of Mr. J. M. DARBISHIRE, seconded by Rev. J. C. STREET, the chair was taken by Mr. John Ritchie.

The CHAIRMAN said he had been unexpectedly called upon to take the chair, in consequence of the absence of the president, who should have been there, but he supposed he must have had some very special engagement that prevented him coming. He thanked them for the honour they had done him in having moved him into the position he now occupied. He was sorry to tell them that Rev. Chas. Voysey, whose sermons they had the pleasure of listening to on Sunday week in the Second Church, would not be present. He had been called upon to return to London to keep an engagement there. He was very sorry Mr. Voysey was not there, and he should like very much, and he was sure they all would like, to hear him address them at that meeting. He would now proceed with the business of the evening, and ask Mr. Street to read the report.

Rev. Mr. STREET said before he read the report he had a statement to make which, he was sure, would give great gratification to the meeting, that although their anniversary was held at a very unsuitable season this year and the sermons preached in the middle of summer, a time when many of their friends were away, nevertheless on Sunday the collections realised upwards of £41, which was a considerable augmentation of the funds of the mission. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Voysey asked him to say that he was delighted with his visit to Belfast, and was delighted also with making the acquaintance of friends there, and that he would be only too glad if they would give him an opportunity of visiting them again. He had also two other statements to make. Mr. Fuhr had been on the Continent, and would not be present that evening, as he had not yet returned, and Mr. Robertson, their treasurer, was also, in consequence of illness, unable to be present that evening. Mr. Street then proceeded to read the report, from which we extract the following:—

The council has met four times, and the executive council has met fourteen times during the year. Mr. William Dobbin was again unanimously elected as chairman of the executive committee, and has continued to give unremitting attention to the duties of his important position. The work of the colporteur has had to be discontinued, owing to the inability of the Unitarian Society to keep up its part of the contribution to the expenses of that agency. The services at Carrickfergus have been regularly and satisfactorily continued, and the Sunday class has been efficiently conducted. At Hopeton-street there has been a good deal of fluctuation, so far as attendance upon the evening service is concerned. In this matter there has been great cause for discouragement. While at the cottage services held in the neighbourhood there never has been a difficulty in securing large attendances from week to week, there has been found insuperable difficulty in obtaining a congregation on Sunday evenings in the church. At present the attendance varies from twenty to forty persons. Your committee have appointed the Rev. J. C. Street and Mr. J. M. Darbishire to act as their representatives on the council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Cottage services have been maintained, principally by Mr. Smith, at Ballymacarrett and in the neighbourhood of Hopeton-street. The attendance has been invariably good, and the interest of the people has never flagged. Your committee have to express their deep regret that, owing to illness and the consequent pressure of work, your treasurer, W. Robertson, Esq., feels compelled to request that a successor may be appointed to him; and your secretary, E. A. Fuhr, Esq., who from the establishment of the Association until now has been its faithful, efficient, and invaluable officer, owing to new and onerous duties is also obliged to ask that someone may be appointed in his place. Your committee have the gratification of calling attention to a munificent offer by Mr. Vere Foster of £400 towards the erection of national schools in Hopeton-street district, and to the response which has been made by members of the Second Congregation. They trust that even yet this offer may be accepted, and that one result of their labours in a densely-peopled part of the town may be increased facilities for the education of the young there. The financial statement showed that the receipts for the year amounted to £314. 8s. 9d., and the expenditure to £309. 17s. 4d., leaving a balance in hand of £4. 11s. 5d.

Mr. THOS. M'CLELLAND moved the adoption of the report. The committee during the year had considerable trouble, and a good many difficulties to overcome. They had lost the services of the Rev. Mr. Smith in connection with Hopeton-street. With regard to cottage services, he thought it was an extraordinary thing that they had always been successful. They were specially suited to the class of people they had to deal with in Hopeton-street, and the attendance there was always large. As to the financial state of the Association, it was so far satisfactory that they were on the right side of the account this year. He hoped the committee would be able to meet the offer of Mr. Vere Foster with regard to the erection of national schools in Hopeton-street. It would be for their successors to do as recommended in the last paragraph in the report, and not fail to carry on that institution with complete success. (Applause.)

Rev. THOMAS RIX seconded the motion. He said he had paid a visit to Hopeton-street, and he thought it would be a great pity, from what he had seen there, if they should abandon their labours in that district. He had carried on missionary work in London for twenty years without anything in the way of remuneration, and he had at times felt discouragement, but still he persevered, and he was certain that his efforts had not been in vain. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. H. DARBISHIRE moved the appointment of office-bearers and committee for the ensuing year. He observed that there had been a change in the constitution of the executive committee by adding the names of ladies for the first time. He was sure the admission of the ladies would be very useful in the administration of the Association, and he trusted next year they would have the ladies getting up there and making speeches. (Laughter.) He was sure they would throw vigour and life into their operations. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. JENNINGS seconded the resolution, which was passed.

Mr. JAMES M. DARBISHIRE moved the third resolution, tendering a vote of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for a grant of £90 to the funds of that Association, and £5 towards the support of worship at Ballymena, and assuring that body of their earnest desire to co-operate with them in their efforts to promote pure and undefiled religion. He referred to the generosity of the British and Foreign Association, and said that but for its noble assistance they would not have been able to carry on their work.

Mr. MOORE seconded the motion, which passed.

Mr. HYNDMAN proposed the next resolution, conveying a vote of thanks to the Rev. C. Voysey, of London, for his admirable sermons on behalf of the Association. He observed that, although a great many who heard Mr. Voysey did not agree with all the principles he enunciated, yet they admired the style and manner in which they were delivered. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. GEORGE FISHER, in seconding the motion, spoke in complimentary terms, although the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Voysey were very different from his own. The sermons were admirable in closeness of reasoning and terseness of expression.

Mr. NEILL also spoke in flattering language of Mr. Voysey, and with nearly all of whose conclusions he fully agreed.

The resolution passed.

Rev. J. WILLIAMS moved a resolution calling on the committee to take up the work of the Association, and to continue their labours with increased energy, and not to be discouraged.

Mr. MULLIGAN, seconded the motion, which was passed.

Rev. A. BUCKLEY made an interesting statement of the missionary work in Hopeton-street, and the prospects which lay before the Association in connection with that district if they only persevered.

Rev. J. C. STREET then addressed the meeting, and spoke of the loss which the Association would sustain by the loss of Mr. Fuhr as secretary and Mr. Robertson as treasurer. He himself had been asked by the committee to take up the duties of secretary, and Mr. McClelland had kindly consented to act as treasurer. (Hear, hear.) He expected a very great increase in the success of the committee's work in the ensuing year, when they would have the valuable co-operation of ladies. The enlisting of the services of the ladies was a most important step in the right direction, and each one of the three ladies who would be on the committee had already given proof of her interest in the poor and her anxiety for their welfare. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Neill was called to the second chair.

Mr. YOUNG moved that the best thanks of the meeting be given to the chairman for his kindness in presiding.

Rev. J. POLLARD seconded the motion, which was passed.

The proceedings then concluded.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

UNITARIANISM IN TRANSYLVANIA.

ON Monday evening week, August 11th, Mr. T. G. BOROS, of Transylvania, delivered an address to a good congregation in the Unitarian Free Church, London Road, Reading, on "Unitarianism in Transylvania." After a few introductory remarks Mr. Boros proceeded to say that Unitarianism was introduced to Transylvania by Blandrata, who was a medical officer in the household of the King of Poland, and came with the daughter of that King to Hungary, when her marriage with the King of Hungary took place. John Sigismund, their son, became Prince of Transylvania, and it was under his protection, about fifty years after the Reformation, that Unitarianism began to be preached. The first real apostle of the faith was Francis David, who, in 1596, became its first bishop. This divine was an exceedingly eloquent preacher, a profound scholar, and a man of large religious experience. He had grown up in the turbulent times of the Reformation. First he had been a Catholic priest, then a Lutheran bishop, then he was a bishop of the school of which Zwingli was the head, and then he became a Unitarian. So this great scholar and deep thinker broke away from the bondage of Romanism to find refuge only in the liberty wherewith Christ had made him free. It was in returning home from one of the assemblies in which religious questions were discussed at that time, that David, pondering deeply on what had passed, felt the light of truth burst upon him, as it was said to have done upon Paul in his journey to Damascus. He went to his home at Klausenberg; he proclaimed his new Gospel, and his people heard him gladly. The whole town adopted his views. He made it clear that he did not offer worship to Christ, and another assembly was held to discuss that question. The result was that Blandrata, who in this opposed David, secured the bishop's committal to prison, where the eloquent apostle died. During his life, however, Unitarianism in Hungary and Transylvania greatly progressed, so that in 1579 our churches numbered about 400, and enjoyed royal favour and the patronage of the great. The rev. gentleman traced the history of the movement down to the time when Leopold I. sat on the Austro-Hungarian throne. Under this prince the Jesuits were let loose in the land. "They demanded," said the preacher, "our most beautiful church, and we would not give it them, for it had been ours for more than 150 years. Within its sacred walls the eloquent apostle David had preached the Gospel of freedom. Our fathers had worshipped there and lifted up their souls to the living God and Father of us all, and we were not prepared to surrender our noble temple and all its hallowed memories over to the apostles of bondage. But mark what followed! They asked for the military power. It was given them. In 1716 the chief general of the Austrian army led a military force to Klausenberg and drove the Unitarians from their religious homes. Their churches and schools were taken from them, they were robbed of their private property. Their ministers were put to death. Their colleges too were taken from them and their professors were also slain, while the students were either put to death or driven into hiding. When the work of violence was completed at Klausenberg, and Catholic bishops preached in our churches, and Jesuits taught in our colleges and schools, the military force marched to the next centre of Unitarianism, took possession of church, schools, and college, and put to death minister, teachers, and professors. Nor was this all. It is almost incredible, but I tell it to you as a simple fact, that the Unitarian ministers, their wives and children throughout a great part of Transylvania, together with many Unitarian worshippers suffered martyrdom." The speaker next pointed out that so great a hold had the Unitarian religion obtained upon the country that it could not be completely exterminated, and he gave a very interesting account of the manner in which it maintained itself in face of the Catholic power. Its present position was highly encouraging considering that the population of the country was only two and a half millions. They had 100 churches with good congregations, some numbering as many as 500 or 600, or even more, in attendance, while they had three gymnasia, as well as day schools attached to every congregation, all of such a character that the better classes regularly sent their children to them for education. In their college they had students from all parts, who were instructed by twenty professors. Their mode of church government was Presbyterian, and that was, he thought, understood in England; but their chief minister was called a bishop. As to their fundamental principles, they subjected the Bible to a reverent criticism, but did not believe in its infallibility. They believed in an eternal God, one in substance and in person, in whom they put their trust as the source of Truth, Love, and Holiness. They believed that his purpose was the perfection of the race, to which end he had chosen different instruments, and they believed that the man Christ Jesus was such an instrument. They believed also in the Holy Spirit as that which filled the hearts of all great and pious men, and led them into all truth and to pious and godly living; yet they believed that in order to find truth it was necessary to look for it. They believed further, that man was a microcosm, whose life, like that of the universe, rested on the most wonderful laws. He had free will, by which he attained to virtue or descended to vice. If he would be saved he must spend himself in good deeds, and if he sinned he must himself take the consequences—looking in both cases to God—who on one side gave His smile to goodness, and on the other side was able to forgive even to the uttermost. Further than that they believed that the Christian Church was a spiritual communion, but that there were needed certain outward ceremonies to assist piety, and they therefore joined in public worship, holy communion, and baptism; still they believed that it was the noble aim and the holy life that were of the greatest importance; and while they believed in the immortality of the soul, at the same time they believed that virtue found its own reward even in the present life. But there was one thing more, they did not regard their present belief as final truth. They believed that God had a larger revelation yet to make, so they kept their minds open to the light of truth and their souls were waiting always for a fuller measure of his love. For his own part, said the preacher, he felt that God had manifested his love towards them in their far country by the love and friendship which he had given them from England and America. But he felt too that this was but a part of his ways, and that in his loving heart he desired that all men everywhere should grow into the knowledge of his truth and at last be gathered into one fold—for truly there was but one fold, and one shepherd, and there was but one God and Father of us all.

THE REV. JOHN PAGE HOPPS ON RELIGIOUS TEACHING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Two sermons were preached on Sunday by the Rev. John Page Hopps on behalf of the Sunday schools at Coventry. In the morning discourse Mr. Hopps spoke of the duty of the Church in the matter of the religious education of children. He declared that a more distinct provision should be made for the teaching of the Christian religion to every child. In many cases it was done sufficiently at home by parents; but even then the Church had its own special work, which could not be delegated to others—a Church work, which could not be done at home. How necessary this was he would leave them to judge when children even in day schools were liable to have put into their hands catechisms and books of religion, so-called, which parents ought to be acquainted with, and upon which they ought to pass judgment. Catechisms, for instance, such as he had given to him the other day—a catechism used in a common public day school, put into the hands of all children sent there, whether the parents willed it or no. In it he found these questions and answers—to him utterly miserable, detestable, and in every way mischievous. "What sort of a heart have you by nature?" That was the question which was put to a little child, and the little child was told to answer, "A heart filled with all unrighteousness!" A lie to begin with, and most degrading in any case to have a child say such words; it was neither true nor good. "Does that wicked heart make all your thoughts, words, and actions sinful?" "Yes!" the little child was taught to say in reply to the wicked question; "Yes, I do nothing but sin!" Another lie, and bad in any case to put into a child's lips. This was a "Catechism for Young Children," and such pernicious falsehoods were put into their lips more frequently than fathers and mothers imagined, and these lessons were taught in day schools even, in the name of religion. The schoolmasters and schoolmistresses were going beyond their proper functions in giving lessons in religion to the young at all. Then the poor young child was taught to say that he was a child of the devil and not a child of God, for the questions proceeded—"What are you by nature?" "I am an enemy of God, a child of Satan, and heir of hell!" Then hell was described as a place of endless torment, being a lake that boils with fire and brimstone. In catechism, creed, and hymn book the children were exposed to these paganisms and horrors, from which the Church must try to save as many as it could. Mr. Hopps argued that the Church's duty was to take the children and see that they were properly instructed in true religious knowledge, and in love to their fellow beings. A correspondent writes: The admirable discourses were appreciatively listened to by excellent congregations. The collections amounted to £15. 16s., including two guineas from Mr. J. E. Banks, ex-mayor.

The inspector of reformatory and industrial schools states in his annual report, just published, that there is an increase in the number of children detained in reformatories. The principal cause of this is, he thinks, that many boys are now sent to reformatories who might have been dealt with under the Industrial Schools Act.

India has lost another great public benefactor. Sir Cowasji Jehangier Readymoney, of Bombay, who died on July 21st, will be long remembered for his princely charities, which amounted, the Indian Mirror believes, to half a million sterling. What is more, his benevolence recognised no creed or race; his helping hand was extended to all.

Mrs. Girling, the head of the community of Shakers in Hampshire (all of whom, when they become members of that body, renounce the property they bring with them in her favour), was charged on Saturday, at Lymington, with causing an obstruction at a place called Vag's-lane, at Hordle. The obstruction was caused by the Shakers remaining in the public-road, which they occupied after their ejection from a field at Hordle a short time ago. On Mrs. Girling undertaking to do her best to remove the obstruction within a week, the summons was adjourned.

The Jewish World reports that at a meeting of the "Christian Socialists" held at Berlin, the question whether Jews and pagans were to enter Heaven was discussed, and it was ultimately agreed that they neither entered heaven nor hell, but that an intermediary place was at their disposal, where they would have the option of being converted. It also reports that the orthodox Catholics of Limburg and Holland, have been holding prayer meetings for the purpose of asking the assistance of Providence "against the perilous dangers awaiting us from the Jews and the modern heathen."

The Pope is preparing an Encyclical, in which he will give instructions to the Church as to the line of conduct it behoves her ministers to hold with reference to the great social changes which have taken place in Italy. Negotiations between the Vatican and Germany for reconciliation are hampered by the intrigues of the Jesuits, and the Pope has appealed directly to the Crown Prince on the subject. It is said that among the reforms the Pope and his new Secretary intend to make will be a clean sweep, as far as possible, of the Jesuits from the Vatican. They have lately gone so far as to prevent the Pope from receiving either persons or writings of which they disapproved.

The results of the Jewish Conference which has recently met at Paris, to promote the organisation of the Alliance Israelite, will be in an eminent degree beneficial to Judaism all over the world, so thinks the editor of the Jewish World. He adds: "One cannot help thinking that in the present state of Judaism—when our religion is a mark for the attacks of rival creeds, when our social and theological superiority is being demonstrated in face of much popular jealousy, when our rights and privileges as men are still in an unsettled condition, and when questions affecting us are becoming great political matters—it were well for our interests to repeat such an assembly periodically, and develop its utility into broader fields of action than it has yet touched."

The Presbyterian Synod of China, at its recent meeting, considered the question—Is it right or wrong for the women of China to compress their feet in order to render them permanently small? A native pastor moved, "Whereas foot-binding is contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, we exhort the churches within the bounds of the Synod to use their influence to do away with this evil practice." Mr. Zia, one of the oldest native pastors, in seconding the motion, remarked that the practice was "sinful, because small feet are much admired by the opposite sex, and it is placing a temptation in their way." After several hours' debate the resolution was carried. A native elder, in a telling speech, said that binding the feet was not the only thing of the kind to which exception might be taken. Cutting the hair, shaving the head, piercing the ears, and compressing the waist, might, he pointed out, be put in the same category.

A numerously attended meeting of the friends of peace was held in Paris on Sunday afternoon. About five thousand persons were present, among whom the English working men's delegates occupied a prominent place. The meeting voted resolutions declaring that wars ought to cease, and that civilised Powers ought to have recourse to some honest and efficacious means of terminating their differences, because force never dominates over justice, and wars do not settle international difficulties in a permanent manner. The present armaments of Europe were protested against as an unbearable burden upon industry, an obstacle to civilisation, and a shame upon European governments. The working classes of all nations were called upon to organise a movement as rapidly as possible in favour of permanent peace, and will vote for parliamentary candidates who are partisans of international arbitration. Victor Hugo, in a letter addressed to the meeting, said: "Nothing that may be attempted by governments will succeed against your decision, your liberty, and your sovereignty. You are one people. Europe seeks one thing—peace."

AMERICAN NOTES.

A WORD TO THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

THE question of the disestablishment of the English Church enjoys some attention in the United States. The last number of the Churchman, the chief organ of the Episcopalians of that country, presents this view of the case: "It is becoming more and more evident every day that the time for the disestablishment of the English Church is not very far distant. Were it not that this implies disendowment, and a tearing up as it were of the roots of the venerable tree, the growth of centuries, the change everywhere would be welcomed. Still it must come, and if the Church is spoiled of her heritage she may, and doubtless will, learn the lesson that her strength is not in worldly possessions, but in her great gifts from above. If the former are taken away, the recompense will be in a greater faith and greater zeal, and greater victories for Him who had not where to lay His head. Already the liberated Irish Church is awakening to new life, and it is seen and felt that the coming change, instead of a new bondage, will be a freedom from the old and unnatural one in which the Church has been unequally yoked with and in subjection to the temporal power."

During the summer months the Boston Young Men's Christian Union has a branch whose object is to provide invalids in needy circumstances with carriage drives into the country. It need not be said that these rides are highly appreciated. One writes: "If those who give their money for this purpose could realise the true pleasure, as well as benefit, which they give, they would feel paid a hundred fold." Last year the committee furnished carriage rides to nine hundred and twenty persons, mostly women and children, selected from hospitals, benevolent institutions, and individual cases. Besides, they distributed fifteen hundred horse-car tickets, allowing, in many instances, whole families to make excursions into the country by means of the open cars. In New York another kind of summer charity, sedulously carried on by a band of noble workers, is the carrying of flowers and fruit to the sick.

The Pamphlet Mission tells of two instances of pleasant fraternisation between Jews and Unitarians. One in Kalamazoo, Michigan, where a union lawn party was held and the proceeds divided between the Jewish and Unitarian churches; and the other in Quincy, Illinois, where Rev. J. Vila Blake exchanged pulpits with the rabbi. Says Mr. Blake: "I preached for him (the rabbi) on Saturday morning, and the next morning he filled my pulpit. I never preached in a synagogue before, and it was a memorable day to me, because I enjoyed the beautiful ritual so much. I liked the reading of the Hebrew prayers and the responses of the congregation, and the music was beautiful and impressive to me beyond my powers to impart, it was so simple, so chaste, so religious, so stately, and yet so spontaneous. Then the sitting of the president and the vice-president in the pulpit, with the rabbi, to assist in the service,—that seemed to me an admirable feature, and in accordance with the very genius of congregationalism. It looked so social, so natural, so sincere, so helpful! I wished that I had my church officers sitting with me in the pulpit from week to week, bearing part in the service and setting on it the seal of social interest. The Israelites gave me a hearty welcome, and asked me to come again; and the rabbi, after my sermon, said from the pulpit to his people that he was glad to see me there; and he advised his people to go to church often on Sunday mornings, so as to keep alive a warm and generous sympathy with other than their own peculiar views, and because also humanity and morality are the same everywhere. If only all churches and sects would follow that spirit!"

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

REV. CHARLES VOYSEY.

WHAT do we have a religious service for? Why ought we to attend it regularly if we can? The former of these questions is a very deep one, embracing the very foundations of all prayer and praise to God.

If one may condense the rational theory of prayer into a few words it is this: If there be, as we devoutly believe, a real Being, a living God who thinks, and knows, and loves, and who is the Father of our spirits, it is only natural for us to speak to Him, to lift our hearts to him in holy communion, and we have a right to say to Him just what the necessities of our souls inspire—whether it be a cry of supplication or a song of thankfulness and praise. Only the higher we grow in spiritual life, the less we shall fill the hour of communion with petitions and requests, the more we shall leave to God, the more wholly and entirely shall we feel "Thy will be done," and the more will our thoughts and words shape themselves in praise and adoration. But one thing is assuredly true; that the higher we rise in reasonable religious emotion, the closer will be our communion with God. We shall realise His presence the more, not only in the hour of devotion but in every hour of our lives. He will not be less and less to us till the conception of Him becomes a mere shadow; but ever more and more of a reality, till we feel that He alone is constant and abiding in a world of ceaseless change; and we shall joyfully experience all the bliss of finding in Him our everlasting home. If emancipa-tion from the terrors and superstitions and idolatries of orthodoxy is to bear its legitimate results, it must bring us nearer to God, and not leave us further off than before. If scientific truths destroy our cruder and more childish conceptions of the universe and its order, it is only to elevate and expand our ideas of God, not to shrivel up what little is left after the decay of the religion of our youth.

We wish to make no invidious comparisons, to draw no uncharitable inferences, but it is only right to state that this theistic faith of ours, so far from making less of public worship, must of necessity make more of it; demands afresh a recognition of God, and a thankful acknowledgement of his personal relation to us such as shall far excell and not fall miserably below the expressions of devout feeling which belonged to the past. Public worship to those who do not believe in a God, conscious, intelligent, or sympathising with mortal man is, of course a palpable absurdity. To pray to one who cannot hear, to render the soul's homage of gratitude to one who never gave a gift, to adore a being who is so deficient in all attributes that constitute a man's glory as to be on a level with material substance and forces, all this is simply impossible to creatures endowed with reason and capable as we are of understanding spiritual affections. We worship only because we believe in, and trust, and love, the living God, because He knows all our hearts and all our wants, all our fears, and our exact moral measure. We worship to testify our entire confidence in His friendliness and fatherliness to ourselves and to all mankind. On grounds lower than this it were surely unworthy of us men to worship at all. Our service then is intended before all things to be an expression of our faith.

Yet this is not all. It is designed also as a means of strengthening our faith, of deepening our religious convictions, of quickening our religious emotions. To pile on fuel upon a cold grate before the fire is kindled is manifestly useless; so to perform religious services before there is any feeling of life or yearning towards God would, of course, be of no profit. But if there be ever so small a spark of religious emotion in the soul, it is fanned and fed by joining in prayer and praise more than by any other external means. Free-thinkers, too, ought to know by their own experience how soon religious emotion dies away if not nourished and strengthened by exercise and suitable spiritual food. Men begin by giving up going to their parish church or accustomed chapel, and soon they never miss it at all. Sunday comes round and finds them destitute of any appetite for higher thought than what is afforded by their Sunday newspaper or the Saturday Review. They grow more and more hardened by the pressure of mundane interests, they are more easily satisfied with the husks and the chaff which the luxurious literature of the day so bountifully supplies. They can live very comfortably without God; and religion—so wearisome, so distasteful as it used to be—is only remembered with a sigh of relief. "Now our religious service is meant to be an antidote to this perilous lethargy of the soul. It is an effort to preserve the means of religious sustenance apart from the nauseous and often poisonous elements hitherto mixed up with it. We want to cheer and not to depress; to lift up and not to cast down; to encourage, not to threaten and to damn; to make religious thought and belief fragrant with hopefulness and joy, to speak good of His name for the cleansing of all hearts and the healing of all wounds. Emotions, I know, are not everything, but they are a very important factor in human action and in the course of the world. If the religious emotions be not fed, they must perish; and man cannot afford to lose any faculty, much less a faculty which plays so solemn a part in his character and career. We do not wonder at the reaction which has led so many into the open fields on a Sunday morning, and which has impelled many a one to say, "I can worship God best in my own way in my country ramble, under the hedges, and among the sweet wild flowers, or by the purling brook." All this is true, so far as it goes; but often, though not always, it is mere cant, the most empty and patent of shams; an idle pretext, invented partly for self-deception, and partly to hide from others real irreligion.

We do not deny, we can corroborate out of our own experience, that some of our supremest hours of ecstatic devotion have been passed in solitude, with no voice near, and with only God's eye upon us. But such is not the common experience of mankind. The most usual and natural way in which religious fervour is generated is in the assembly of devout worshippers, where the warmth of each soul is heightened by the contact of sympathy and concurrent feeling. It is in public worship where the spirit is most kindled by Divine affections, and the heart most touched by lofty aspirations. And without knowing it or reasoning upon it, men and women instinctively go where the congregations are large, not altogether through blind following of example or fashion, but owing to a physical and subtle force which we can partly understand, but cannot explain. Without knowing it, we do help each other to pray, and we warm each other's songs of praise. If we wish to be religious, we must then use the means by which religious emotion is fed and kept alive.

Our service, however, has still other objects. Even the preservation and nourishment of our religious emotion are but means to an end. We wish to be religious in order that we may be good. We desire to hold close communion with God that we may grow more pure, more strong in righteousness, more devoted to God's real service in our daily lives.

Honestly, earnestly engaged in, public worship cannot but have its effect in improving our character and refining our conduct. If it helps us to realise God's nearness, it must also help us in trying to be worthy of so great a blessing. If it softens and makes tender our hearts, it will make us more mild and merciful in our dealings with each other. If it feeds our hope and deepens our joy, it must show itself in fostering greater sweetness and amiability of character. Surely, if we know our own hearts at all, it is in moments of supreme spiritual joy in God that we feel also the deepest contrition and the most earnest aspirations after greater holiness of life. When most impressed with a sense of the Divine favour, we are then most alive to our own unworthiness, to our own shortcomings. These feelings, it is true, may be, and too often are, evanescent; but they are the germ of moral improvement, the springs of new activity, the source of newness of life. Public worship is then an aid to virtue, and such a one as very few can dispense with. As a means of instruction, of sharpening and confirming our convictions, and of awakening or stimulating the religious and moral sensibilities, it stands at the head of those agencies which are summed up in the old and expressive term—"the means of grace."

The second question, therefore, Why ought we to attend regularly if we can? answers itself. Self-culture in all things is a recognised postulate of a noble life, most of all, of a spiritual and moral life. We owe it to ourselves and to our fellow men to lose no opportunity of cultivating the inmost and supreme part of our being, to leave no work undone that may lift us—even for a brief space—above the dull monotony of our busy lives, and carry our thoughts into regions of contemplation somewhat more exalted and enduring than worldly interests. Put it how we will, life's toil, and burdens, and corroding cares would tend to make us selfish and sordid if they were permitted to absorb the whole of our being and to quench our aspirations after communion with God and our interest in spiritual things. A wise and devout mind will, of course, be on its guard against this downward tendency, and will "have God in all its thoughts," hearing His voice above the noise and confusion of all earthly occupation; but for the many it is absolutely needful to rest at brief intervals and withdraw from the business and cares of life to allow their minds time for calm and contemplation, to recall them to the higher ends of life and to the culture of what is noblest within them.

Thus fairly and firmly established and recognised, the service must not be supposed capable of supporting itself except by the same zeal and devotion by which it has been built up. Old friends must still cling to it and do their best at re-inforcing it by bringing into the congregation fresh members and adherents. Money, of course, is essential, and should be freely given; but by far the best support is that afforded by regular attendance. The orthodox world will put a value upon our work not higher than that at which we appraise it ourselves. If they see us careless about it, indifferent as to its success, uninterested in the services, they will be sure to think and to say it cannot be worth much. If, on the contrary, we show zeal and devotion, giving witness thereto by the sacrifice we are willing to make on its behalf, they will at least look upon it with a higher regard, and perhaps come in time to be ardent allies. Believe me, we need this service of yours, more than the preaching of sermons, to give proof to the unsettled, but still religious, minds of the orthodox world that our scepticism, or "infidelity" as they call it, has not only not impaired our religious sentiments, but has greatly exalted and refined them; that we, too, can pray to our Father in heaven, only more freely and unrestrained than we ever pray before; that we, too, can praise His holy name, only with far more delight and rapture, because all our thoughts of him are good, and we can praise God not only for what men call his bounty, but for His discipline by sorrow and misfortune. By our prayer and praise we show forth our entire trust in His faithful love towards all mankind, and our lively hope in the final blessedness of all the world. The service is of infinitely more importance than the sermon, and if we wish to make any worthy or lasting impression on our own or the next generation, we must attend the services as regularly as circumstances permit.

JOTTINGS.

Hurry is not earnestness. A man might be very deliberate, yet very much in earnest. Some associate earnestness with dulness and melancholy, but no mistake can be greater. When a man stood with a rifle in his hand on the Scotch moors, watching for the stags to pass, he was in earnest. If you asked him, "Don't you feel very melancholy?" he would reply, "I never felt so jolly in my life; but don't speak a word." He meant to hit the stag, and knew that his whole man must be ready when the moment came.

The one peculiarity about the truth is, that the truest things have always been known. They are the only things that will stand. The truths we consider so great and so precious now—God personal, God the author of the everlasting reality of goodness, and the enforcer of the terrible difference between right and wrong, God the inspire of the sentiment that creates in us an immortal faith,—these are not new things. They did not begin even with Jesus Christ. They are older than Abraham. To God's presence in the world, to God's presence in humanity, men's hearts have always borne testimony with a sublime confidence. Even when God's external ways were mysterious and full of perplexity, when pestilence and death and war and famine and hatred have covered the earth, never has the inner faith in the goodness of God ceased to burn. Our wonder should not be excited at the slow progress of good; rather we should admire that against such tremendous odds, man's faith should still survive; that amid such signs of doubt and disparagement about the very existence of the soul and about the providence of God, man should still trust him; not because there are signs to the doubting sense and the disputing heart, but because there is a spirit in a man that came from God.

DISCOVERY.

ANCHOR lifted—sail outspread—
Speeds the bark before the wind;—
Onward thus the human mind.
He who doth the unseen dread,
His new world will never find,
Though he leave the old behind;
He will wreck on doubt instead.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 30, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE REV. ROBT. RODOLPH SUFFIELD ON THE ROMAN CHURCH.

UNDER the form of a review of Mr. ARTHUR'S work, entitled "The Pope, the Kings, and the People," there have appeared, in the late monthly numbers of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, five articles by "An Ex-Roman Catholic Priest," whom it is divulging no secret to name as the Rev. ROBT. RODOLPH SUFFIELD, lately the minister of our congregation at Croydon. There is probably no man living better fitted to write on such a theme—no one, we would say, who has so intimate an acquaintance with the Roman Church in its various aspects, and at the same time possesses so entire a liberty of thinking and of saying what he thinks. We must congratulate both ourselves and Mr. SUFFIELD on his having secured, in the pages of this old and widely-circulated magazine (now in its 100th year), a far larger audience than any of our own papers or reviews could have obtained for him.

It were perhaps hard to decide whether the Church of Rome has, in the long run, gained or lost by the widespread and dense ignorance respecting its doctrines and claims; but we feel confident that in the present day prejudice, and the revulsion against prejudice, unreasonable bigotry, and equally unreasonable liberality begotten of it, ignorance and half-knowledge are all forces making more or less directly in its favour. The man who knows the truth, and will tell it, must expect to be called hard names because he says hard things, and must bear the suspicion of being a "Jesuit in disguise" because they are not hard enough, but will nevertheless be, if listened to, a benefactor both to the State and religion. For it is too often forgotten that Romanism presents itself to us under two very distinct aspects. It is a religion for good or for evil, the inmost and highest life of thousands of devoted souls; it is also a political organisation, the oldest, the most complete, the most independent of individuals and generations, the most despotic, powerful, and enduring which the world has ever seen. If it has often been unjustly depreciated and calumniated as a religion, it has certainly been seldom sufficiently appreciated and feared as a society. To point out the real aims of "The Church as a perfect Society," and the utter incompatibility of its claims with the rights—political and religious—maintained by all free nations, is the object of these articles. It were idle to suppose that they will attract much notice at a time like the present, when Eastern affairs only have sufficient interest to half-awake the nation from its five years' slumber. Nevertheless, we desire to draw attention to them, as they may prove useful later on if not now.

People often talk of the present Pope as likely to prove more "liberal" than his predecessor, and "Roman correspondents," who may know much of Rome, but certainly know little of the spirit of Romanism, encourage such well-meaning hopes. Now, a Pope may be prudent, patient, reserved, or outspoken and openly despotic; "liberal" he cannot be. A "liberal Pope" is, now at the close of the nineteenth century more than ever before, a contradiction in terms.

The infallible Church which reforms its doctrine, the infallible Pope who annuls or slights the infallible decrees of his predecessor, either in so doing would commit suicide, either in so doing would slay the other. "During thirty years," says Mr. SUFFIELD, "the late Pope has succeeded in destroying nearly all the liberties of the clergy; he has established principles destructive of all the liberties of the civil government." Such is the testimony of one who knows by experience what were the liberties of the clergy, and whose duty it was for years to learn and teach the principles, new and old, established in the Roman Church. And he adds these significant words: "It is probable that the new Pope will carry on the scheme with greater reticence and prudence than the outspoken PIUS, and therefore more successfully and dangerously." Those who care to know how great the danger is, how utterly subversive that success would be of all our liberties, political, social, personal, should read these articles, which we hope Mr. SUFFIELD may be induced to reprint in pamphlet form. Meanwhile we shall but just refer to two valuable practical suggestions made by him. The first regards the Papal prelates—cardinals, archbishops, bishops. "Our recognition of their ecclesiastical status should never exceed the narrowest limits prescribed by common courtesy and common sense. No government communication should be conducted through any ecclesiastic. When we want to treat with Roman Catholics, with regard to any sectarian wrong or request, let us treat with English or Irish laymen elected by English or Irish lay people." The other point would have probably before this attracted attention but for the ignorant bigotry which has hitherto urged it. It refers to the need of some Government inspection of convents and other "religious houses." The fact that the religious orders prescribe the use of physical restraint and punishment in the case of disobedient or suspected members should surely be sufficient proof of the desirability of some State control over establishments where such power is claimed; though by all means let it be exercised "in the most tender and respectful way" for the support of individual liberty, not the annoyance or suppression of communities. The Church resists to the utmost any such proposal, but the real reasons for resistance on its part should be the very reason for insistance on ours.

We would commend to all who call themselves Liberals the late words of an eminent and typical Englishman, whose position is consistent with his character and opinions, though all three seem to us strangely inconsistent in themselves. In "Notes of My Life," just published, Archdeacon DENISON thus writes (p. 383): "I often ponder upon a problem which seems to me a principal—if not the principal—problem of national life. The highest blessing of a Christian people is religious obedience; that the people be 'obedient to the Faith.' This in things spiritual. Then in things temporal the highest blessing is Civil Liberty, the parent of national greatness, as respects the things of this life; of true social intercourse; of active development of mental and bodily faculties; of progress in science and in art. But the two blessings are never found together in the same people; rather must it be said, that the last always, more or less, repels and excludes the first." It would not be difficult to explain the problem at least to our own satisfaction, but of the truth of it there can be no doubt, nor has Rome ever been deceived about it. Yet Liberals are found supporting the Church of Rome, and counting it an essential of liberalism to defend it. Let them learn a lesson, if not of a Unitarian minister, at least of a Tory, High Church Archdeacon.

THE WESLEYANS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

OUR readers were informed last week that the Rev. WILLIAM IMPEY has been obliged to resign his office as general superintendent of the Wesleyan Missions in South-Eastern Africa, after a term of service in that mission-field extending to a period of forty years. In September last Mr. IMPEY wrote home expressing his inability any longer to enforce on his Kaffir converts the plain grammatical sense of the words in the Methodist Catechism: "Hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone, in which the wicked will be punished for ever and ever, by having their bodies tormented by fire, and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God." In his letter addressed to Dr. MORLEY PUNSHON, the venerable missionary turns to good account the example set by no less an authority than JOHN WESLEY himself in rebutting alleged scriptural arguments for a doctrine which he was unable to receive. Mr. IMPEY thinks that the few texts upon which so much stress is laid as asserting the doctrine of eternal torments are not incapable of an interpretation which shall harmonise with the many in an opposite direction. But he adds: "Were the difficulties presented by the few texts alluded to even greater than they are, I would claim to apply a principle asserted by JOHN WESLEY himself in discussing a very analogous topic—that of 'the horrible decree of predestination. This, though held by multitudes of divines in his day, was by him rejected as 'making Revelation contradict itself,' as being grounded 'on such an interpretation of some texts (more or fewer it matters not), as flatly contradicts all the other texts, and as being contrary to the whole scope and tenor of Scripture.' 'But you will prove it by Scripture.'" Mr. WESLEY writes in a well-known passage—

Whatever that Scripture proves, it can never prove this. Whatever its true meaning may be, this cannot be its true meaning. Do you ask what is its true meaning, then? If I say I know not, you have gained nothing, for there are many Scriptures, the true sense whereof neither you nor I shall know till death is swallowed up in victory. But this I know, better it were to say it had no sense at all than to say it had such a sense as this. It cannot mean, whatever it mean beside, that the God of truth is a liar. Let it mean what it will, it cannot mean that the Judge of all the world is unjust. No Scripture can mean that God is not love, or that his mercy is not over all his works—that is, whatever it prove beside, no Scripture can prove predestination.

If this method of interpretation be somewhat questionable as exegesis it certainly shows a remarkable effort to rise above the bondage of the letter. Many readers of this striking argument will be disposed, however, to ask, How far may it not be pushed? There are other doctrines besides those of Predestination and Everlasting Woe, for which the alleged Scriptural Authority is only a very small selection of tests, and these out of harmony with other Scriptures. We need not say that this exactly represents the case of the Doctrine of the Trinity.

We shall be deeply interested in noticing what the result is to be for the Wesleyan body. Mr. IMPEY did not send in his resignation until he found that the same liberty was not to be allowed him as is enjoyed by Canon FARRAR and Mr. R. W. DALE. His case is not the first with which the Wesleyan authorities have had to deal, but it is one peculiarly fitted to make those Wesleyans who sympathise with him feel their grievance, and remonstrances are beginning to be uttered which by and by will have their effect. Meanwhile, it is gratifying to read such a protest as that contained in a letter on this subject which appears in the columns of a contemporary:—

When I consider these things I am led to ask whether they are consistent with that proper freedom and independence of thought which ought to exist. Why should not our ministers have as much liberty of thought as other churches enjoy? It would seem as though a very closely-knit and elaborate Church organisation naturally leads to the repression of free thought. The history of the Romish Church proves this; and I am inclined to think that it would have been more apparent in Methodism than it is, had not liberal ideas been forced on her by such powerful agencies from without her own borders. It is very tempting to employ an elaborate system of Church government; its advantages for doing good on a large scale seem very great; while the attendant evils are not easy to perceive except to an onlooker.

"PHILOCHRISTUS" ON TRADITIONS AND THE VOICE OF THE LORD.

ABOUT the thirteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius it came to pass that I (being now thirty-three years old, or a little more) discoursed with a Greek proselyte concerning the Law. He said to me that it seemed to him better to disannul such ordinances as were not convenient (just as a man might prune a too luxuriant vine), and not to say, "I will obey the ordinances, but I will make my obedience the same as disobedience." His words pleased me, but when I reported this saying to some of the Scribes, my friends, they with one consent rejected it. Abuyah, the son of Elishah, said, scoffing at my doubts, "The Law drowneth them that cannot swim." Then said I (repeating a certain saying of the Greek), "But water groweth bad if it be kept long in one vessel." But he straightway put me to silence, saying, "Is this likewise the case with the Law? Nay, it is like unto wine which groweth better as it groweth older." Jonathan, the son of Ezra, also added, in a gentle voice, "My son, thou knowest the saying of the Elders, the first of the sayings of the Wise: 'Be deliberate in judgment, and raise up many disciples, and make a fence to the Law.' But thou, O my son, would'st fain pull down fences. But if we begin to destroy a part of the Law, who shall stay the hand of the destroyer? And in the end we shall be even as the Gentiles, which have no law. Is it not better to be too careful rather than to be too careless? Is it not better to have too many fences rather than to have too few?" . . . There seemed much wisdom in the sayings of Jonathan, and I knew not what answer to make. For if to transgress the Law, even in the smallest matter, was to fall into destruction, then it seemed wise to fence round the Law, even as a man would fence round a pit; and not to suffer the unwary to go near, and peradventure to stumble, and so to be swallowed up. Yet I could not but perceive that it was not well for men thus to resort to the Law and to the Traditions as to a sacred oracle, even on those occasions and in those matters wherein the voice of the Lord, speaking unto the heart, saith clearly, "This is right, do this; this is wrong, do not this." For thus it must needs come to pass that men would pervert even the Law to the contradicting of the voice of the Lord. Hence the duties of children to parents (albeit upheld indeed by the better part of the wise) were by many diminished, or even made of none effect.

Now, I have heard certain Romans say that in their Law they also use the same devices to observe the letter and to break the spirit. But the mischief was that our Law was not as the laws of the Gentiles, which concern naught save land, and houses, and slaves, and the like, and which have not to do with the souls and spirits of men. The Gentiles could break the letter of the laws and sin not, for what sin was it to make a slave free by feigning to sell him, or in disputing about a farm to treat of a clod as though it were the farm? But our law had to do with the supreme God, the Maker of all things, the All-seeing (blessed is He). Therefore, to observe the letter and to break the spirit of His Law seemed to be a profaning of His Holy Name. Now, I had been trained up from my earliest years to dread the pulling down of the fences, having this precept, as it were, engraved and characterized in my memory: "Whoso pulleth down a hedge a serpent shall sting him;" and I had been taught to prefer Sinai—that is, the teacher of the Law—even to an "uprooter of mountains"—that is, to a teacher which hath understanding to remove all manner of offences and stumbling-blocks from the path of the weak ones. Howbeit, at times, after discourse with the Greek proselyte whom I mentioned above, there would arise in my heart this thought—that when the words of the Law seemed to contradict that which was right, then we ought to go into the presence of God and to say, "Thou, O God of righteousness, are righteous altogether, neither can it be Thy pleasure that we should be unrighteous;" and again, "Thou art a God of truth, neither can it be Thy will that we should lie with our hands in Thy presence. Therefore permit us in this case to break Thy law. For Thy righteousness is greater than Thy law." But the Scribes would not so much as listen to such words as these, for they said that scarce even a prophet dare speak so exceeding boldly. But when I asked them whether it might be that a prophet should arise in Israel, then the most said that it was not possible, for the Shekinah and the Holy Spirit had departed from Israel when the first Temple had been destroyed. Thus my words were an abomination unto my teachers, so that I hid my thoughts in my heart; but it was pain and grief to me.

THE PRINCE OF DARKNESS.

FIRST in rank among the antiquarian societies holding celebrations yearly in the open air is the British Archæological Association. During the past week this society has held a successful gathering or "congress" at Wisbech, in the heart of a region supplying abundant material for description and discussion. No stone was left unturned, or at least unconsidered. Ely Cathedral supplied, of course, the pièce de resistance, but neither the smaller churches of the Marshland nor the early English remains at Swaffham were neglected. Local legend also came in for a fair share of attention. At the church of Walpole St. Peter, Mr. Peckover related a short legendary story connected with a supposed Roman figure in a corner of the chancel on the outside wall, which was said to represent a kind of early "Jack the Giant-killer," and pointed out two large circular holes close by, which were caused by the Devil, in anger at the hero's deeds, kicking a football at him with such force as to penetrate the sacred building. It has not escaped so acute an inquirer as Mr. Peckover that this story of the Devil and the football is only a variation of one which is perpetually turning up in every country in Europe. Any startling and unexplained occurrence is at once attributed to the Prince of Darkness. The extinct crater of a volcano is the Devil's Punch-bowl. A bridge built too swiftly for its time, like that at Kirkby Lonsdale, is ascribed to an infernal engineer; the Cathedral of Cologne to a diabolical contractor; but among this general pressing of Satan into the service of mankind there stand out distinctly some stories showing his impotence to revenge himself on holy men or God-fearing knights who had thwarted him. Commencing operations at Brighton to dig a trench to let in the sea on a holy hermit, the fiendish "navy" is scared by the sight of the saint's lantern and leaves his works unfinished. On a similar occasion when exercising his more legitimate functions as prince of the air he is carrying an enormous stone to let fall on the convent of Königstein, when the bell for the Angelus gives him so terrible a shock that he drops his burden far short of its mark. The village church at Walton, like Chichester Cathedral, has a detached belfry tower. This is accounted for, in the former case, by the devil's having attempted to carry off the church tower; finding his strength unequal to its removal from consecrated ground he was fain to drop it at a considerable distance from the church. In discoursing thus pleasantly of local folk-lore, and spicing their remarks with an occasional denunciation of reckless restorations, the British Archæological Association passed a delightful week, smiling pleasantly at begone superstitions, but touching with reverent hand all memorials of the genius of our forefathers. It is needless to dilate upon the practical value of thoughtful and appreciative study of the monuments of the past. The effect of a more humble spirit in comparing our own work with that of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries and the period of the Renaissance is already made manifest in the improvement which has taken place in English domestic as well as ecclesiastical architecture during the last forty years, in the substitution of brick for stucco, and in the sober-hued interior decorations which have taken the place of the astounding wall papers and maddening carpets of the last generation.—Daily News.

MEADOW TALK.

A BUMBLE-BEE, yellow as gold,
Sat perched on a red-clover top,
When a grasshopper, wiry and old,
Came along with a skip and a hop.
"Good morrow," cried he, "Mr. Bumble-Bee!
You seem to have come to a stop."
"We people that work,"
Said the bee, with a jerk,
"Find a benefit sometimes in stopping;
Only insects like you,
Who have nothing to do,
Can keep up a perpetual hopping."
The grasshopper paused on his way,
And thoughtfully hunched up his knees;
"Why trouble this sunshiny day," Quoth he, "with reflections like these?
I follow the trade for which I was made;
We all can't be wise bumble-bees.
"There's a time to be sad,
And a time to be glad;
A time both for working and stopping;
For men to make money,
For you to make honey,
And for me to do nothing but hopping."

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.

"No place like home." I had often tried to feel how deep was the truth of these words, but one morning I heard of something that confirmed it beyond all doubt.

It was the east coast of Scotland; the seaport town of Arbroath. I had gone early in the morning towards the harbour to look out for the appearance of the Lady of the Lake, a schooner in which my father sailed. The harbour lies open to the whole force of easterly and south-easterly winds. At times fearful sights are to be seen here. When the storms come down the great waves leap clean over the protection wall which runs in front of the docks, making it dangerous for anyone to go near the entrance to the harbour.

At times the scene is different. The loveliest sights I ever saw were seen from the top of that wall. Stretching as far as the eye could reach, with not a speck to intervene, lay the sea of silvery-crested water. It was hard to say where the sea ended and where the clouds began; sea and sky seemed one. And then the sunrise: never has my eye beheld anything to equal that. First, a red tinge colouring the clouds nearest to the horizon, just like the breath from some fiery monster. Then a deepening and a widening of the red, and an upward reaching. Then down on the lips of the sea a yellow gleam, and then in a few moments the great glowing mass of light, like a newly-created orb, dropped into space. All around smiling, laughing, dancing, in the deep red hue. No, I never saw anything more inspiring, even to a young heart—for I was young then. But I had forgotten—there was one speck on the horizon, though on clear days only it could be seen. You have all heard of the Inchcape Rock. There is a lighthouse on it now, and it may be seen on a clear morning.

I had gone to look for the coming of my father's ship, but it did not come that day, and I was just on the point of returning home with the news to my mother, when I saw a group of pilots talking very earnestly about something. I went towards them, and recognised a friend, who was then their captain. In the middle of the group was a little dog, a shaggy Scotch terrier, of very humble dimensions. If you know the size of a pilot's jacket pocket you will know the size of the dog, for it would have just filled one of their pockets, no more.

"It's extraordinary," said one of the pilots, in his peculiar dialect. "Ye dinna mean ta tell me it swam a' the road itsel'."

"Tell us all about it," said the captain.

I listened eagerly to Sandy Swankie's story.

"It was the last time we gaed ta the rock. Thomson an' Swankie were the keepers, gan oot. 'I cam' ta' the harbour mase', ta see that the boat was a' clear. Prince cam' after me. It was very calm that nicht, hardly a breath o' wind, and I said as they gaed oot, 'Tak' time, lads, ye hav' a hard pull afore ye, and I dinna think ye need fear a change o' the wind.' I was richt; for next mornin' there was a little fresh breeze certainly, but still frae the same airt, and I kenn'd it hadna blawn lang like that. However, when I gaed hame that nicht I missed neathing until they were a' in bed but mase', and just as I rose to ging I thoct on Prince. 'Prince, Prince,' I cried; 'Prince, come lad,' I cried, but nae Prince was there; an', after reflectin' a wee, it cam' suddenly to my mind that Prince was off to the rock in the boat. I had seen him i' the boat, but after that I didna mind o' havin' noticed him. Next mornin', on risin', I was dumfounded ta hear something outside the door, scrapin' an' scrapin' as if it wanted to coom in. 'It's Prince,' said I, an' I felt displeased wi' mase' that I had gaen ta sleep, leavin' him outside, for, as ye ken lads, I'm very fond o' my little doggie. I gaed an' opened the door, an' sure enough it was Prince, but in sic a sicht. The puir fellow was like a bundle o' wet cloots, an' shakin' like a man wi' the palsy. I took up the puir fellow i' my arms, an' dried him wi' a cloot, until the fire was lichted. I then rolled him in a cloot, and let him lie afore the fire until he got thoroughly better, and during that time I tried hard to think whar he'd been. An' wull ye believe it, lads, it was last nicht Tamson cam' doon an' telled me that they had taen him nearly ta the rock, when he sprang o'erboord, an' put them in a state o' fricht, for they kenn'd hoo much I valued him. After rowin' back a bit, whistlin' an' cryin' until they were tired, they gae up the search, an' neathing further was kenn'd until Tamson coom last nicht an' telled me a' this, an' saw Prince lying a' richt an' ticht on the rug afore the fire."

Swankie looked up to the others and said, "It seems ta me, lads, Prince thoct there was na place like hame."

I thought so too that morning, and I have often thought so since then. What think you?

CURIOSITIES.

Lord Airlie remarked to one of his tenants that it was a very wet season. "Indeed, my lord," replied the man, "I think the spigot's oot a'the-gither."

"How did ye like the doctor the day, Thomas?" "Weel, John, the sermon was not that ill; but I dinna like yon trash o' duties at the nither end o't."

"Really, Mr. Johnson, there's nae end in your wit," said a lady in the west of Scotland to a noted humourist. "Gude forbid, madam," he replied, "that I should ever be at my wit's end."

NO RELATIONS WITH HEAVEN.—A Washington paper tells an amusing story of a Protestant clergyman who, on his first visit to the capital of United States, endeavoured to enter the Senate House. He was stopped by an official, who demanded whether he was privileged to enter, by being either a governor, an ex-member of Congress, by a foreign minister. "I am a minister," replied the clergyman. "Of what Court and country?" demanded the janitor. "Of Heaven," was the reply. "Our Government entertain no relations whatever with that country," drily observed the doorkeeper.

PARSONAGE STREET: MACCLESFIELD

WELCOME TO THE REV. JOHN RUSSELL.

ON Saturday afternoon, the 24th inst., a meeting was held in the Parsonage-street schoolroom to welcome the Rev. John Russell to the ministry of Parsonage-street Chapel, the duties of which he has undertaken in addition to his pastorate of King Edward-street Chapel. The room and platform were tastefully decorated with flowers, and the proceedings throughout were of an enthusiastic and interesting description. Selections of music, well rendered by the chapel choir, were given at intervals, between the speeches. After tea the chair was taken by CHARLES BROCKLEHURST, Esq., J.P., who called upon Mr. J. W. Yates, the secretary, to read letters of apology from the following gentlemen:—Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A., Gee Cross; G. Hamilton Vance, B.D., Dukinfield; J. Kertain Smith, Hyde; Alexander Ashworth, Stalybridge; (James Harrop, Adam Rushton, Henry Eachus, formerly connected, as pupils, with King Edward-street school); Dr. H. J. Marcus, Heaton Norris, Messrs. J. R. Beard, J. Dendy, Esq., W. Whitworth, and J. Phillips, of Manchester, and T. Hawley, of Longton. He earnestly requested the members of the congregation to take their appointed minister to their hearts and homes, and not to expect too much from him, but assist, encourage, and attend his ministrations, making his duty a pleasure to himself and a profit to them, not leaving chapel matters merely to chance, but putting their hands to the work that needed doing.

The CHAIRMAN, on rising was received with loud cheers, and said: My friends, you have done me the honour and kindness to ask me to preside on this interesting occasion, and I have much pleasure in acceding to your request. Ten days ago, after a roughish passage from Ireland to Scotland, I received, on reaching the latter shores, a batch of letters, amongst them one from your worthy secretary, asking me to take the chair this evening. At first I said no, thinking I was hardly the right man to undertake such a duty, but after further consideration I thought that if by so doing I could in any way assist you in carrying out the good work you had in view, you were welcome to my poor services, such as they were. We are assembled together this evening to welcome the Rev. Mr. Russell to a new sphere of work for which I think he is in every way admirably fitted. I have had the pleasure of his friendship several years, as also that of Mrs. Russell, and I have always derived benefit and pleasure in my conversation with him; but I must not anticipate the kind words of welcome that are to be offered to him by various gentlemen whom I see around me on this platform, several of whom at considerable personal inconvenience, have come a great distance to be present amongst us. Your chapel and school has for some years had to contend with many difficulties, and among other friends who have been removed from you, no one took a greater interest in your welfare than the late lamented Mr. Samuel Greg. You now naturally look round for the assistance of an able minister, and it affords me much pleasure that you have asked Mr. Russell to undertake the duty, and in doing so I trust he will be encouraged by occasionally seeing amongst his worshippers at King Edward-street Chapel many faces that I now see in this room; and I pray God to bless his endeavours amongst you. (Loud cheers.)

The Rev. JAMES BLACK spoke as secretary of the East Cheshire Christian Union, and gave Mr. Russell a cordial and brotherly welcome on his entering upon an extended field of labour. The arrangement by which both pulpits in Macclesfield were occupied by the same preacher was one which many friends in the Union, himself for one, had often hoped they might some day see. He believed that it was the best arrangement for all parties. They had two distinct duties to fulfil in their religious gatherings—the one Devotional, which suited a quiet Sunday morning in King Edward-street; the other what was frequently spoken of as Controversial, though it need not take the form of controversy. It should be an earnest and effective presentment of their religious convictions before the world. An evening service, well advertised, was most suitable for the latter, which was a duty not to be omitted at present of all times. The speaker then referred to the case of the Wesleyan Missionary, Mr. Impey, who, after a long life of Christian service, had been forced to resign because he could no longer teach the Doctrine of Eternal Punishment. In connection with the subject of the Missionary Union, Mr. Black said he was reminded that the King Edward-street chapel was of old a Presbyterian one. He, as a Presbyterian bred, naturally liked what was good in Presbytery—namely, the bond of union it afforded for all good works. Such a bond of union they really had in their little Missionary Society.

Mr. JOSEPH ROBERTS, as the oldest member, gave the welcome on behalf of the congregation, and in the course of a few appropriate remarks expressed the hope that their relation as minister and congregation might be a long and happy one.

The welcome hymn—

"This day we give thee welcome,
This day our hands nnite," having been sung, all standing and joining in it,

The Rev. JOHN RUSSELL, in reply, feared he could scarcely find suitable words to express his thanks for the warm and generous welcome they had given him that evening. He did not come amongst them as a new man, having occupied their pulpit on many occasions since he came to Macclesfield, and was pretty well known to most of them. He hoped he would soon come to be regarded as a friend by everyone of them, and get to know them in their own homes as well as in his own. He would not give any promises or pledges, as they knew him well enough to have a pretty fair idea of what they might reasonably expect of him. He would only say that now that his hands were as full of work as they could hold, he would spare neither time nor labour in his efforts to do a good work among them. He would not trouble them with any statement of views, as he was perfectly sure, from his knowledge of them, as well as from the unreserved character of their invitation, that they would never dream of muzzling their minister, even when he said things that were unpalatable, or with which they could not entirely agree, but would always respect the liberty of the pulpit, and the duty of the minister to speak out freely and without reserve the truth that is in him. Devoting himself, as he hoped to do, to his now greatly increased work, he would ask for something in the way of reciprocity on their part. Above all, he would ask for regular attendance at public worship. People often absented themselves from service on the most frivolous pretexts, that would never detain them from their ordinary occupations, or even from a party of pleasure or evening entertainment. If congregations only knew how irregularity of attendance takes all spirit out of a minister, and renders impossible all healthy and vigorous congregational activity, he was sure that no one who had our good cause of free and pure religion at heart would ever lightly absent himself from its public service. He would also like to say a word for King Edward-street. He was always very glad to see them there, and was especially pleased that some of their own best workers were amongst the most regular attenders at King Edward-street. He hoped that his becoming their minister would do good to King Edward-street too, and that he would soon see them in larger numbers than hitherto attending his ministrations at the old chapel as well as at their own. In coming among them he was joining a band of old and experienced workers who had managed their own affairs ever since the formation of the society twenty-three years ago. It was remarkable how well they had stuck together and worked together, and what a good front they could present when they turned out in full force. Having become their minister, he hoped that none of them would think of resting on their oars or taking their ease, but rather that they would work harder and more heartily than ever. Hoping that they would all become united in love, and that they would grow strong by mutual devotion to the good and the true, he reciprocated the hope that their connection as minister and people would be a fruitful and happy one, and again thanked them for the warm and generous manner in which they had welcomed him amongst them. (Applause.)

Interesting addresses were afterwards delivered by the Rev. J. C. Williams (Longton) on "War Principles," the Rev. Iden Payne (Congleton) on the "Duties of Congregations towards their Ministers," and the Rev. J. McConnochie (Sale) on the "Relation of the Sunday School to the Church." Votes of thanks having been passed to the chairman and to the friends, who had come to them from a distance, a most pleasant and successful meeting was brought to a close with the benediction.

BRIGHTON.—On Thursday, the 15th of August, the Unitarian community of this place held its annual picnic in the beautiful park of Arundel Castle. The weather, although threatening in the morning, turned out remarkably fine, and the members were soon engaged in different games, which lasted till tea was served in a really charming spot in the park, and to which about 70 members sat down, with their excellent pastor at their head. Whilst the Unitarians were sipping their tea, some Trinitarian congregation did the same close by at a neighbouring table, without the harmony of the whole being in the least disturbed. Our correspondent adds: "We are advancing after all, although the Dissenters at Saffron Walden (see Unitarian Herald, August 9th) exclude the Unitarians from their Sunday-school treat." On the return homewards many a merry peal of laughter was heard, and everyone seemed to be highly pleased with the day's "outing," and the excellent arrangements made for it.

HASTINGS.

SERMON BY THE REV. W. H. CHANNING.

"ARGUS," a writer in the Hastings and St. Leonards Observer, of Saturday last, gives an account of a visit to the Unitarian Chapel in South Terrace. It had been intimated to the editor that the presence of a reporter would not be unwelcome during the month's ministration of the Rev. W. H. Channing. And so I elected to attend the service on Sunday morning last, when I heard the reverend gentleman discourse on "Personal Communion with the Living God." Nor was I disappointed in what I heard. Very eloquent indeed the sermon was. From the nephew and biographer of the great American preacher, essayist, and philanthropist I naturally expected something good, and I received it. I do not intend to convey that there was anything strikingly original in the sermon; on the contrary, it seemed to me to contain nothing that has not been said again and again by thoughtful Christian men dealing with the doctrine of Materialism. But the address, taken as a whole, was nevertheless above the merit of ordinary pulpit discourses. Delivered as it was, with the deepest earnestness of manner, with considerable use of hands and motion of body, yet with gestures never overstrained and voice generally subdued and soft—the preacher making up in studied emphasis of certain words the effect which some less skilled and cultivated preachers would seek to convey by loudness of tone—the sermon was most impressive. As Mr. W. H. Channing stands on the preaching platform, his eyes mostly closed, the lower part of his countenance dwarfed almost by the capaciousness of the brow, the mildness of his delivery in keeping with the mildness of his appearance, he might be said to realise Chaucer's line, "He was a very parfit gentil knight." That he is an intensely earnest, pious man, an enthusiast almost in his religious observances, his manner, his every word seemed to indicate. There was nothing in the sermon from beginning to end that could not have been uttered from the pulpit of any church, high or low, within the bosom of the Establishment; and, indeed, for the matter of that, the most scrupulous Trinitarian might have assisted at the service, have joined in the prayers, in the chanting of the psalms, and the singing of the hymns without finding a single feature which he could not conscientiously accept. Those who imagine that Unitarianism is in any shape or form merely a cloaked form of Deism, and who would, therefore, deny the right of the denomination to be styled a Christian body, might be surprised to learn that there is scarcely a prayer offered up in which Christ is not spoken of as the Son of God, while the hymns teem with the most beautiful thoughts and exalted piety. The service, like that of the Established Church, is from beginning to end written. There are no extempore prayers—though, as I gather, these are not entirely forbidden. There are, in all, ten arranged services, and any one of these may be used at the discretion of the minister. The hymns are selected indiscriminately from the works of many authors, and without any reference to the religious views held by the writers—Pope, Luther, Bryant, Keble, Wordsworth, Heber, Toplady, More, Doddridge, Montgomery, Watts, Wesley, and many others being placed under contribution. And let me say, too, that the denomination is by no means deaf to the advantage of good music. On the occasion of my attending four years ago there was no choir, and the congregation were led by a harmonium indifferently played. Their poverty, however, and not their will, was responsible for this. They have grown, I presume, more numerous and richer since, for they have now a fairly good, though necessarily small organ, and a choir numbering about a dozen, the majority being composed of boys, who really possess good voices, and whose singing does credit to their training. On Sunday the words of the hymns were taken from Madame Guion, Conder, and Newton, the music being from the familiar "Hymns, Ancient and Modern." The psalms and responses were also sung; in fact, in everything in which it was possible to use music music was introduced.

Two texts were taken by the preacher—"My presence shall go forth with thee, and I will give thee rest," and "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." Is it an unreality, an illusion, asked the preacher, that the living God is the centre of all things? No, there was no unreality, no illusion; there was nothing on this earth so real as the glory of God in Jesus Christ. But we see in our day bodies of men and women rising who tell us that all this is a mere mirage, that this inward enthusiasm and outward practice are opposed to the hard facts of science, and that nothing can be accepted which cannot be proved. We see Socialism shaking Germany to its base, and Nihilism bursting forth in Russia. On this very day one of the most eloquent men in London was standing before a body of working men, to tell them that there is no God, no heaven, no life but this, and that we should make the best of it. Terribly real indeed is all this, and more terribly real still is it that some of the bravest, the strongest hearts are being swallowed up in it. Only a short time ago he was travelling in a railway carriage with one of the most able men in Great Britain. And what said this gentleman? Simply this—that it is all an illusion. He found mankind ground down in sorrow and sin, in vice and misery, and that the utterances of religion are worthy of no answer, but should be met with scorn. Most sad is all this; but they would find God is in earnest, terribly in earnest, and they must be earnest also in following out a deep religious life. He (the preacher) did not fear the discoveries and the progress of modern science. On the contrary, he looked upon scientific progress with intense joy, and welcomed every new addition to our scientific knowledge. Not a fact that has been advanced by scientists but has brought to him joy. Never has the shadow of a doubt disturbed him as to God being the real life. It is only two summers since one of the most learned men of this country, turning to a believer, said, "I have entered deeply into modern sciences, but I would give up all I know if I could only have your real experience of living in the belief of God." And they might depend upon it that is the feeling of very many men of science of the present day. But if we would know God we must first find Him in ourselves. We shall then fear no illusion, or fail in the effort of reconciling the discoveries of modern science with true religion. Proof is asked of the reality of God and of religion. But where is the proof of science itself? Is it not, according to the logic of the sceptics themselves, all an illusion, all an unreality? It was not the music which they heard this morning, but a little vibration which struck on the ear—it was not the light which they saw streaming through the windows, but something else. This very outward world is an illusion. They said they were husbands and wives, fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers. They felt they were in that building this morning listening to his voice, but let them prove it if they can; let them prove even their own existence. He would say to them, they could not do it. They would, however, continue asserting that these things were real. Very well, then, there was no appearance in this outward world which to him was so real as the living God. Had they ever tried to make the false true, wrong right, good bad, ugly beautiful, discord harmony? If they had not, let them attempt the effort, and they would find the more they tried the more truth came uppermost. What was this but the wonderful power of conscience which scientific men had tried to explain as only a higher form of intelligence? It is now as it was in all ages, and will be to the end. We could not wrong another for our own good without our inmost spirit reproaching us for the evil which we do. By all the power and will which we possess we can never make selfishness to be right. The power of gravitation is but a trifle to that power of conscience. God is all good, and that goodness in ourselves, in the very centre of our being, declares to us that we are the children of God. The preacher, in concluding, quoted the examples of several personages who have left their names written indelibly in the world's history, with the view of showing that the very inspiration which moved on to great efforts and great deeds—such as Michael Angelo painting in the Sistine Chapel, Newton working out the "Principia," Dante pouring out his soul in immortal metre, Elizabeth Fry sympathising and helping with sisterly love the most debased of womankind—was the outcome of man's personal communion with God.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Glossop pulpit, vacant by the sudden and deeply-regretted death of the Rev. Frederick Ashton, M.A., in April last, has been offered, by the unanimous invitation of the congregation and the East Cheshire Christian Union, to the Rev. Wm. Harrison, of Swinton, who has signified his acceptance, and will enter upon his new duties on the first Sunday in December.—At a meeting of the members of the congregation at Boston, held in the schoolroom on the 11th inst., Mr. W. S. Key, of Bilston, was unanimously elected the minister, and will enter upon his duties in the middle of September.

BELFAST: HOPETON-STREET.—It was considered advisable this year to give the children an indoor treat instead of their annual "day in the country," and the teachers, scholars, and their friends (numbering about 120) assembled on Friday night, the 23rd inst., in the schoolroom. After the tables had been cleared one or two hymns were sung, Mr. C. J. Street, B.A., presiding at the harmonium. Short addresses were then delivered by Rev. J. C. Street, Rev. Abel Buckley (minister and superintendent), and Mr. John Andrew (Leeds), the latter gentleman dwelling particularly on the temperance question. Mr. C. J. Street then amused the children by reading a fairy-story called "The three wishes." With never-failing kindness Mr. Robert McCalmont sent his magic lantern, and when we mention that among other subjects that beautiful story of "Jane Conquest" was illustrated, we need scarcely add the exhibition was both instructive and enjoyable. A vote of thanks to Mr. McCalmont and Mr. Nicholl (exhibitor) was then moved and carried enthusiastically by the children. A hymn was sung, and Mr. Street dismissed the children with prayer and benediction.

GLASGOW: SOUTH SAINT MUNGO STREET SUNDAY SCHOOL.—It was arranged to hold the annual excursion of this school on Saturday afternoon, August 17th, but the weather proving unpropitious it was postponed till the following Saturday. A goodly number of scholars, parents, and friends turned out on the occasion, and, though the day was again somewhat unfavourable for outdoor amusement, made an excursion to Shuttleston, a few miles distant from the city. Here the party had the use of a field (kindly granted for the purpose by a neighbouring farmer), which, though rather wet and slippery, was the scene of various games and races. A substantial repast was also enjoyed, in the shape of tea, milk, and eatables. Nothing occurred to mar the proceedings of the day, and the party returned homeward apparently well satisfied with the day's outing.

HULME: EMBDEN-STREET.—One of the most enjoyable excursions of the season in connection with the Domestic Mission took place on Saturday last. A number of teachers and friends went to Harpurhey, thence through the romantic Boggart Hole Clough on to Blackley school, kindly lent for the occasion. About forty persons sat down to tea, including many of the teachers of Blackley school, by whom we were heartily welcomed. After tea, out-door amusements were entered into with great spirit until dusk. The party then assembled in the schoolroom to enjoy themselves. The secretary of Blackley school, Mr. Evans, gave a hearty and brotherly welcome to their friends from Hulme. The Rev. J. Harrop briefly responded, expressing an earnest desire that ere long the Hulme friends might have the gratification of returning the compliment. During the evening a new game was introduced, arranged by the Rev. J. Freeston. The party broke up by singing "Scatter seeds of kindness," which brought to a close a most happy and enjoyable meeting.

LIVERPOOL: NORTH END MISSION.—The annual exhibition of the Window Gardening Society was held on the 23rd inst. The unpropitious weather reduced the number of plants brought, but otherwise the show was creditable. Mr. Kemp once more kindly awarded the prizes, which were distributed by Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, who presided and spoke. A programme of songs, &c. made a pleasant evening. 175 plants were exhibited, and about 175 children and friends were present.

NOTTAGE: GLAMORGANSHIRE.—A concert was given here on Friday evening, August 16th, on behalf of the fund for clearing off the chapel debt, under the direction of the Rev. J. B. Lloyd, of Knutsford, youngest son of the venerable minister of the place, the Rev. Titus Lloyd, who is now in the fifty-fifth year of his pastorate of this congregation. The concert proved eminently successful both musically and financially, the sum of £6 or over being realised, after all expenses had been paid. The principal vocalist was Miss Lizzie Williams, R.A.M. Songs and duets were given by kind friends, and some part music was rendered very creditably by the Nottage choir. Now that winter is approaching it is a comfort to think that gas has been introduced into the new chapel, and the debt remaining will not exceed £10.

PENDLETON.—On Sunday last two stirring sermons were preached to good congregations by the Rev. Robt. Laird Collier, D.D., of Boston, U.S.A. These sermons cannot possibly fail to do good service to our cause.

SHEPTON MALLET.—The Rev. James Cooper has resigned the pulpit at this place on account of failing health, and will terminate his ministry on the 29th September next.

STAND: BURY SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The fourth meeting for the present year of the Bury District Unitarian Sunday School Association, was held on Sunday last, the 25th inst., at Stand. After tea the Rev. W. C. Squier took the chair, and a paper was read by Mr. Henderson, of Heywood, on "What are the duties of our Sunday school teachers?" He said that his idea of the object of our Sunday schools was the formation of religious principles. He did not feel disposed to agree that political economy should form a subject for the Sunday school, because we might begin with political economy, go on to experiments in chemistry, and from that to lessons in gymnastics and practice with the sewing machine; all very good things in their place, but altogether foreign to the object of our Sunday schools. We never think of going into a butcher's shop to buy second-hand clothes. Let them not play with their main object till they made the institution no Sunday school at all, but a mere debating club. The essayist urged teachers to ponder on the responsibility which they have undertaken. The knowledge that the future happiness and comfort of those under their charge depends on every word that passes through their lips, ought to stimulate them to painstaking preparation of their lessons. Let them guard against narrow-minded teaching; at the same time let them remember that their scholars are the children of Unitarian parents, who are desirous that they should learn their religious principles. An interesting and well-sustained discussion followed, in which Messrs. Greenhalgh and Schofield, of Ainsworth; Messrs. Dewhurst and Duckworth, of Heywood; and Messrs. Darbyshire, Allen, Holt, and Jones, of Stand, took part. The meeting concluded with singing and prayer.

TULLYGIRVAN.—On Thursday week a gala day in connection with the above school was held. About seventy pupils, together with a large number of visitors, assembled in the schoolroom, where the Rev. J. Jellie, of Farmhill, Carrickfergus, distributed amongst the children a number of valuable premiums, which had been raised chiefly through the instrumentality of Miss Sarah Frame, the faithful teacher of the school, and Miss Eliza Patton. Mr. Jellie congratulated the pupils on their opportunities and prospects. The national system of education, notwithstanding its deviation from the original lines and its present denominational character, had rendered invaluable service to the people of Ireland. He was hopeful that the intermediate education scheme, which was soon to be established, would prove useful to the country. That scheme might not be in all respects what they could approve of, but he thought it was their duty to give a fair trial to the tentative measure of the Government. If found expedient, they might eventually take the necessary steps for amending it. The children then marched to the residence of Mr. Wm. Joseph Scott, where they spent a delightful afternoon. Tea was served out in Mr. Scott's large store, which had been tastefully ornamented for the occasion. Towards evening, Mr. Hugh Frame having been called to the chair, a vote of thanks, on the motion of Mr. W. J. Scott, was passed to the Rev. J. Jellie "for the great interest he had uniformly evinced in the welfare of the school." On the motion of Mr. James Jellie, another vote of thanks was passed to Mr. and Mrs. Scott "for contributing so largely to the success of the entertainment."

RELIGION.

W. STRINESDALE.

RELIGION free, religion pure
From priestly cant, and a' that !
Its light shall burn aye brightly, sure,
In earnest hearts, and a' that.

Old cobwebbed forms and rotten creeds
Shall fade away, and a' that ;
And arrogancy's gown-grown weeds
Uprooted be, and a' that.

The gods of gold shall be upturned,
And broken lie, and a' that ;
Proud mitred pomp's vain gew-gaws burned,
Its tinsel show, and a' that.

The senseless bow, the wriggings east,
Robes black, and white, and a' that ;
The Pharisaic fast or feast,
Shall lumber-rot, and a' that.

Man's judgment shall no more be curst
With Church-made laws, and a' that ;
Truth, like a sunbeam, yet shall burst
O'er all the globe, and a' that.

His charters only those God-given
In simple truth, and a' that ;
His creeds, those holy ones of heaven,
Peace, world-wide love, and a' that.

'Neath love's own banner to enroll Crowds yet shall hie, and a' that ;
Spirit with spirit, soul with soul—
God's kingdom come, and a' that !

CARDIFF.

To the Editors.—There can be no doubt that if those who value religious freedom in Cardiff were to meet and open a subscription list, before twelve months a church may be open there. Let the men and women then show their zeal, the Unitarian public will support them.—Yours truly, W. C. EVANS.

THE LATE MR. SAMUEL RALLS.

To the Editors.—Owing to absence from home, and other circumstances, I did not see a notice of Mr. Ralls's death, or the well-deserved tribute to his memory in your columns, till some time after they appeared. Will you allow me now to add my mite of honour to the memory of a truly good man, whom I had known for more than thirty-five years as a devout and earnest labourer in his Master's service? When I settled, in 1840, with my first congregation (at Yeovil), I found Mr. Ralls one of the truest and kindest friends, as well as one of the most useful and regular of the Sunday-school teachers. After I left that town, in 1842, I often heard of his good works, and from the time when he returned to the town, as stated in your notice, in the employment of Messrs. Stuckey and Bagehot, almost to the very day of his death, he was unwearied in his labours there, both in supplying the pulpit and in keeping up the Sunday school. It is unnecessary to add more to what you have already well said, but I did not like to let an old and esteemed friend pass away without a word from one who had so long known his worth and valued his friendship. I had forgotten, if I ever knew, that Mr. Fawcett wished Mr. Ralls when a youth to study for the Christian ministry, though I am not at all surprised that the wish should have arisen.

But our friend's life was an illustration of how much valuable work may be done by a layman for the Christian church, and its specific objects, if his heart and life are imbued with the spirit of the Lord of that church, even under great hindrances.—I am, sir, yours obediently, Croydon, Aug. 23, 1878. HENRY SOLLY.

A TRIP TO PARIS.

To the Editors.—A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of reading Mr. B. Walker's letter, and with your kind permission I would thank him for the encouragement it gave to me to visit Paris, and now I wish to encourage others to do likewise from my own experience. I believe Paris to be one of the finest cities in the world. If visitors can raise six, five, or even four pounds (of course seven would go farther) I would advise them to go. It would be the treat of their lives, especially to to industrious working men. The exhibition alone is worth it; but add all Paris, Versailles, St. Clouds, and you have a sight worth the seeing. I am turned sixty-five years of age. To help me in my journey, I got dictionaries, phrase books, and maps, but never had time or memory to retain or use them. I think the Craven dialect is nearest French jabber. I got on exceedingly well, and always found the French kind and willing to help me. Englishmen are plentiful in all places just now, but it would be well if they could learn to be a little more courteous. I can live as cheap in Paris as in Manchester or London. I had, if anything, the most difficulty to find our chapel, but fortunately I got in time for English service, at eleven o'clock; the French service is at twelve o'clock. Mr. Spears was the preacher. I was rather surprised at the small attendance—little above thirty. The service was simple and devotional—such a one ought to have drawn a good congregation. The French congregation was about double that of the English.—Yours respectfully, EDWARD HALL.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN IRELAND.

To the Editors.—Your last issue lays before the public a signed letter under the above heading, which leads me once more to ask space for a correction.

The recent ordination of Rev. E. Crooks by the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, at Ballyclare, did not, as to doctrinal procedure, differ in any respect from any previous installations by the same Presbytery. The history of the Northern Presbytery is not a long one, and its methods are easily ascertained on inquiry. Your correspondent speaks of Mr. Crooks having "taken time by the forelock," and so escaped "the necessity of having the usual questions put"—"public questions," he calls them. Here is the plain fact: there are no usual questions. No doctrinal questions whatsoever have at any time been formulated by the Northern Presbytery. No doctrinal questions whatever have yet been put, publicly or privately, by the Northern Presbytery. I am not arguing the inadmissibility of such questions; I am merely stating the hitherto unvaried usage of our ecclesiastical body.

Most certain is it that our Presbytery admits no candidate unless, to use its own language, it be first "fully satisfied" on certain matters; and among these are matters of faith. Nor does our Presbytery stand alone in this. Every Unitarian congregation in the United Kingdom satisfies itself in its own way that the candidate for its ministry is such as it approves. Our congregations do not exact pledges; but they do ascertain facts; and nothing is more certain than that they will not elect a minister in case they be dissatisfied with the condition and tendency of his theological mind. Now Presbyteries have absolutely no powers but such as congregations choose to endow them with; and among us in Ireland the Presbytery is expressly charged by the congregations with the duty of certifying, within given limits, a candidate's qualification. Again, I do not argue for the Presbyterian function; I do but describe it. Our Presbyteries (even those, if any there be, which, contrary to the use of the Northern Presbytery, employ a definite formulary of public interrogation) are all Non-Subscribing; inasmuch as they do not, in any shape or form, exact any pledge of belief. As you well observe in your recent leader: "Non-Subscription has never meant that one . . . made no profession of his opinions."

Mr. Crooks came to our Presbytery from the Manchester Unitarian Home Missionary Board. On applying for admission to that institution he was asked, in common with all other candidates: "Are you prepared to sign the following declaration?—I (A. B.) hereby declare that I solemnly intend, with the blessing of 'The only True God,' to devote myself to the work of preaching and extending the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. Here is a distinct engagement, embracing points of doctrine and of controverted doctrine. Had he not accepted it, and so placed himself among "those candidates whose applications and certificates are satisfactory," he would never have been admitted to the preliminary examination.

On leaving the Board and coming to us, Mr. Crooks was informed of the standing rule of our Presbytery, not to admit any candidate unless we be satisfied "that he believes in Christ's divine mission and authority as the Son of God and the Saviour of men; and that he believes the Scriptures to contain a Divine revelation." He very frankly expressed, in language of his own choosing, a general unanimity with us on these points. We received his assurance in the spirit in which it was proffered, as the trustworthy utterance of a Christian brother. We never asked him, or wished him, to subscribe any formula, or to answer any questions. Now, if I may take the signed declaration exacted by the Board as exemplifying what you call in your leader "the principle of non-subscription . . . in the sense usual among Unitarians," and the requirements of the Northern Presbytery as interpreting "the limited sense in which it applies to the Non-subscribing Association," I confess I cannot perceive that, in advancing from the one to the other, Mr. Crooks has forfeited any liberty of speech, thought, action, or development.—Faithfully yours,

ALX. GORDON.

DOING AND SAYING.

The new Dutch education law, sanctioned by the King, excludes the Bible and religious teaching from primary schools.

The Standard contains the description of a remarkable series of services held on Wednesday week at a Protestant monastery, Old Kent Road, London, established by a clergyman of the Church of England. In the evening, the report says, a service not recognised by the Anglican Church took place, the chief officiating priest wearing a gorgeous cape of white silk.

M. Jules Favre has a curious case on hand. A Freethinker in Paris had a large legacy left him by an injudicious relative, on the condition that the legatee should hear Mass every Sunday. The will did not specify whether it should be High or Low Mass; so the unbeliever chose the latter, going at five o'clock on a Sunday morning, and in disguise. The family dispute the will on the ground that he only complies with the letter and not with the spirit of the instrument. M. Jules Favre is retained for the defence.

The restoration of the ancient cathedral in Pisa is now complete, and has been very carefully and faithfully executed with all the skill that characterises the unequalled marble-cutters and mosaists of Italy. The little gems in mosaic which adorn the narrow friezes above the rows of light galleries forming the ornamental front of the cathedral have in particular been most admirably renovated, and now have a very beautiful effect. The restoration of the Leaning Tower also has now reached to the upper part or belfry, and is being very satisfactorily carried out.

The Ultramontanes are determined to regard the Irish Intermediate Education Act as one step in a series of changes to be initiated by the Beaconsfield Cabinet for lavishing state funds on a denominational system under the control of the priests. "The Board of Commissioners named to carry out the Act" is certified by the Weekly Register and Catholic Standard to be "one which may be confidently expected to adopt every means to secure the greatest possible benefits from its provisions;" the writer adding, "The corollary of the Intermediate Education Act is the establishment of religious [Catholic] university education in Ireland."

Mr. Humphrey Sandwith, the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, writes:—"At the present moment it is most likely that there will be a sudden and brisk trade in slaves at Cyprus. The Turks well know our dislike of 'the institution.' The owners of property in human flesh will take alarm, speculators from Constantinople will go over and buy the slaves, but this traffic will be only temporary." What is Sir Garnet Wolseley doing that the traffic should now be possible at all? If Sultan Seyyid Burghash hears of this, he will sympathise with Sheik Wolseley:—"Conservative party very strong in Cyprus, as well as in Zanzibar!"

The winter's work in connection with the Manchester and Salford Street-Children's Mission was commenced on Wednesday night, when the first children's supper was given. There is no more useful department of the Mission than that in which destitute children are fed, and it is hoped that the annual appeal of the hon. superintendent, Mr. A. Alsop, which has just been issued, will be so generously responded to as to enable the full programme of charitable work to be carried out. From October last year to March last about 1,200 children were fed weekly, between 26,000 and 27,000 meals having been provided and given to hungry boys and girls.

The Rev. John Landels communicates to The Baptist a circular letter issued by the Cardinal-Vicar of Rome, deploring the "importunity with which heretics of various sects" are pursuing their labours in that city. "Besides several temples and conference-halls which they erected in the most populous ways almost ad insulto, have been opened fully ten schools, not to mention several colleges and asylums." He gives notice that the major excommunication is incurred by those who "listen to the preacher with a mind to surrender to him," or take part in printing heretical books; while the architects, contractors, and superintendents who lend their work and labour for the construction and decoration of a Protestant temple are adjudged guilty of mortal sin. Commenting upon this circular, the Roma Capitale says, "These impotent cries, far from bridling the Protestant propaganda, ought rather to aid it."

In the report just issued, Miss Weston gives an interesting account of the work carried on by her at Plymouth in connection with the Sailor's Rest. The Rest has been in existence two years, and has proved that sailors can enjoy themselves ashore without intoxicating drinks. During the year no less than 14,892 blue-jackets and marines availed themselves of the lodgings which the Rest provides. Upwards of 100 beds had been supplied gratuitously. "Some of these," writes Miss Weston, "have been sad cases of lads who had come from distant parts to enter the navy, were from some cause rejected, and were consequently homeless; many have been brought by the police to the institute for shelter. Young England seems as fond of the sea as ever. Many a strange story has been gone into, and many a runaway boy restored to his home."

The Moravians appear to be losing ground in America, owing to the fact that their children when they grow up frequently prefer to join other churches. At the last conference, held in Philadelphia, resolutions were adopted on the subject of "How to retain the children of members." The first calls upon parents to exercise their influence and authority in the matter of the church connections of their children, and by direct and indirect means to see that they become interested in their own church, its services, history, missions, &c. In the second, they are reminded of the relations sustained to the church by its baptized child-membership, and they are exhorted frequently to remind them of this relation as they grow up, and the obligations growing out of it. Third, attention is called to the Sunday school, and the importance of training children in it under competent instructors. The Moravians have always been a missionary people, and they now have about 350 missionaries in the field, not counting the native assistants.

Cyprus is not the only place under British rule in which slavery still presents practical difficulties. The Women's Suffrage Journal of this month recalls some passages in a recent debate in the House of Commons anent the sale of women in Natal. The evil is even now on the increase. Formerly polygamy (involving the purchase of wives) among the Zulus was confined to a privileged class—to chiefs and other head men—but now the Natal authorities permit the practice among all orders of the people. Curious cases result from this state of things. In September of last year, a native of Natal, named Charlie Dingswayo, surrendered his property for the benefit of his creditors, and the sole asset was the price which he believed his infant daughter would fetch when she was married—namely, £50. A large proportion of the cases in the courts relate to the sale of women, and questions of property of this kind have often to be settled by evidence as to the sale of mothers and even of grandmothers.

The World recently had the following paragraph on Lord Beaconsfield's religion:—"Everybody knows how fond Lord Beaconsfield is of a surprise. One of the most intelligent Jews I ever met with said to me the other day, 'He has yet a great surprise in store for you, and it will be the greatest act of his life. He will die a Jew, and be buried beside his father in the graveyard of the Jews at Mile End. He was baptised by a trick of the poet Rogers, and no Jew is ever sincere in renouncing the religion of his race. He will die a Jew, I tell you.' There is something to be said in favour of this view; but I believe that the greatest charm of Christianity in the eyes of Lord Beaconsfield, and its firm hold over him, is contained in the fact which he has himself pointed out in the celebrated twenty-fourth chapter of Lord George Bentinck's biography, that one half of the civilised world worships a Jew and the other a Jewess. A man so strongly impressed with such a view as Lord Beaconsfield must no doubt feel that it feeds and flatters his pride of race quite enough to keep him true to the religion of his knighthood, and to make him content with burial besides his wife instead of beside his father.

Means of education are being abundantly provided in New Zealand. It seems that upwards of 600,000 acres of land are now set apart to provide funds for educational establishments. There is a university established with a Royal Charter; as yet it is only in its infancy. Having no examiners of its own it has still to conduct the examinations for degrees, through means of the professional staff of the colleges which are affiliated to it. The Canterbury College has received as an endowment 350,000 acres of land, judiciously selected in various districts, and producing a rental of several thousands per annum. In the course of years this will, no doubt, prove to be of enormous value. Besides these there is the Canterbury museum and public library, and various similar institutions in the country towns. Lectures are given in the museum; and it is hoped that, in course of time, the library will become as large, or at least as useful, as those of Melbourne and Boston. Twenty scholarships of £40 a year, tenable for two years, for students of schools, colleges, or under private tuition, have already been founded by the Board of Education, and it is intended to increase the number. At Dunedin, the capital of Otago, which is chiefly a Scotch settlement, the same eagerness for education prevails. There is a university and a school of art, a boys' and girls' high school, and district grammar schools; besides which there are atheneums and public libraries in nearly all the country villages. Here, as at Canterbury, large landed endowments have been made for the above-named objects. Two hundred thousand acres have been settled upon the university. The buildings have already cost £30,000; they are handsome and well situated. In the provinces of Wellington, Nelson, and Auckland, there are collegiate bodies affiliated to the University of New Zealand, and there are also provisions for elementary instruction.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE ARGYLLSHIRE ELECTION.

THE Scotch correspondent of a contemporary writes that it is the Nonconformist vote that has carried Lord Colin Campbell into the House of Commons; and of this fact both he and his father are well aware. The attitude of the Church party towards them has been as ungrateful as that of the Nonconformists has been magnanimous. A trenchant writer in one of the Glasgow daily journals puts the case admirably when he says: "There is not a man in the country who has done so much for the Established Church of Scotland as the Duke of Argyll. When his political opponents in 1874 introduced their Patronage Bill, he threw his powerful influence into the scale and greatly helped its passage through the House, in opposition to his own party, many of whom he deeply offended. He wrote by far the ablest articles in defence of the Kirk. He surrendered his extensive patronage without one farthing of the compensation the Act entitled him to claim. And what is his reward for all this? Why, the Kirk prefers an alien to him—one who has done absolutely nothing for her, and who would uphold her simply because when she falls Episcopacy must go next. Not only so, but she has nothing but abuse to heap upon the head of that nobleman to whom she is so deeply indebted." On the other hand, the Nonconformists, sinking their own just demand for the time being, gathered round the Duke's son with enthusiasm for the sake of the Liberal party and of the national wellbeing; and, as might be expected, this generous and patriotic conduct awakened a warm response in the heart of the Liberal candidate. Will it not also provoke a similar feeling in the breast of his father, the Duke?

The Freeman correspondent has good reason for saying that it has done so already; and he ventures to predict that the Church party in Argyllshire have secured for themselves in this election a loss which will be even greater than that of the seat in Parliament which they have been hoping to win. In other words, they have lost the Duke of Argyll.

DEAN STANLEY AND DISESTABLISHMENT.

THE Dean of Westminster is at present enjoying a stay of some weeks' duration in Scotland; and a few days ago he arrived at Rosneath Castle, on a visit to the Duke of Argyll. He will necessarily hear a good deal about the recent election in Argyllshire; and what he hears must be unpalatable, for it will let him know that Disestablishment is indeed a burning question in Scotland, and that the Liberal party are bound to take it up and make it the chief plank in their platform before long. The Argyllshire Nonconformists and that section of the Established Kirk Liberals who approve of Liberation have voted for Lord Colin Campbell to a man, in spite of his refusal to pledge himself as they would naturally wish; but his lordship has gone as far as they could expect a son of the Duke to go in the meantime, and they have his promise that he will be with Lord Hartington and the other leaders of the party when the question comes up for practical solution. While Dean Stanley is hearing all this explained under the ducal roof on the Gareloch here in the west, he finds that matters are even worse for his fondly-cherished views in that eastern district of Scotland from which he got his wife. A nephew of the late Lady Augusta Stanley is the accepted Liberal candidate for Fifeshire—the Hon. Preston Bruce, Lord Elgin's brother, who has distinctly declared himself to be in favour of Disestablishment. Sir Robert Anstruther, the present member, is obliged to give up all thoughts of standing for the county again because he has committed himself to the side of the Established Kirk.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

PRIV and protect the children! Even loving zeal for their welfare may overdo the business of technical religious instruction, as careless indifference may leave it underdone. The Sunday school, as commonly used by Protestants and Catholics, is a device for conveying into the minds of children, as of binding authority, the greatest possible amount of church doctrine and tradition. With some Unitarians, the wish is to use the Sunday school chiefly as a counter-device, to pre-occupy our children's minds with our body of doctrines and traditions, which, being early introduced, will be likely to hold their sway through life. Religious men of all names, however, would gladly throw the emphasis of such instruction upon the formation of character. But that is not a work to be attended to in an hour of the Sunday; it includes the entire regimen and discipline of the whole week, in study, industry, play, society, and solitude; and it includes every influence which in any way operates upon the child's dispositions and habits. The true idea of religious instruction covers all this ground, and seeks to make the child's whole "environment" as wise, kind, and orderly as possible.

But it falls in order just now to ask how we can best work the Sunday school. The proposal to dump into the minds of our children the contents of modern thought and modern scholarship, would crowd the little mourners quite as much as the most extended programme of ecclesiastical instruction. There is no danger of their taking it all in, but there is danger of creating discouragement and aversion to the whole subject. It is not the latest theories about religion which the children need, but religion itself, interpreted in the clearest light we have received, ancient or modern.

Quantity is far less important than quality. Is it not enough, at first, to offer a few simple, self-enforcing truths, accompanied with life-sized illustrations in the way of good example, and to add line upon line and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, as the years go on?

Even the simplest truths must be gently administered, and often repeated under many a pleasant guise. The Sunday school where one happy hour is spent under good, pure, and winning influences, leading on gradually but surely to a reverent familiarity with those shining realities which have most helped their elders, is far better for the children than the Sunday-school where they are wearied and bewildered with many things beyond their understanding, even though these be equally true. Haste hinders; let them take time to grow.

Nor is it enough to teach something about God, and Christ, and the Bible. Good grain may be made into bad bread; truth itself may be made both unwholesome and unpalatable by unskilful spiritual cookery. We must not teach that which is not warranted by our own insight, and which we cannot verify to the child's insight. It will do no good; it will do harm; it will create stumbling-blocks for both the conscience and the reason. How many there are who spend half their life in painfully unlearning the ill-considered theology taught them in early years! How many who are embarrassed by the consequent struggle of confusing and conflicting ideas, even when they try to pray!

As for doctrines in dispute, it will generally be time enough to answer questions when asked. And when the questions are asked, let us give honest answers. Our confessions of ignorance and difficulty are quite as instructive to the child as anything we have to offer; the sense of mystery and dependence on unknown Power will work no more harm to little people than to large ones. If children are once inspired with love of truth, it will no more hurt them to think freely on matters of religion than to think freely on matters of neighbourhood geography. Unless the mind is pre-occupied with the absurd theory of verbal inspiration, the foundations of reverence and faith are no more unsettled by a discovery of contradiction or improbability in the Old or New Testament, than confidence in mathematics is disturbed by a discovery of error in the printed arithmetic or algebra.

Only let nothing be forced or hurried. Both the intellect and the moral nature are hurt by over-stimulation. "Silence and slow time" have their appointed work in the juvenile mind as truly as in the growth of civilisations and philosophies. The prophets of the future cannot be manufactured to order by educational machinery. Hands off, and give the Spirit a chance to do its own work in its own way.

We greatly need manuals of instruction, based on well-considered principles—simple, sensible, practical, and true beyond cavil; but most of all we do need care in the selection of teachers. If it is the "power of personality" in Jesus which has created Christianity, it must also be the power of personality in the parent or the teacher which creates or awakens the deeper life of the child. Are the older people in our congregations—the fathers and mothers whose hearts have been touched by childward love, and who have deeply meditated on the nature and needs of the young—are they aware of the trust committed to them? or are they treating this whole business as of little importance? Might they not help the younger teachers by their presence, their counsels, and their "atmospheric pressure?" Still more might they help by home instruction, if only for a few precious minutes in a week. It must not be presumed that anybody and everybody who may volunteer is competent to serve as a guide in the ways of heavenly life, regardless of the fitness which comes from experience and sound knowledge. In any other matter but religion, we should say that teachers who have no very clear idea what they are about are little better than none. In no possible performance is there more pressing need of preparation—preparation of both mind and heart—than in this beautiful work of religious instruction, whether at home or at school.—Christian Register.

A SUNDAY IN GREAT MALVERN.

YOUR readers will be aware we have no place of worship in this beautiful health resort. There are churches and chapels for almost all denominations from the Establishment to the Lady Huntingdonites and Friends. When away from home it is always an important question how to spend Sunday. If there be a little Bethel where the worship is in harmony with your own religious conceptions, the question is at once settled for you; if not, you have the wide world before you.

It was a calm and beautiful Sunday morning in the early autumn, a fitting commencement for September. The bells of the old abbey church were ringing sweetly, calling to worship both old and young, rich and poor. As they gathered to this fine old church, which has stood for many centuries, I could not but think of the various messages each was taking to the common altar—some doubtless of joy, others of sorrow, disappointment, and sin. My steps, however, did not follow those of the multitude to the "Lord's house." I turned aside, and found my way up the steep slopes of the Worcestershire Beacon. Ascending a path through the shade of tall overhanging trees, made still more pleasant by the songs of the merry birds, and the church bells still sweetly sounding through the air, all habitation and traces of man were soon left behind, and around, on all hands, opened a glorious prospect.

Arrived at the summit, a feast awaited my eyes. A pleasant western breeze was blowing; the sun was pleasant, yet not powerful; and I had the testimony of others that it was more clear than usual. What an extent of country lay around, such as is rarely to be seen from one point! On the north were the Cleve Hills, in Shropshire. In the west were the Sugarloaf and the Black Mountains, in Monmouth; and, nearer still, the richly-wooded slopes and diversified country in the county of Hereford, with its chief town of that name almost hidden by trees. To the south lay the city of Gloucester, with its cathedral distinctly visible; while in the far distance was seen the glimmer of something which I was told was the Bristol Channel. To the south-east was seen the smoke rising from the towns of Cheltenham and Tewkesbury. As my eye travelled eastward, though I could not see, yet I thought of the little town of Evesham, with its chapel, in which doubtless at that moment the Rev. J. C. Odgers would be conducting service, and the genial and eloquent ex-president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association occupying his accustomed pew. To the north-east lay the city of Worcester, with its beautiful cathedral; below lay the level and fertile plain of Worcester. The contrast of scene between east and west is very striking. On the east the country for many miles is one flat plain of the richest land imaginable. On the west it is more diversified by hill and dale, alike richly wooded, and interspersed with cornfields and orchards. Such a prospect it is a rare privilege to behold in England, for it is not often from one spot thirteen counties can be seen.

There was a Sabbath calm abroad. A peace seemed to fill the air such as is to be found only on a Sunday, when men draw away for a short time from their common toils and cares. As I gazed on this glorious scene, I could not but think of Him who has tinged the heavens and decked the earth with such beauty; and though I could not then join with my associates in the set praise of Him after whom the heart of universal man pants, still my thanks rose in joyful strains in unison with the chorus of praise which seemed to rise from nature around. As I gazed on the earth beneath, how small did man and all his works seem compared with the glories with which I was surrounded. It was a pleasure to feel oneself thus raised above the turmoils of earth, where one could sit down and breathe more lightly, and obtain a larger view of the glorious earth on which we live.

Such times come but too seldom in our modern life; still in the rest day which comes to us week by week, when the mill and counting-house and market are closed, when the noise of the anvil is stilled, and the lawyer forgets his brief, an opportunity is presented to us when, in thought, we can raise ourselves above the cares which tax and the toils which exhaust our energies, and by communion on higher things can tune our lives to a nobler service, our thoughts to a higher and holier praise of Him who besets us behind and before, and compasseth our path and our lying down.

LEICESTER AND DERBY.—On Saturday, August 17, a friendly game of cricket was played at Derby between eleven of the friends of the Friargate Chapel, Derby, and eleven of the Free Christian Church, Leicester, and resulted in a victory for the Derby friends.

IN MEMORIAM.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG WIFE.

CALM and peaceful is thy slumber,
By no trouble now oppressed;
Thou hast borne the heavy burden,
Now thy weary hands have rest.

Kind and faithful thou wert ever
As a daughter, friend, and wife;
Mourned by many, tho' so humble
In thy little sphere of life.

At thy place as scholar, teacher,
We shall miss thee many a day—
In our sorrow ever sorrowing,
In our happiness so gay.

In that home so lately hallowed
By a new tie still more dear, Baby lips can never utter Prattlings to a mother's ear.

Yet we know He doeth wisely,
All His might and love ordain;
And though clouds may now o'ershadow,
He will make life bright again.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

A RELIGION FOR THE PEOPLE.

No. I.

At the great Reformation, when the Founder of Christianity himself was in the field, we are told that the Common People heard him gladly. Now the common people are separated from the religion of the country. They are conspicuous by their absence from public religious services. In their homes the too well confirmed suspicion is that they say no prayers. If religion ever comes to them her visit is like the charity that stoops to them from a higher and happier sphere. She is a stranger with them and a sojourner, whose smile is too much the patron's to be the friend's. Religion, in fact is one of the luxuries they are permitted to taste in the time of sickness, like other luxuries; but it has no abiding place in their lives. Going among the people we find it so with the majority. Religion is a thing out of the way—above and beyond their way of life.

Such a fact deserves to be taken up as a most serious feature of the day, and the question is being constantly urged:—Why do not the people come to the churches? Why are they alienated from all communion with religion?

In answer to this question it cannot be said that we have here only one of the common phenomena of human nature. It cannot be said with all the history of the world before us, that there exists in the mass of people a want of capacity for religion. The case of a nation, whose religion is one of the luxuries of the more cultivated classes, is an exception to the general rule. If we go away from England and Protestantism we find almost everywhere else, that the masses are saturated with religion. They are not possessed of general knowledge. They are not especially illuminated in any other way, but they possess whatever illumination there is in the ordinary beliefs which are inculcated by their priests. In Catholic countries religion is not a strange and rare visitant. It is their own, and constitutes the one prominent point of their civilisation. Among the populations of the East religion is not an alien to the people; nor was it so with the nations of the ancient world. In all these cases, if there were persons who passed their lives as it were out of the pale of religion they did not belong to the multitude but to selected classes of the educated and refined.

Facts like these will require to be carefully reviewed if they are to be correctly interpreted. Some of the most evident explanations will not be found to hold good against a little consideration. Taking for example the case of the ancient world, it might be suggested that religion was received by the multitude and rejected by some of the educated class simply because the religion in question was a superstition. And the same remark might be taken by Protestants to apply to the case of Catholic countries. 'A religion that is full of superstitions is specially fitted for the masses. Protestantism is unsuitable to them because it is free of superstition'—so the fact that the common people in a Protestant country are separated from religion is accepted as a delicate testimony to the truth and excellence of Protestantism. This is a very plausible explanation of the case; but will it stand when all the facts are passed in revision? Now there is one example at least—but that the most momentous that history can show—in which the protest against the priestly superstitions of the time, and the appeal to whatever was most simple and spiritual in religion, was rejected by the wise and learned, while the poorer classes were willing listeners to the reformer's voice. It was not among the educated few that JESUS of Nazareth was able to find his disciples. On the contrary we read that the common people heard him gladly. And in the German Reformation and the Swiss and the English Reformation, while it was certainly the case that the majority remained for a long time attached to the belief and practices of the old religion, it was also as certainly true that the strength of the new movement lay in its hold upon the common people. In Scotland this was so manifestly the case that one man, JOHN KNOX, by the assistance of the common people who had joyfully received his most thoroughly Reforming doctrines—his most severe opposition to the old familiar superstition—was enabled to resist not only the whole weight of the governing powers of his own country, but the additional weight of foreign powers, and to save his country, and probably this country too, from the dangers of an invasion. A simple-enough Protestantism has served for a religion to many of the least cultivated races—e.g., to the negro population of the American States—whose ritual is only the music of very simple hymns; and whose symbolism is from the pleasant features of Nature and nothing else—landscapes "beyond the river." Or, again, let us go and try the experiment for ourselves among the inhabitants of our lanes and alleys, whose sad want of sympathy with religion we are specially considering. If we try with them the experiment of appealing to their religious sympathies, we do not find them altogether unsympathetic. We find that the majority of them have never abandoned religious truth. They both believe in God, and have a hope in God. Their absence from the churches has arisen from something else than the dullness of religious sentiment, or the aptitude for no religion that is not tricked out in gewgaws or made sensational with superstitions.

Looking elsewhere, then, for the explanation we are seeking, a comparison of the two cases brings out to view this broad distinction, that where religion has been embraced by the common people it has been presented to them as a public affair, while in the case, where they have stood aloof from it, it has been made a private affair. In the one case, whatever might be the ceremonial or the doctrine, the Religion was one, and for all. In the other case, instead of a religion for all, we see a number of close corporations. One must "join a church" in order to become connected with the institutions of religion. Now if there is anything against which the general sense of the people revolts, it is caste privilege. Appeal to their generous instincts and they are all ears. Speak to their deepest sympathies, apply the strictest rule of conscience, and the common people will listen gladly as they did to the words of JESUS. But the contention of parsons excites their ridicule. The exclusiveness of Church organisation repels them. They are made to feel that unless a man has the franchise of some religious guild he is left out in the cold. This is not a Religion for the People.

CHANGE AND GROWTH.

A SERIOUS hallucination possesses many persons that when they have exchanged a platform or a creed for one held by scientists or liberal thinkers they have become progressive. Transplanting does not necessarily imply or involve more growth. It may so disturb growth as to lead to permanent disease. This is still more apparent when the change is simply a new view adopted of the same subject. The fact always is that many partial views may be held of a subject, as of an object: for instance, of inspiration, or the being of GOD, or of the nature of prayer; and the adoption of one for another may not bring us a single step nearer the comprehension of the subject. It may even be conceived that the adoption of one partial view for another will involve retrogression. It may require that we go back to the old view or dogma, and give it a juster hearing. JOHN STUART MILL gives us an illustration admirably to the point, in his sudden leap from Benthamism to an antagonistic philosophy; and his later reaction by a process nearly as rapid. He started, or rather was started, in life with a philosophy, and afterwards collected the data out of which his theories should have been a growth. A new truth seems always to have found an exaggerated value as he saw it, in spite of his logical training. He was like the horticulturist who is tempted to repeatedly replant his grounds for the sake of each fine new fruit that he discovers. The result, as given us in Mill's life, is not an illustration of healthy growth, but of marked changes. His life was an un-Baconian fragment.

A healthy mind with healthy surroundings naturally comes under, or is under, the laws of growth, and not of change. The same illustration that we have given above shows the obligation of the soul to itself not to avow or defend a theory that is not reached by growth. JAMES MILL baptised his son into a creed of political economy, and refused him even reasonable data for a religious experience. The result was equally injurious in both directions. He was an antagonist of theology of which he was ignorant; and the zealous defender of a philosophy that he soon deserted. What we come to by a development, through facts and experience accumulated, can only be modified and enriched by further growth, as new rings are added to tree life. It is equal folly to refuse wider and more generous views and to toss aside all that we have thought or felt for the creed of another.

A growing mind is perfectly safe in the study of opponents. He has nothing to fear from TYNDALL, HUXLEY, and CARPENTER, but very much to gain and hope for. He moves, he receives, he enlarges; but he is never captured. Science can feed him; it cannot unsettle him.

He may embrace what he once could not because his growth reaches it.

Probably no more dangerous action can be indulged in than the thoughtless and hasty change of creeds or platforms. This, however, is rarely done; more seldom at least than is supposed. An apparent exchange of beliefs is generally a mere exchange of documents. It implies nothing subjective. It is an alliance formed with a party. It implies no more change of conviction than going over to POMPEY from CÆSAR. We have a church friend who has nearly gone the round of the sects. His label has been changed a half dozen times at least. But his views are precisely those that he inherited fifty years ago. He cannot alter, but he can transfer his allegiance. The only change wrought is in his method of saying his prayers, and the steeple toward which he points his Sunday footsteps. But supposing the case different, as it more often is; and that the pilgrim is thoroughly enthusiastic over each move; that, for the time being, he zealously defends special and peculiar tenets, belonging to his most recent adoption; and with equal severity condemns all others. The change is probably one of the emotions, rather than an intellectual conviction. His imagination has led him in the place of his logic. But there is no growth. Indeed, in most of these peripatetics there has been not even germination; at least of theological life. They have never actually believed anything; but adhered to many things. They navigate as barnacles. But supposing the case to be genuine transference of views; leaving the man in either case only as large as a sect or party or platform. Untrue to the law of development, which should govern the soul, he has been untrue to himself; and, having asserted too many opposites, the truth becomes indistinguishable. When the exchange is merely superficial, the knight of a dozen creeds loses the power of sincerity. He confuses the true absolute with the true according to his temporary platform, until he becomes essentially a liar. We have seen this habit pass over into a man's social character until, from unjust averments about antagonists and their theories, the man became false in matters of business. He lost his truth-sensitiveness.

To keep ourselves free for honest, sincere growth is certainly far more important than zeal for any special branch of the faith. Unquestionably the branches are growing, so that sooner or later they will touch each other in a cordial way and give friendly shelter to all manly, free, Christian independence. E. P. P.

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

HE IS GOOD TO ALL.

REV. THEOPHILUS PARSONS.

VERY various are these systems of religious truth; for they need to be so, that they may be adapted to the various states of those to whom they are given. No Christian men can doubt that Christianity is, in itself, better than heathenism, but it is better for some and not for all; and there is not and never was a heathenism which, with all its follies and falsities, had not in itself the means of salvation; and it seems only a reasonable inference, from all we see and learn, that this day as many persons find and use these means as there are those who find them in Christianity, and that they use them as effectually. We who have faith in this latest revelation must of course believe that it is in advance of all that have come before it. But we do not think that we, personally, are in advance of all that are outside our boundaries; and God forbid that we should be so blind as not to see in some of those who know nothing of our doctrines—or, knowing them, cannot see their truth—purity, charity, living faith, and excellence of motive and of conduct, before which we bow with reverence, and in which we would find examples and incentives.

THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.—Mr. Froude, in an article on "Science and Theology, Ancient and Modern," which appears in the current number of the International Review, sums up his hopes for the future of religion in the following words: "Man's nature is the same as it always was. Science has much to teach us, but its message is not the last nor the highest. If we may infer the future from the past, a time will come when we shall cease to be dazzled with the thing which we call progress, when increasing 'wealth' will cease to satisfy, nay, may be found incapable of being produced or preserved except when relegated to a secondary place, when the illusions which have strangled religion shall be burnt away and the immortal part of it restored to its rightful sovereignty. A long weary road may lie before us. Not easily will an inviolable atmosphere of reverence form again round spiritual faith to warn off the insolent intruder. Piety, reverence, humble adoration of the great Maker of the world, are in themselves so beautiful that religious faith might have remained for ever behind that enchanted shield, if imaginative devotion could have kept within bounds its wild demands upon the reason. Not till Catholics had piled superstition on superstition, not till Protestants had elaborated a speculative theology which conscience as well as intellect at length flung from it as incredible, did the angels which guarded the shrine fold their wings and fly. The garden of Eden is desecrated now by the trampling of controversy, and no ingenious reconciliations of religion and science, no rivers of casuistic holy water, can restore the ruined loveliness of traditional faith. But the truth which is in religion will assert itself again as it asserted itself before. A society without God in the heart of it is not permitted to exist; and when once more a spiritual creed has established itself which men can act on in their lives, and believe with their whole souls, it is to be hoped that they will have grown wiser by experience, and will not again leave the most precious of their possessions to be ruined by the extravagances of exaggerating credulity."

MR. SPURGEON AND HIS CONGREGATION.

UNDER the above heading the Daily News of the 26th inst. published a letter from Mr. Spurgeon to his congregation, in which occur the following passages: "This morning I found myself quite unable to rise, for I am afflicted in head, shoulders, and neck with fierce rheumatism. . . . I cannot tell why these afflictions are sent, but I entreat your prayers that they may be sanctified to my own growth in grace, and your edification." I am sure it only requires such a statement as this to insure the sympathy not only of the rev. gentleman's own congregation, but of the whole country.

This, however, is not the end I now have in view in referring to the above. I sympathise with Mr. Spurgeon in his present physical suffering, but more so with the mental condition he appears to be in. He seems to be in a difficulty as to "Why these afflictions are sent." He evidently can see no reason for their being "sent," and they are the cause of "grief" to himself and inconvenience to his congregation. My object is to point out where he may get the information he so much requires.

There was a book published by the late Andrew Combe, of Edinburgh, entitled The Physiology of Health and Education, that would give him more light on the subject, and clear up the apparent mystery; and there was another book published by the late George Combe, named The Constitution of Man, that would certainly give him more clear and satisfactory ideas concerning "the Great Father's will" than he appears to possess at present. He might thus learn that the moral Governor of this fair Universe rules his creatures by laws vulgarly called "the laws of Nature;" but as they are an institution of God they are Divine laws, and ought to be called "the laws of God in Nature." Were orthodox people taught this truth they surely would not treat them so lightly as they do, or ignore their existence, as Mr. Spurgeon seems to do.

Had Mr. Spurgeon studied the laws of God written in his Constitution, he would have made a retrospective search into his own conduct, and tried to find out where and when he had incurred the penalty he was then suffering, taken his lesson of correction, and been more careful in the future. For as no effect takes place without an adequate cause, therefore, I hold that Mr. Spurgeon must have exposed his body to a state of chill, and so infringed the laws of health, before it was possible for him to incur the punishment involved in the transgression.

In our variable climate a great amount of illness is incurred at this season of the year by sitting within the air current induced by an open window. People have got the "little knowledge" that "fresh air" is necessary, but they seem to be incapable of ascertaining really what fresh air is. They seem to think that in order to get "fresh" air they must have a strong current of "cold air" blowing upon them. The fact that they are thereby reducing the temperature of their skin to the point of chill—and, consequently, disease—does not seem to dawn upon their minds till they have infringed the law, and have already incurred the punishment!

They cannot too soon learn that hot air is not necessarily vitiated air, and that air may be perfectly fresh although it may be warm and comfortable. What an amount of benefit might Mr. Spurgeon's congregation—and all other congregations—receive were our moral teachers to study the Divine laws of God written in their Constitutions, and teach them to their flocks—not only regarding the laws of health, but all the other departments of the physical and moral world, as affecting man, both in his personal constitution and in all his relations to external nature. The pulpit might then reclaim its lost influence on the population as a moral teacher, and as a guide to the people in the paths of virtue and of rectitude, and unfold and vindicate the ways of God to man in a manner that has never yet been attained to. Man, for the first time, would be taught the life-giving truth that the beneficent moral Governor of this beautiful world demands sacrifice from none, but obedience from all; and that no amount of prayer and sacrifice can avert any of the punishment incurred by disobedience to the laws of our physical and moral nature. PHILO.

PREACHING ON APPROBATION.

Two men of business, who had just been dining together at a restaurant, and finding they had half an hour to spare, had retired to the fragrant, dimly-lighted room upstairs for a little quiet chat, and, not having joined the temperance reform, for the unforbidden indulgence of a small bottle of light wine. As one took out his indiarubber pouch, of course he opened conversation by informing his friend how very little he smoked now in comparison with what he used to do; whilst the other gave the proper reply—that, so far as his practice was concerned, he might as well leave off the use of tobacco altogether. As we believe there is an orthodox way of opening a game of chess, so we understand that disparagement of the practice is the proper subject for remark whilst lighting up. In a few moments a very respectable pillar of smoke was rising over them, when the following conversation ensued:—

"So you are settled with a minister at last?" said one, who resided in London, to his friend, whose home was in a distant provincial town.

"Yes, we are settled now, and worry enough we have had," was the reply. "Were it not that I am a Free-Churchman from principle, I think my experience during the last few months would have driven me away from my old Sunday home. A sermon used to be to me a message from God, but now I regard it as a sample to be analysed."

"How did you proceed?" his friend inquired.

"The first we heard 'with a view' was Rev. A. Primus. I thought him excellent, but because he was the first people raised objections. We lost a valuable pastor in consequence. Soon after we heard Rev. B. Secundus. He came highly recommended, but the whole service was so evidently conducted for effect that I was disgusted, and when he perorated with Whitfield's apostrophe to the angel of the sanctuary, I really felt angry. Yet I have since learned that he is a worthy man, but Christian work and probation preaching are two different things. The following Sabbath I was delighted. We had great expectation of Rev. C. Tertius. He was commended to us as the orator of the rising generation of preachers. His sermons were brilliant. After the day people hung about the chapel, saying, 'This is the man.' Nobody said, 'What must I do to be saved?' The next day one of our friends, who is an extensive reader, sent us a volume of American sermons, in which were both discourses verbatim. Then there was Rev. D. Quartus, who pleased several of us very much, and I know would have served us well, but he had offended some great man, who wrote to one of our friends saying, 'Don't have him at any price.' We then had strongly recommended to us Rev. E. Quintus. We sent a deputation to hear him at his own place, who reported most favourably of what they had seen and heard; we invited him to come on probation, and you should have seen his reply, it was so different to the letters we had generally received that we were aghast; he asked us to fancy what the Apostle Paul would have said had he been asked to preach on probation, and told us that when he entered a pulpit it was as an ambassador from God, not as a candidate for votes. When afterwards one of our friends saw him, and asked him how we were to choose a minister, he told him that that was our look out, not his. I wish we had secured him, for another church somehow or another laid hold of him, and his success there has been marvellous. But perhaps the oddest case we had to deal with was that of Rev. F. Sextus. When I heard him I could not make him out. He evidently had power, but seemed off the rails throughout the morning service. The only explanation I could form was that he was troubled by some irritating insect. He was nervous, but evidently was too cultured to be greatly alarmed at the intellectuality of our congregation. In the afternoon he called on one of our deacons and told him that the Independent minister was an old friend of his, and he had arranged to exchange in the evening. He said he had felt the morning's engagement to be like a civil service examination. The Independent friends said his preaching there was brilliant; but, of course, it was impossible to consider him any further."

"Now, would it not have been better," interposed his friend, "to have had a fair preaching match, and avowed it;—to have set apart some evening in the week, and heard two or three without the profession of worship; then having selected the best put him in competition with some others on the following week; somewhat on the principle of a Cornish wrestling match?"

"You must not be ribald," was the reply.

"Well, it would be about the same thing, only a little more honest. But how did your Sunday amusement come to an end?"

"We criticised Rev. G. Septimus, and rejected him because he was too profound, and then treated Rev. H. Octavius in the same way, because he was too shallow. We looked at Rev. J. Nonus, but the young ladies objected to his personal appearance. One was disliked because he came from a certain college, and another because he had been to no college at all. At length we grew heartily tired of the business, and there arose amongst us an unexpressed resolve to take the next that came, if anyway passable, and Rev. K. Decimus came just then and so we invited him. I think and hope he may do."

"I have often thought," said the other, after a pause, "that it would be well to have a small and well-selected committee of some of the wisest and most unprejudiced men of our denomination to guide churches in the choice of ministers."

"Exactly so," was the ready response, "but, as Mrs. Glass says, 'First catch your hare.' What provision can you make that shall ensure the committee to be what you describe? And probably when appointed, if they did their duty, they would be, before a twelvemonth had passed, the best cursed men in the denomination. The right principle of Free Churchism is to let such disorders work themselves out. Let those churches who consider drum-beating to be the highest harmony of spiritual life choose drummers to lead them and see where they will get to. Until there is wisdom enough to recognise a wise man, and truth enough to rejoice in a true man, and holiness enough to perceive a truly holy man, I gravely doubt if any committee-patching will heal the sore. It may, perhaps, be tried, and then look out for squalls. What our churches need to learn is that some of the highest qualifications for success as a probationer are just the most undesirable for a settled pastor. The principle that the church shall choose its own pastor is sound, and must not be interfered with. Independency is Scriptural, and must come right. Its defects are educational. For every ounce of mischief here there is a ton in Episcopacy. But preaching matches neither comport with Scripture nor common sense. To-day, I venture to say, piety, Scriptural knowledge, aptness to teach, experience, devotion to the work, and all that in theory we hold to be the highest excellencies of a pastor, are worth very little in obtaining an invitation in comparison with a healthy larynx, some lessons in elocution, a good share of impudence, and a volume of Dr. Witt Talmage's sermons. Happily now a few of our churches are beginning to perceive that between the men who can get and the men who can keep pulpits there is a slight difference worthy of careful consideration.—Condensed from the "Freeman."

TWO AND ONE.

THOU hast two ears, and but one mouth;
Remember it, I pray:
For much there is that thou must hear,
And little say.
Thou hast two eyes, and but one mouth;
Ponder the reason well:
Full many things thou art to see,
And few things tell.
Thou hast two hands, and but one mouth;
Nature has rightly done:
For she has given two for work,
For eating, one.

THE GERMAN STUDENT'S DREAM.

A NUMBER of friends had met to spend the evening in the house of a merchant, a bachelor, who was noted for a kind of hospitality which is always acceptable—namely, that of bringing a number of people together and encouraging them to expand their best selves under the genial influence of a good table, a cordial reception, and easy refinement. Among those assembled on the present occasion were men of various nationalities, who had been drawn in the interests of trade to the great English city. The conversation had settled down to a relation of the different experiences of those present. It had begun by a remark which some one made, that the current of our lives might be materially changed by incidents which in themselves seemed trivial. Many interesting anecdotes had already been elicited, when a kindly-faced German, who had not spoken much, but always to the point, said somewhat impressively, "And my life, gentlemen, was decided by a dream." The character of the speaker, together with his earnest manner, roused the curiosity of those present, and there was an instant lull of the conversation, when the host said, "Could you favour the company with your dream, Herr —?" The German merchant had no objection, and at once proceeded with the following narrative: My father was a small tradesman in one of the towns on the banks of the Rhine, it does not matter which. Having scraped a little money together, and being ambitious that his son should enter one of the learned professions—he preferred the church, but I chose medicine—he sent me to Heidelberg. I enjoyed the student's life much, so far as its pleasures were concerned, but not at all as regards its work. I got into a fast set, drank, gambled, and idled away my time for two sessions. At length my father, who was a shrewd man, and who soon found that I was likely to make no great figure, during a vacation gave me warning that unless I altered my ways he would spend no more money on me, and that I must either take my place behind his counter or otherwise "fend" for myself. Although things were in this critical position I could not refrain from my wild and reckless course, even in my native town. You may judge how mad I was when I tell you that in the same town there was a rich burgomeister's daughter, with whom I was passionately in love, and who, I had reason to hope, would marry me, if only I succeeded in my profession. Of that lady I will only say that she has ever seemed to me the wisest and best of women.

One night a party of us were carousing in a public-house, when one of the number chanced to relate the story of an English sailor having climbed up the outside of our church spire, with no other help than that afforded him by his silken neckcloth. In my boyhood I had been noted for my agility in climbing, and when one of the company called out that it was a shame that no German could be found to match that Englishman, I, inflamed with wine, at once laid a wager that I would accomplish the feat if anyone would provide me a good strong silk handkerchief. We all sallied out into the streets, such a drunken crew that now I blush with shame to think that I formed one of the party. We made our way to the church, meeting only a few stray wanderers, and I began the ascent. The old spire was full of pinnacles and crockets; and, urged on by the shouts of my comrades, I was soon a hundred feet above the ground. The moon was shining brightly, and they could watch my movements, though I could not, without great danger, look round so as to see them. All at once I heard shouting and scuffling, and afterwards I learned that the party had been dispersed by a patrol, our town then being under martial orders. It was impossible in the position I then was to turn back, so I pressed steadily on, wondering a little that I no longer heard the voices of my companions. At length, at about a hundred and fifty feet from the ground, I reached one of those ornamental openings which break the straight line of the spire. Here I determined to rest, and look about me. The spire, which was not a very high one, was solid from this point, so that inside the locarne there was a smooth floor just hollowed a little by the wind and the rain. My first thought was to look for my comrades. That they were gone was clear. Not knowing the cause, I was enraged at the meanness of the trick which I thought they had played me. After a little, however, the chillness of the air cooled my temper, and I began to look round. All the objects were perfectly familiar, but the general effect of the scene was marvellously new. I was still under the influence of the wine I had drunk, enough so to have an ecstatic sense of the wonder and magnificence of what I beheld. At my feet was the quaint old town, with its odd pointed roofs covered with tiles. A little further the Rhine flowed on in solemn grandeur, seeming in its silent strength able to sweep all before it. At a distance of a mile or so there was a ruined castle on a rock, which, small as it looked from my vantage ground, yet sufficient to break in two for an instant the seeming resistless flood. In the far distance the moonlight revealed to me the white peaks of the Alps, the shadowy grandeur of which no words can picture. My meditations on the water, broken by the castle rock, led to some others on the tide of human affairs and the power of the human will to resist the force of circumstances; and this led me to reflect on my own will, and how powerless it had been. The fumes of the wine being now spent, the usual depression followed, and the folly and wickedness of my life presented itself to my mind as it had never done before. My extreme exertions in climbing the spire had left me more than usually weary, so that, notwithstanding the strangeness of my situation, I soon fell asleep, lulled by the sougiug of the wind as it passed gently through the locarne.

I cannot tell how long I had slept when I began to dream. I thought I was in a dense wood, and that all around me was one mass of straggling, horrid, thorny jungle. The part I was in was a narrow glade, covered with soft turf and decked with flowers. I could see that from some of the branches of the trees there being long trailing vines bearing rich ripe bunches of grapes. The vines seemed to form a kind of screen, which hid all the outlets from the glade, and as I drew close to them they appeared to wave so as to impede my passage thence. As they moved to and fro, their rich clusters danced against my lips. I was not alone, for wherever I went a troop of satyrs followed, dancing round me and pulling me back when I made towards the outside of the glade. I thought that the branches of the trees seemed to grow with marvellous rapidity, waving their thorny arms in such a way as to tear my clothes and disfigure my limbs and face. Yet, whenever I sought to escape, the vines tempted me to stay with their rich clusters; and a tribe of creatures, with the heads and shoulders of women and the bodies of satyrs, drew me back with kisses and laughter. In despair I had seated myself on the log of a tree, and parched with thirst I had snatched at one of the bright bunches above my head. I was just putting it to my lips when a leafy screen parted, and I beheld the form of the burgomeister's daughter. I was struck with conscious shame at being found in such company, for one of the female satyrs had wound her arm round my neck in spite of my resistance. As the lady approached me, the creature shrank away with gibes and laughter. Then she whom my best soul loved seized the wrist of the hand which held the grapes, and pointing to it I saw the head of a snake hidden among the berries, its eyes flashing fiercely at us. I dashed down the cluster and rose in fear, and she, without speaking, led me out of the glade by a passage which seemed to open for her, the satyrs meanwhile mocking and howling as we passed out of sight. When we got clear of the glade, she picked up a lily and asked me to keep it for her sake. Then we passed together to a pleasant lane which led us to a highway, along which we walked. The vision then changed and gave place to another. I now found myself in the room of a small but pretty cottage. The maiden had become my wife. Around me were sons and daughters. It was evening, and I could see that one child was poring over a book, another was carving a piece of wood, another was playing on the violin, and one fair-haired girl was basking on the hearth. For myself I was standing, chisel in hand, before a block of marble, which had begun to show signs of becoming one day a bust of a woman. I seemed to be copying an exquisite statue, a picture of which hung before me, and the name of which was Truth. On the window sill stood a vase, and in it was my lily growing, now increased in size, and bearing a flower for each member of the family. As I was looking with pleasure on this picture of happiness, a mist seemed to come over it. Soon the room re-appeared, but there was a great alteration. Those who had been children were, all but the youngest, grown up to be men and women. On a couch at one end of the room there lay an old man with silvery hair which I knew to be myself. It was evident that I was dying, and my wife, now a grey-haired matron, stood with her children beside my couch. Tears were in their eyes, but on my face a smile. The lily was in its old place, and looked more beautiful than ever. The statue stood where it had done before, much fairer in form than in the previous vision, but still seeming as far removed from the perfection of its model as ever. On the stool beside it lay my mallet and chisel, which I seemed to commend to the use of my children. Besides my wife and children there stood near my couch a beautiful damsel. In her hand she held a laurel wreath. This with a pleasant smile she laid upon my head, saying as she did so, "For many years now thou hast guarded innocence and striven to realise truth. Owing to thy many virtues love has presided over thy home and now I, the Spirit of Patience, give thee an immortal crown as a reward for thy persevering pursuit of duty." Saying this she placed the crown upon my head. As she did so the scene faded away and I awoke. I found myself in the gray cold morning more than a hundred and fifty feet from the ground. I made what haste I could to descend, and returned home a changed man. I persuaded my father to let me return to Heidelberg, where I made up as far as I could for lost time, and took my place at length as a medical man. I followed the profession for some years, until circumstances led me to give it up and take to trade. As for my dream, gentlemen, I leave you to guess how much of it has come true. One part my wife says never will. She says the housewife will be taken before the husband. But for my own part I am content to believe in the dream. C. H. OSLER.

CURIOSITIES.

Louis XIV. said to Massillon: I have heard several orators, and been pleased at their discourses; whenever I hear you I am very ill-pleased with myself."

An Irishman, on being told that a newly invented stove would just save half his usual fuel, replied, "Arrah! then I'll have two, and save it all, my jewel!"

Somebody said to Fred Douglass, not long since, "By the way, Mr. Douglass, I have forgotten your age." "I am not astonished in the least," said Fred, with a laugh. "I have forgotten it myself,—in point of fact, I never knew it." In the good old days of slavery such trifling matters were not recorded.

A RAILWAY TALK.

CHEAP ANATHEMAS.

A correspondent writes:—I am glad to find some learned and enlightened men in the Establishment repudiating the dogma of hell as a place of everlasting torment. The outcome of mistranslated texts has caused great mischief in the Christian world. How many has it driven to insanity—called religious melancholy—like Cowper, the poet! How many hearts has it filled with sadness and slavish fear, causing them to be all their life subject to bondage! What a convenient invective may thus be flung at the man who differs in religious opinion the following incident will show:—I had been to London and was returning by one of the railways. A respectable looking man sat next to me and began a conversation: You have seen a great many changes, sir, in your time, like me. I am sixty. I answered, I am more than seventy. Indeed, he said, you wear well. Yes, I answered, thank God, I do. For one thing I have always lived a temperate life. I hope, he said, you are a Christian. Yes, I said, I am a Unitarian Christian. He exclaimed then, I am sorry for you; you will go to hell. I said, is it not very unkind to tell me that, because I may differ from you in opinion? If I was to say the same to you I should consider it very bigoted. Oh, he replied, I am no bigot. I said, I trust I am a Christian; I take Jesus as my guide and believe his words. This is eternal life, that they may know thee the only true God. The train stopped. Oh, he said, I must get out here, and flinging himself out, said, You are sure to go to hell. When he was gone I thought what a fine broad sort of a Christian he must be. What unhappiness he might create if his relatives dared to think for themselves on religious matters. Paul says if any man hath not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. Such men, with all their religion, want the one thing needful—the all-embracing love of Jesus, and a love that wisheth no ill to his neighbour. I am very much afraid that a great amount of the popular teaching in the present day called evangelical, powerful preaching produces many zealots and converts of such a type, which, amid all their fervour, hinder the simple and pure gospel of Christ, which is love to God and love to man.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

ACCRINGTON.—The chapel anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. Thomas Leyland, of Burnley, to attentive congregations. Collections in aid of chapel funds amounted to £8. 1s. 1½d. The choir sang an anthem at each service in a very effective manner.

AINSWORTH.—On Sunday harvest thanksgiving services were held, when the chapel was profusely and tastefully decorated with flowers, grasses, ferns, fruit, and grain. The large congregations were deeply attentive, and very much interested. Collections were made on behalf of a friend who has had much affliction for a long time.

BARNARD CASTLE.—On Sunday the 25th inst., the anniversary sermons of the Free Christian Church in this town were preached by the Rev. Chas. Well-beloved, of York. The congregations were good both morning and evening. On the day following, Monday the 26th, the anniversary soiree was held. There was a good muster of friends. After tea the meeting was presided over by Geo. Lucas Esq., of Sunderland. The services of the Rev. Chas. Well-beloved, having been acknowledged by several speakers, the meeting was addressed by that gentleman. The welcome to the Rev. W. J. Taylor was then given by the Rev. Joseph Lee, and several members of the Church. Mr. Taylor, in responding, alluded to what had already been said about the origin of the Church, some thirty five or thirty seven years ago, and reminded his hearers that the work of the church was especially theirs, and that his function was to be a helper to them as far as he was able in their mission as a church, and in their religious growth. The meeting was addressed also by the Rev. Wm. Elliott, of Sunderland, and Wm. L. Spencer, of Middlesbrough; and among others, by Messrs. Thos. Turner, Stephen Kirtley, and John Longbottom. The meeting terminated with the usual votes of thanks, a hymn, and prayer.

BLACKPOOL.—The Blackpool and Fleetwood Gazette (Conservative) contains the following pleasant reference to Mr. Camm's service: "We almost wished we belonged to the Unitarians on Sunday last, for the subject of Sunday morning's discourse in the Blackpool Unitarian Church as announced in the papers was enough to make the mouth of an intelligent man water. We don't happen to know the Rev. A. B. Camm, but we do happen to know a little bit about some of George Eliot's works, and we revelled in that new poem of hers longer perhaps than we had any right to do, having the immediate interests of the Blackpool Gazette in view. But what a world of strength one derives from touching even the very hem of the garments of such a philosophic writer. That Oxford common room, with the coterie of undergraduates discoursing sweetly

Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,
Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute Finding no end, in wandering mazes lost, is a luxury, and though it may have been 'vain wisdom all, and false philosophy,' there is something intoxicating in the very thought of it. We never repine at our lot except when we think of the intense joy Oxford culture and Oxford companionship would have been. It is a pleasure to know we have in Blackpool one public man who can 'rise to the height of the great argument' of George Eliot's latest work." On the occasion of the lecture referred to the chapel was quite crowded. The attendances generally have been very good, and the offertory satisfactory, on one Sunday amounting to £5. A harvest festival will be held for the first time next Sunday, when the little chapel will be decorated with flowers and fruit.

HUDDERSFIELD: FITZWILLIAM-STREET CHURCH.—Sunday evening last was the opening night of a series of musical services, to take place on the first Sunday evening in each month. The attendance was unusually good—crowded. The orchestra of the Philharmonic Society attached to the school took part in the service. This society numbers forty performers. It played in the hymns and anthems, and furnished the offertory and concluding music. The order of service was as usual, with the sole exception of the division of the one evening lesson into two—one from ancient, the other from modern Scriptures, by way of showing at once the unchanging and the changing elements in religious ideas. All passed off happily, and gave promise of still greater success in the future.

LONDON: CARTER LANE MISSION.—The re-opening services in connection with the above took place on Sunday, August 25th. The whole buildings have been thoroughly repaired, cleaned, and painted, and are in every way improved in the process. In the morning the Rev. J. Taylor gave the address of welcome to the Sunday-school teachers and scholars, and in the evening Mrs. Barrows welcomed the congregation in an address, entitled "Beautiful Homes—the Social and the Religious," earnestly entreating every member to show by their presence and help their appreciation of the home made so beautiful for the various religious and moral uses to which it was put; to think not so much of what others did or did not do, but of what was their individual duties; and so, in the true spirit of their great Master, cultivating the spirit that makes all homes beautiful and every life divine.

RAWTESTALL.—On Sunday last the chapel sermons were preached by the Rev. Wm. Elliott, of Sunderland, afternoon and evening. The congregations were large on both occasions. Many of the Newchurch friends came down, afternoon and evening, to hear and again meet with their old friend and minister of twelve years ago. Two excellent discourses were given by Mr. Elliott. The evening sermon was a stirring appeal to the young men of the day to be faithful to their high purposes and work. At the scholars' service in the morning, which was conducted by the minister, superintendent, and teachers, Mr. Hill read the beautiful sermon of the Rev. Robert Collyer, "Tender, Trusty, and True." The singing during the day was thoroughly congregational and hearty. The collections were considerably in advance of previous years, and amounted to £16. 3s. 6d.

STALYBRIDGE.—On Saturday last about fifty of the teachers and friends of the Sunday school assembled at half-past two intending to take a "botanical ramble" with the Rev. Joseph Freeston, but the weather was unfavourable. It had, however, been arranged that in the event of rain the party should meet Mr. Freeston in the school, so a number went to Stamford Park and obtained permission to gather a number of specimens, upon which a lecture was given during the afternoon. After tea the evening was devoted to friendly conversation, during which Mr. Freeston, by special request, gave a detailed description of his trip to Paris. The remainder of the evening was passed in various games, &c., the most striking of which was a kindergarten game, entitled "The Peasant," introduced by Mr. Freeston, which promises to become a general favourite.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—On Sunday special services took place in Unity Church, Westoe Lane, to formally welcome the Rev. Richard Cowley Smith, the newly-appointed pastor. The sermons, morning and evening, were preached by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Belfast, to large congregations, and in the afternoon the Rev. R. C. Smith officiated. On Monday a welcome tea was held in the schoolroom, underneath the church, when over 100 ladies and gentlemen were present. Messrs. T. Hornby and F. Waller gave a hearty welcome to the Rev. R. C. Smith, on behalf of the congregation. Mr. Myers also extended a welcome on behalf of the Sunday school; and Mr. Joseph Clephan, as representing the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Association. Addresses were also delivered by the Revs. W. J. Taylor, Wm. Stoddart, B.A., W. L. Spencer, J. C. Slater; Mr. G. Lucas, Mr. James Watson, and others. We reserve an extended report till next week.

AN EXPLANATION.

To the Editors.—Will you allow me to explain a statement which appeared in your last issue in connection with the report of the treat given to the scholars belonging to Hopeton-street Sunday School, Belfast. I am reported as the minister and superintendent. I desire to say that I have only undertaken the duties for three months, and after the first Sunday in October I shall be at liberty.—Yours truly, A. FAITH AND NATURAL LAWS.

To the Editors.—In the recent railway accident to the excursion train from King's Lynn to Matlock, eight out of the nine passengers who were much shaken—though not seriously injured—were told that it was a judgment for being Unitarians. A wag overheard the remark, and replied that if they had been Methodists they would have been all killed. We are not so superstitious as to imagine that any faith has a charm to ward off, or to resist, the effect of natural laws; but we do believe that a rational faith assists and educates mankind to avoid coming in contact with those laws that are injurious, and which people in their ignorance break, and of course inevitably suffer the consequences, though in this particular instance the sufferers paid the penalty caused by the ignorance or carelessness of others.—Yours obediently, A. P. ALLEN.

A NEW CAUSE FOR CARDIFF.

To the Editors.—I quite agree with your correspondent that there are sufficient Unitarians in Cardiff to start a cause, and should be willing to join him in working up a subscription list; and any suggestion you may be pleased to offer, I for one would be ready to act upon, hoping that others may be induced to come forward to assist.—I remain yours truly, GEO. PHELPS.
6, Windsor Road, Cardiff.

To the Editors.—As a resident in Wales I feel interested in the letters which have appeared in the Herald on this subject. In a town so large as Cardiff there must surely be sufficient intellectual material for a Unitarian congregation. Funds also to build a chapel ought not to be wanting. Organisation may probably be the only thing required. Would it be within the legitimate province of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to send an agent to Cardiff for a few weeks or months, to ascertain by personal communication with liberal thinkers, by public or other meetings, &c., what could be done there? Public lectures cause excitement, but do not build chapels, nor fill them, and possibly a quieter pioneer system might bring hidden resources to light. At all events, it is not creditable to our body that Cardiff should have no name amongst us. J. HUNTON SMITH.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN IRELAND.

To the Editors.—The point of my letter to you on the above subject was contained in the words, "It should be definitely known that no gentleman can be a minister of any congregation connected with the Northern Presbytery of Antrim unless by answers to questions, or by voluntary statement, he satisfies the Presbytery as to his opinions respecting Christ and Revelation. The Presbytery must be satisfied, or they will neither instal nor ordain, and without this action of theirs no man can settle as a minister within their bounds."

Mr. A. Gordon, though writing a letter which contains much irrelevant and debatable matter, supplies information which amply confirms my statement. He says: "Most certain it is that our Presbytery admits no candidate unless, to use its own language, it be first 'fully satisfied' on certain matters; and among these are matters of faith." In reference to the case of Mr. Crooks he says: "Mr. Crooks was informed of the standing rule of our Presbytery, not to admit any candidate unless we be satisfied 'that he believes in Christ's Divine mission and authority as the Son of God and the Saviour of men; and that he believes the Scriptures to contain a Divine revelation.'"

These statements are explicit, and they are satisfactory as far as they go.

Mr. Crooks gave the Presbytery the needful assurance—so did Mr. Gordon. Had not this been done neither of them would have been ministers of congregations connected with the Northern Presbytery of Antrim. Mr. Gordon supplies evidence that Mr. Crooks gave the needful assurance to the Presbytery. But your own report, in your issue of August 9th, is even more explicit. It says: "Mr. Crooks's application to be admitted a member stated that he fully embraced the principles held in common by the members of the Presbytery, namely, the Divine mission and authority of Christ, and the Scriptures a record of Divine revelation. This statement, cordially volunteered by Mr. Crooks, being considered perfectly adequate and eminently satisfactory . . . the Presbytery, according to its established usage, admitted Mr. Crooks to take his place among them without hesitation or further questions."

Mr. Gordon also gave the needful assurance. He did this in a letter addressed to Mr. Porter before he was installed at Belfast. He asks admission to the Presbytery "whose fundamental principles of association," he says, "I cordially and unequivocally hold, namely, the belief in the Divine mission and spiritual authority of Jesus Christ the Son of God, our Lord and Saviour, and in the Holy Scriptures of our faith, as the record of our Divine revelation."

No doubt both these statements were what is called "voluntary," but whether voluntary or not they were necessary. The assurances had to be given, and they were given. Mr. Gordon has supplied evidence that these assurances were necessary. I will supply more.

At the inaugural meeting of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, in January, 1862, a resolution was passed of which the following is declared by the oldest member of that Presbytery to be the most important part: "We do hereby declare that to license, ordain, or instal any candidate without being fully satisfied by his own explicit declaration, or by answers to questions asked, that he believes in Christ's Divine mission and authority as the Son of God and the Saviour of men, and that he believes the Scriptures to contain a Divine revelation, would be an obvious violation of our Christian duty, and unfaithfulness to the truth reposed in us, of training or sanctioning persons as duly qualified to instruct our people in the fundamental principles of the Christian faith."

You will note that either "by his own explicit assurance," or "by answers to questions asked," the candidate must satisfy the Presbytery. Inasmuch as Messrs. Crooks and Gordon gave the "explicit assurance," questioning was unnecessary. The result sought and gained was, however, the same. Both gentlemen entered their ministry through the door of the Presbytery, and both were obliged to give assurances as to their faith.

I do not here and now raise the questions whether the custom of the Presbytery is good or bad—whether it is in harmony with the general custom of our churches or not. I simply call attention to facts. These "voluntary" but necessary declarations of faith may be consonant with freedom—and may be Non-subscription—but at all events they are Northern Presbytery of Antrim-ism.

I think I have fully established my case, and that I have also shown that Non-subscription in the sense usual among Unitarians is not acknowledged by the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, and was not practised at the recent installation and ordination in connection with that body.

It is well that misunderstandings should be cleared away, and that paragraphs likely to mislead the unwary should not find currency in our papers.

JAMES C. STREET.

THE WESLEYANS AND THE REV. W. IMPEY.

To the Editors.—In reference to the above subject, and also as showing the spirit of petty intolerance towards Unitarians which some of our Wesleyan brethren are capable of displaying, I should like, if you will allow me space in your paper, to relate to your readers a matter that fell under my notice a few Sundays ago. I had been sent by our missionary tutor to occupy the pulpit of the beautiful little chapel at Belper, on Sundays, the 18th and 25th August. On my way from the Sunday school to the chapel on the last of those dates, one of our friends in Belper handed a circular to me, and requested it to be read from the pulpit in the course of the morning and evening services. As we walked along I read the circular to myself, and was pleased to find it had reference to some services in connection with the Wesleyans. It was an announcement that "Henry Vincent, Esq., of London," would on Sunday, September 1st, preach two sermons in the Wesleyan Chapel, Belper, and that on September 2nd Mr. Vincent would deliver his celebrated lecture on "Civil and Religious Liberty." The collections at the sermons, and the proceeds of the lecture, were, if I recollect right, to go to some building fund of the connexion, so there was the customary appeal for the support of friends appended to the circular.

I was pleased to think there existed such a friendly feeling among the different denominations in Belper, that Unitarians and Wesleyans read one another's notices from their pulpits, and at once congratulated the gentleman who had handed me the circular on the happy state of affairs, and expressed the pleasure it would afford me to read the notice. But as I proceeded with my compliments a broad smile was overspreading my companion's face, and on their conclusion he effectually cleared away my hastily-formed opinion as to the happy state of denominational matters in the little town. The liberality and kindness, I was assured, were all on one side; that, however much they were appreciated by the Wesleyans, they were not repaid in kind. The Unitarians had as much reason to expect the Wesleyans to fly as to read any Unitarian notice from their pulpit. More than that, if a meeting, say of "Good Templars" or of any society in which the Wesleyans are known to take an interest, is announced to be held in the building used by the Unitarians as a Sunday school, the Wesleyans stay away, and avoid the place as if it were a Lazar-house.

Of course I read out the announcement at the close of the morning service, but in doing so the title of Mr. Vincent's lecture—"Civil and Religious Liberty, with special reference to Papal Infallibility," &c., fell with a sinister sound on my own ears, for you must know I had read in the previous day's Manchester Examiner the Rev. Mr. Impey's letter to Dr. Punshon. The picture of Mr. Vincent vigorously pelting the Papists in the presence of an admiring and applauding assembly of Wesleyan Methodists was so inexpressibly comic, that it was all I could do to preserve my gravity. Pray, what difference is there between the claim of infallibility set up by a Pope, and that set up for the Wesleyan Standards by the Conference, and for the calling in question of which Mr. Impey has been expelled? If there be any I should think it was in favour of the Pope, the head of a Church around which have gathered the venerable associations of centuries, and compared with which Wesleyan Methodism is a mushroom of last night's growth. But, sirs, before the time for evening service had arrived, the ludicrous aspects of the circular had become in my mind overshadowed by the pathetic. I then seemed to see an old man alone, deserted by those whom he had served so long and so well, his forty years of faithful service unrecognised, and all because he can no longer, if he is true to conscience, teach his African brothers and sisters that God, the Universal Father who makes his sun to shine and his rain to fall on the evil and the good, has prepared a "bottomless pit, filled with fire and brimstone," in which to torment to all eternity some of his hapless children. Can the educated and intelligent laity of the Wesleyan Communion believe such a shocking statement to be true? Nay, do Dr. Punshon and all the reverend members of Conference believe it themselves?

Is Mr. Impey only another victim offered on the shrine of the prophecies to keep things quiet a little longer? Time will show.—I am, yours obediently, Cheetham Hill Road, W. MASON.

DOING AND SAYING.

The Echo states that in the Mackonochie case notice of appeal has been given both by Lord Penzance and the complainants, but the appeal cannot be heard before November.

Cremation becomes optional in Gotha on Oct. 1, and a building has been erected for the purpose. The body of an engineer named Stier will be exhumed, and will be the first to undergo the process.

Mdlle. Marguerite Gidel, the daughter of the Principal of the Henri IV. College, has just passed the first part of her examination as Bachelor of Arts at the Paris Faculty of Letters. The young lady is only sixteen years of age.

If the erection of chapels is a test of progress, Protestant denominations are making headway in Rome. A third Baptist meeting-house is shortly to be constructed. There are now nine different evangelical bodies in Rome; but the number of organisations is somewhat disproportionate to the total number of Italian adherents, which is only 700.

The Manchester Guardian announces that a weekly newspaper, La Guerre Sociale, is about to make its appearance in London in French and Italian. It would probably obtain few readers in English, judging from its own statement of principles. It is to be "frankly Socialist," to advocate Communism in its most extreme development, and Atheism of the most pronounced description. The Graphic characterises the prospectus as containing "frothy absurdities."

Those persons who have a knowledge of the subject consider that a split is imminent among the Ultramontane or Clerical party in Belgium. The Constitutional Catholics will publicly separate themselves from the Syllabists, and form a new so-called "Catholic Constitutional party," under the leadership of the former Minister for Public Works, M. Bernaert. They believe that they will be countenanced by the Pope, and this seems to be a well-founded expectation.

The Rev. Brooke Lambert has resigned his office of vicar of Tamworth, because he has sustained serious pecuniary losses, and he contemplates devoting himself to more remunerative work. Mr. Lambert says he belongs to a profession which seems as a rule to reward those who belong to it in inverse ratio to their work. The living of Tamworth is worth £135 per year. The position is an important one, the population being about 8,000, and the parish church having accommodation for more than 1,300 worshippers.

It does not appear from what has yet come to light that the negotiations between the German Chancellor and the Papacy have hitherto proved successful. It would be greatly underrating the proved tenacity of both parties to suppose that either is prepared to make such concessions as would render a satisfactory bargain possible. Whatever mitigation in retail Prince Bismarck is willing to concede as regards the Falk laws, he is not likely to abandon his resolution that the State must be recognised as supreme in ecclesiastical affairs within its own borders. On this fundamental point the Papacy is equally determined the other way.

Indian journals while loudly protesting against the Vernacular Press Act do not despair of the future. The Indian Mirror, in publishing Sir Arthur Hobhouse's remarkable Minute on the Bill, says:—"It strikes us as something strange that so much good and sober sense was absolutely lost upon the warped feelings of his colleagues. The Vernacular Press Act has been passed and essentially modified; but we are convinced that so long as England can boast of one statesman like Mr. Gladstone and one lawyer like Sir Arthur Hobhouse, there is no danger that India will be afflicted with continued despotism."

Another somewhat scandalous sale of a living is just now engaging public attention. The cure of the souls of the wealthy people who attend worship at St. Paul's Church, St. Lenards-on-Sea, was in the market for £6,000. In this case the attraction is that the congregation is "large and influential," and the offertory brings in £2,000 per annum. The successor of the apostles, who evidently "knows how to abound," and to whom this living belongs, has, it appears, been in antagonism to the Ritualistic party, and they are not reticent. So, between the Church Times and the Rock, those who delight in scandal may obtain it in abundance.

Temple Bar contributes to the supply of literature about our new colony a very readable article entitled, "A Fortnight in Cyprus." Some interesting remarks on native manners and customs are made. "The native trading community consists of Moslems, Jews, and Christians. Of these a European merchant can nearly always believe the first on his simple word; the two latter he can rarely credit on oath, and the harder they swear, the more certain one may be that they are stating what is not the case." When, however, the Eastern Christian receives visitors in his own house, he does so "with a kindly courtesy, which Englishmen of all classes might, with good reason, envy."

In a letter to a York gentleman, Mr. Bright says that the drink question has become a political question, and "the unscrupulous political party will take care that it shall remain so." The right hon. gentleman prophesies that the alliance between drink and the Tories will continue. Mr. Bright adds that he himself had some plan of reform on this subject in his mind, but there seemed yet no suitable time for saying anything in public about it, as foreign policy had filled men's minds to the exclusion of all matters of home and social interest. With regard to the Permissive Bill, the right hon. gentleman condemns it as a great error. It is not, he says, a good bill. Men anxious for something to be done were forced to vote against it, while almost all who voted for it condemned it in private conversation.

The Manchester City Council at its meeting last week resolved to open their libraries on Sunday. Accordingly the reference departments of the six free libraries were thrown open to the public last Sunday afternoon. At the central establishment there were about 250 readers, a number comparatively much larger than the average for week days considering that the library was open from two o'clock in the afternoon till nine at night, instead of from ten till nine, as on week days. Mr. Sutton, the assistant librarian, noticed the interesting fact that all but about a dozen of the readers were persons whom he did not remember seeing in the library before. The majority was almost equally composed of working men and clerks, but a considerable minority consisted of travellers, accountants, artists, chemists, and other persons of high-class occupations.

Lord Dartmouth's rather silly attempt to give the movement of the agricultural labourers a flavour of Atheism by associating the names of its leaders with that of Mr. Bradlaugh has not been successful. His lordship accused Mr. Arch of having on one occasion appeared upon the same platform as Mr. Bradlaugh. Assuming an agreement of opinion between these men upon non-theological subjects it is difficult to see what his lordship could make of the accusation if it were true. It happens, however, to be false. Mr. Arch was not at the meeting to which Lord Dartmouth referred; but Mr. Mitchell, another leader of the labourers, was. So far from being an Atheist, Mr. Mitchell is, it appears, an ardent Methodist; but he has the good sense to draw a line between politics and theology, and is not ashamed of having co-operated as a Liberal with persons who are utterly opposed to him in religious belief.

Good news at last from the famine districts in China. Rain has fallen, and there is the prospect of considerable autumnal crops. What is now required is to find support for the sufferers till the grain is gathered in. At the same time, the consular reports just published present a sad picture of the ravages of the famine. Seven millions of persons, forming seven tenths of the population of two of the largest provinces in China, Honan and Shansi, have perished. This is equivalent to saying that the number of people swept away has been more than double the entire population of Scotland. It increases our overwhelming sense of the magnitude of the disaster to be informed that in some places the famine will probably last another year, that the Government with its utmost efforts can provide no more than one day's food in 30 for the surviving sufferers and that the ravages of pestilence are being added to those of famine. In the districts where the distress is most severe, Mr. Fraser says "the people prey upon one another like wild beasts."

The Liverpool Daily Post, writing on the opening of the Manchester Free Libraries on Sunday afternoons, does not think that the Manchester reform goes far enough to produce much beneficial change in the habits of the population. "It appeals almost entirely to the class of humble students whom the nature of tastes already acquired sufficiently protects from gross temptations. We hardly think that the frequenters of the free reading-room would be in the public-houses, even if the reading-rooms were shut. An open museum would attract in an innocent and beneficial way a much larger class of ignorant and uncultivated sight-seers. The magic of sacred music might well be tried on the humblest and lowest of all, as it was with signal success last Good Friday in St. George's Hall. Why, for instance, should we not have every Sunday afternoon a performance of sacred music in that magnificent hall, and upon that splendid instrument, which spends so large a part of the week in ignoble silence? Will anybody venture to affirm the corrupting influence, on any day of the week, of the Messiah and the Elijah?"

THOUGHTS ON RELIGION.

LESSONS FROM THE MOUNTAINS.

THOMAS STARR KING.

At a little distance all this grandeur, all this power, all this fertility, are transfigured into pure beauty. There is no colour on the globe comparable with that which robes a mountain at a sufficient distance, however rugged and desolate the near aspect may be. One of the most accurate artistic students of nature that has ever lived, Mr. Ruskin, tells us that one cannot know what tenderness of colour is, who has not seen the rose and purple hues of a great mountain twenty miles away. Mr. Emerson, in an exquisite passage of poetry, has expressed and adorned the same fact thus—

A score of airy miles will smooth Rough Monadnock to a gem.

Move off to a distance of three score airy miles, when the atmosphere is favourable, and what glorious beauty will the line of the Sierra Nevada wear! I have seen the vast bulwark from the bank of the Sacramento in the spring, and once from the summit of Diablo, when they seemed, though on the earth, not of it. All their rocks, their gorges, their precipices, their streams, their desolate patches which the earth-avalanches had torn, their cliffs, their forests, their nooks and dells, their tortuous roads and their bulk and savageness reduced to smooth splendour of colour! First, a purple bar of foothills just beyond the dim edge of the immense prairie; then a middle slope of vague and tender green; and then, crowning all, the golden snow (gold at that distance) in an unceasing stretch of two hundred miles! What a vision through the clear air, when we sweep thus the complete physiognomy of their summits,—here a symmetrical peak, there a long ridge sawed into sharp spikes of creamy whiteness, and soon a huge climbing mound of brilliance, showing where the Carson turnpike leads the adventurers after silver, that cannot be polished or frosted to such beauty as sheathes its own tremendous dome!

Next to the Himalaya, in Hindostan, that ridge bears the most noble name of all the mountain-chains on the globe,— "Sierra Nevada." And when we see it sixty miles off, under clouds that mimic its pinnacles and swells, it shows like a vision from another world, like the street and the wall of the New Jerusalem. Only the colours are in reverse order, as befits the reflection of heavenly glory in an earthly medium. First comes the amethyst, midway the beryl, and on the heights, not at the base, the pure gold, as it were transparent glass. And all this splendour is part of the bounty and love of God!

But let us turn now to some of the moral lessons which reflection upon heights opens to us.

The mass of mountains, according to geologists, is very slight compared with the extent of the plain surfaces of the globe. If the Pyrenees were levelled and spread out upon France, the effect would be to make the general level of the country but a rod or two higher; and the whole matter of the Alps shovelled over Western Europe would raise the land only twenty-one and a half feet.

Yet how would the glory of the lowlands be lost if the hills were not there from which the pastures, the gentler slopes, and the plains could be seen! There would be a loss not only of the sublimity of the mountains, but of the real beauty and picturesqueness of the level grounds.

The analogy of mountain heights with life seems to me at this point to be quite striking. The amount of genius in the world, in contrast with the vast mass of common intelligence and capacity, is very slight. Suppose it were possible to distribute it into an average,—to pour it like pure spirit into the general liquid of lower grade,—the proof of mental power in the mass would hardly be perceptibly raised. But how much of the glory of life, even for the common intellect, depends on the few lofty geniuses of history! How much more value and beauty there is in ordinary human lot because we can rise to the height of a Dickens's sympathy with it, and then look around upon the byways and into the nooks and out upon the plains of our nature! How much more interest there is in history because of the eminent appreciation of portions of the past we may all gain from the intellect and sympathetic learning of a Scott! What dependence we have upon minds like Newton and Herschell, to know anything of the glory of the sky, or upon Humboldt and Agassiz, to comprehend the science and grandeur of the globe! How much less resource and value there would be in our homes if it were not for our ability to go up on the ridges of Shakspeare's genius, and climb, by the rich books that a few dollars will place on our tables, up to the elevation whence the historians, the artists, and the supreme thinkers have seen our life, and the landscape of eternal truth!

Pure and real genius is beneficent as the mountains. It invites up. God gives its capacity to very few. But the power of appreciating its work and service he gives to thousands of us. The highest genius always comes close to the mass of humanity and blesses it, and mentally we can all have a mountain-range in our life. By cultivating an interest in a few good books which contain the results of the toil or the quintessence of the genius of some of the most gifted thinkers of the world, we need not live on the marsh and in the mists. The slopes and ridges invite us. Our feet may be supported, now and then, above our natural elevation, and we may gain new views, truer relations between objects, grander lights, and a wider horizon of mysterious beauty. By that power of reading which God has endowed upon you, he enables you to say if you will, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help."

No grandeur can there be in life, no noble prospect can stretch out before us, unless we pitch the tent high up, or unless we keep the lofty places of our spiritual estate as peaks of vision for frequent visits. Socrates lived high up, and when he was in doubt or perplexity he went up higher to see how life looked from the lonely summit with its keen pure air. Paul lived high up, and he walked by the sight granted to him on the noble eminences. Jesus dwelt high up. We read that, at times, he sent the disciples away and retired into a mountain apart to pray, and when the evening was come he was there alone. The mountain to which he retired was inward more than outward. It was not only in some rare evening hours that he secluded himself thus. More than any other son of man he dwelt on the heights, and saw the glorious lights of God's love on the plains, and the wide-arching, all-embracing, heaven-embosoming nature.

We are not to live outside the world, but in it, feeling its passions, working in its interests, striving to do our duty in its trials. And yet large districts of our life and feeling should be above the world, on the Sierra heights from which the world and our toil and our home cares and our surroundings look noble, precious, bathed in light.

Believe, O soul, that art placed in this mysterious and glorious universe, that God formed thee from his Spirit for no mean purpose, but for a destiny nobler than thy highest aspirations have pointed to. Believe in the best thoughts and whisperings that visit thy heart. If thou dost catch at times some gleams of the divinings of charity, of the glory of sacrifice, of the grandeur of faith, of the sky-piercing power of prayer, like mountain-peaks jutting through fogs, or slopes afar off in the horizon light, believe in them with more enthusiasm than in the stupid dust of the beaten roads; make your home where they will inspire you, and where you can easily ascend their slopes, and see the world from a higher point, and feel the everlasting presence of God. Believe in them, for they are the mountain-principles and altar-piles of life. Breathe the air that is freshened on their heights. Drink of the streams that flow fresh from the channels in their sides. And in every season of doubt, temptation, or despair, lift up thine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh thy help.

THE GOSPEL AT THE SEA-SHORE.

THE sea-shore has again witnessed children's services in North Wales, especially at Llandudno and Rhyl. As in previous years, the services have been held on the sands every morning and evening during the fine summer days, under the conduct of the Children's Special Service Mission, London.

One interesting feature in these services is the way in which the temporary "cathedral" (as they rejoice to call it) is built by the children themselves. All the boys and girls (visitors) able and willing to handle a spade are got together at a convenient spot, and may be seen diligently building up a temple of sand in the form of a ring, which ring forms comfortable sittings for the youthful band of worshippers.

We are glad to be able to speak more favourably of the general tone of these services this year than we did two years ago. Throughout both the singing and the "talking" we noticed a decidedly more healthy tone, the children being taught to trust in the love of Jesus, not as heretofore chiefly in the "blood of the Lamb." It is only to be expected that they will be taught to look to Jesus as their All, tacitly ignoring the God whom Jesus adored; but we confidently hope and trust that as they grow older they will adopt the religion of Jesus himself, and place their trust as He did in "our Father who is in heaven," looking up to Him as the Creator and Preserver of mankind.

Although it is agreeable to report that blood and damnation were but seldom alluded to, yet the following story, told at one of these services, though addressed mainly to adults, shows that the fire still smoulders, though the flames be not in view. The preacher, a man of considerable education, whose undoubted earnestness and Christian zeal may be shown by the fact that we listened to him on one occasion, along with a numerous company, with an amount of patience unheard of at most religious services, lasting as this did over three hours. The preacher told of a young man whom he had known to have lived a somewhat dissolute and worthless life, seldom or never attending any place of worship. This man died rather suddenly in his (the speaker's) arms, and he gave it as his belief that "he was certain that young man had gone straight out of life into hell."

Young men were informed that they were "going straight down into eternal ruin;" indeed, such was the estimation of the wickedness of the rising generation that we were told that "nine out of ten young men were going the wrong way." The speaker, who bears the stamp of an Oxford man, referring to the associating together of youths, said that "boarding schools were not the best places in the world." Again, in a tract which was handed to us, we stuck at the following daring threat: "Reader, you shall live for ever, either in everlasting misery or in everlasting happiness. Are you certain you are prepared for Eternity?"

The attention of the children at these services is at once easily secured by the free and formless mode of procedure. Scarcely two consecutive verses of a hymn are sung without interruption. The conductor of the service will make a few remarks apparently suggested by the verse just sung, and so on before or after every or every other verse. And even when the long address is given, the children are either questioned or asked to sing a verse; so that utter listlessness or indifference, which is so often noticed in children's services, is here almost out of the question.

It is at once both a pleasing sight and an elevating influence to see the little ones dressed in their "Sunday best," squat on the grass in the Happy Valley at Llandudno on a fine Sunday afternoon. To hear the little band singing forth some of their favourite airs ("There are angels hovering round," &c.) is to him who has music in his soul a foretaste of heaven on earth.

We ought not to omit to mention that, besides many hymns of a very orthodox character, the book recently compiled and adopted at these services contains many of our own Sunday school favourites, such as "Kind Words," "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," "He leadeth me," "Life is real, life is earnest," "Abide with me," "Father, I know," "Great God, and wilt thou condescend," "Oh, worship the king," "Prayer is the soul's," "Shall we meet," "Whither Pilgrim," "Ye servants of the Lord," &c.

Notwithstanding what we find to object against in these services, we doubt not that there will be at least a substratum of inward and spiritual grace. O. E. H.

AMERICAN NOTES.

ONEIDA COMMUNISM.

New fanaticisms must take the place of the old, and the old must pass away. It was fore-ordained that Oneida Communism could not endure. It was based on fanaticism or perfectionism. Its founder, Mr. J. H. Noyes, was in his way a very pious man, thoroughly honest and in earnest, and he made the religious element very prominent in the community. But even the institution of "criticism" could not keep the body homogeneous. When it was determined to send the young men and young women of the community abroad for education its fate was sealed. The leader in a reported rebellion within the body is the son of Mr. Noyes, a young physician of much ability, indoctrinated in modern ideas, and who fails, as many of the younger men do, to reach his father's rhapsodic heights. We hear of quite a number of secessions, and we suspect that a severe blow will be given to the institution. It has been successful only because its leading members have been governed by a genuine though erratic religious principle, which overcame natural selfishness. If the faith on which it was founded is sapped, the institution must fail, as have so many other socialistic experiments.—American Paper.

The Chicago "Pamphlet Mission for Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion" appears on the first of this month under its new title of Unity—a name we like much. It contains an Essay by T. W. Higginson on "The Sympathy of Religions," from which we will cull a few passages for our column of Thoughts.

USES OF ADVERSITY.

IF none were sick and none were sad,
What service could we render?
I think if we were always glad
We scarcely could be tender.

Did our beloved never need
Our patient ministrations,
Earth would grow cold, and miss, indeed,
Its sweetest consolation.

If sorrow never claimed our heart,
And every wish were granted,
Patience would die and hope depart;
Life would be disenchanted.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

A RELIGION FOR THE PEOPLE.

No II.

WE note as a first characteristic of a religion for the people that it should offer them an open welcome. They should be made to feel that it is really intended for them. It may take some time, some trouble, perhaps some new mode of presenting religion before we can secure this end. But we must first of all plainly have the end in view. If the teachers of religion and the leaders of worship are once quite resolved to have the people, the means of attracting them will assuredly be found. Let the prejudices of caste-religion be laid aside. Let there be a genuine desire to welcome the masses, and the wish will beget thoughts and plans for its own accomplishment.

But let us put the question: Is it enough, for this end, that the churches should be thrown open on a Sunday evening? How shall the people know that the open door and the open pew are not merely the opening of a trap? Some stray individual inquisitively ventures inside. Is the opportunity afforded him for sitting down and listening, to be called a welcome? Do we actually expect that he will change the manner of his life and cease from his indifference to religion on such terms as these? The occasional visitants of our open services, with indeed a few happy exceptions, must feel that what is ultimately desired is their joining the coterie already holding possession, and betaking themselves to the habits and customs of the place. The life and interest, the soul and action of a public meeting are the last things to be expected in connection with the churches of to-day.

A temporary change for the better appears during the enthusiasm of a Revival. Messrs. MOODY and SANKEY make a public appeal and it receives a momentary response. But the thing soon ends in the ordinary routine of sectional church-life, and the public is found amusing itself as before. The people, in fact, have not been addressed and welcomed as the people—only as individuals to be caught and converted and made into good church-adherents.

Let it be understood that we are not now discussing the question as to what congregational life should be, or whether adherence to a church has not a benefit of great value for individuals who may be persuaded to seek it. We only express our very firm conviction that this kind of attraction is not likely to succeed with the masses, whose absence from religious worship we deplore. It has been tried for some two or three hundred years with the result, that the more our religious organisations have become crystallised, the more have the people withdrawn from them.

Let it be understood that we do not object to organisation. What we want to see is a well-organised Welcome for the People to public worship. Let them be welcomed as "the people" and always as the people. Not only now and then to a lecture for controversial purposes, but regularly as the one great object of meeting. Public Worship is the real want, as we take it.

We have said that if we were only determined to welcome the people means of attraction would be found. The man who is bent on gathering the people will naturally adopt a popular style. He will talk of things that interest them, and he will find out what are the things that interest them. He will learn that religion must be treated under very practical aspects if it is to keep its hold for any length of time. The people must find that it supplies an actual want in their lives. At present they know how to take advantage of it at the only time when they feel the need, viz., when they are going to die. They send for priest or parson, and so get over the emergency. But what good is religion to do them every day? What want is it to supply every Sunday? These are questions which must be answered plainly and practically by those who would furnish a Religion for the People.

ANTHROPOLOGY AND RELIGION.

AN interesting section of the Paris Exhibition is devoted to the illustration of Anthropology. Varieties of the human species are exhibited both in skeleton and in full costume. In connection with this department lectures are delivered, and an Anthropological Congress has been held, all which has grievously vexed the clerical mind. On the attempt of the Clericals to silence the Scientists, Dr. PRESSENSE writes (to the Christian World): "It cannot be denied that the Anthropological Society, which took the initiative in preparing the collection, belongs, for the most part, to the transformation school, and it was certainly not without intention that the exhibition was made to comprise some of the most beautiful types of the monkey tribe, as though to say, 'Behold your ancestors!' It must not be forgotten, however, that this society includes among its members some of the most eminent spiritualists, such as M. de QUATREFAYE, Professor of the Jardin des Plantes, who, in his book on the unity of the human race, has given powerful scientific refutation to the materialist theory of Transformation. The most ardent section of French Catholicism has made use of this opportunity to show its faith in the power of the truth. La Défense Religieuse, a journal which is the organ of the famous Bishop of Orleans, DUPANLOUP, and before it the Univers, edited by M. VEUILLLOT, have deemed it well to address a formal denunciation of the Anthropological Section to the Directors of the Exhibition, amounting to a request that it might be closed as soon as possible. This drew from M. KRANTZ a reply, politely but cruelly ironical. How is it that this so-called religious party does not understand that it does more harm to religion by defending it in this way, than can be done by all the combined attacks of its enemies? It is constantly endeavouring to hold up the ark of the LORD by the help of gendarmes. It would place it under the protection of the police force, as a tradesman would his shop, so that one is tempted to think that it is a shop rather than a religion that needs such guarding. That is, indeed, but a poor way of defending Christianity which seeks to shut men's eyes to patent, incontestable facts. Is this not to assume that anthropological science is in itself hostile to religion, and that Christianity can only live on so long as the darkness lasts, which is equivalent to saying that, morally, it is already dead?"

UNITARIAN LAMENTATIONS.

WE were not surprised to be informed by an orthodox journal, the Christian Signal, that there are Unitarians who are given to the uttering of lamentations, though we were hardly prepared to find ourselves quoted among Jeremiahs. [By the by, was Jeremiah orthodox?]. The "desponding cry" of which the Unitarian Herald is accused, appears in what the Signal is pleased to call "a curious paragraph" on which it congratulates Cardiff—viz., our correspondent's proposal that a New Cause should be founded there. Here it is, as reproduced by our contemporary:—

A NEW CAUSE.—A correspondent writes: "I have always felt an interest in the cause of Unitarianism, and I therefore want (by this letter) to set the stone rolling. Perhaps you are not aware that we have in this flourishing town all sects and creeds but the one needful, viz., a Unitarian cause. The population exceeds 70,000, and surely there are sufficient Unitarians to start a cause. If you will kindly allow this to appear it may stir up some moneyed friends to action, and I am quite prepared to give my mite towards such a good object."

Now we should like to know what is "curious" in this, and why it is called a "desponding cry" and placed among "Unitarian Lamentations." The Signal goes on to say: "We rejoice to doubt whether Unitarianism has any outlook among the people of Wales, who are loyal and ardent in their attachment to the glorious doctrines of Evangelical faith." The Signal may "doubt," but we do not despond. Nay we can assure the Signal that, so far from uttering lamentations, we have only to express our great satisfaction at the general progress of all the churches in whom our contemporary takes an interest towards the glorious doctrines held by Unitarians, which are somewhat nearer the doctrines of the Evangelists than are those of the "Evangelicals."

The Signal also expresses "unfeigned assurances of pleasure" on receiving tidings from America that Unitarianism makes very feeble progress in numbers. "Dr. J. F. WARE, one of its leading ministers," says the Signal, laments thus:—

"Wanted an enthusiasm." Where? "In the Unitarian denomination." We have a past that we honour; a present we have a respect for; a future just as full of hope and promise at least, as that of any body of Christians. . . . Everything that man sets down as the condition of success is ours—prestige, position, wealth, character, influence, hope, brain, hearts, lives. The record is every way in our favour. And yet there is somehow an indescribable feeling of halt. We don't feel progress. We don't see action. We don't realise growth.

We understand that a complaint very much the same as Dr. WARE's is to be heard in most of the churches at the present day. From some points of view we find encouragement, from others we see that religion obtains too little of men's activities. But to counter-balance the above passage, though it is far from being merely a "desponding cry," we shall present the Signal with another, just come to hand. This is an utterance of the Rev. CHARLES AMES, the Editor of the Christian Register, and is quoted by a writer in Unity in reply to "the frequent croakings and fault-finding with the incoming generation of liberal clergymen on the part of our older ministers and laymen." Says Mr. AMES—

The young ministers of the Unitarian denomination are the finest lot of men, intellectually, morally, and spiritually, the liberal church has ever had in its pulpits. More pure, earnest, talented, and devout workers no cause can desire for itself. They are the glory not only of Unitarianism, but of the Church Universal. The only fear I ever have for them is that they may become too anxious, too impatient, in their ambitions and eagerness for service, and so attain to a superficial success instead of a slow, solid, and enduring growth in character and ability.

We are happy to be able to say that the older ministers and laymen of our acquaintance are not croakers or fault-finders towards their younger brethren; but, on the contrary, are their genial friends and advisers.

AN ANTI-VATICAN LEAGUE.

AN "Ex-Roman Catholic Priest," our friend the Rev. R. R. SUFFIELD, concludes his articles on "Neo-Catholicism and Morality" in the September number of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine. In powerful tones the writer calls on his readers to mourn over the youth who learns science and truth and justice under the leaden sceptre of the infallible Papacy. "One man reveals the heavens, and he is accursed; another man reveals the round earth, and he is accursed; another man reveals man's body, and even he is accursed." The present temper of the world will not allow of "persecution" in the old way, but Mr. SUFFIELD raises a warning voice against the subtlety with which Papal advocates strive to bewilder us on that subject. "The Pope," he says, "is determined to be the absolute monarch of all Roman Catholics wherever they may be, and is determined that they shall contend also for his temporal sovereignty over a portion of the Italian kingdom. The last Pope strove to accomplish these objects with reckless honest outspokenness; the present Pope will strive for the same in a manner more politic and reticent, and therefore more dangerous and more effectual."

In order to raise an effective opposition to the dangerous pretensions of the Ultramontane party, Mr. SUFFIELD proposes the formation of an Anti-Vatican League:—"It should consist of calm, thoughtful, earnest, virtuous, cultured, religious-minded men and women; it should embrace representatives of all the Protestant denominations, also the Anglican, 'Old Catholic' and 'Greek Orthodox'; it should specially invite the co-operation of ex-Catholics, as also of any 'Liberal Catholics,' opposed to the Papal claims, but not yet determined as to their own future religious position. The object of the League should be: 1. To consider how to meet the recent developments of the Papal power, so as best to protect our independence, dignity, honour, and consistency in the State, the family and the individual. 2. To circulate a calm, thoughtful, accurate literature wherewith to enlighten and guide the public mind. 3. To afford a rallying point for ex-Catholics, and to enable them to compare their experiences and the expression of their religious needs in the presence of those who would otherwise be too ignorant of facts to be able to advise or act with wisdom."

"IS IT REASONABLE TO WORSHIP GOD?"

ON Thursday evening week a debate, arranged to extend over two nights, was commenced in the Co-operative Hall, Listergate, Nottingham, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., taking the affirmative in respect of the above proposition, which was impugned by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, of London. The proceedings were appointed to begin at eight o'clock, but by half-past seven o'clock the large room was crowded to its utmost capacity. Mr. G. B. Rothera, who presided, explained the reasons which had induced him to come forward in such a manner upon the present occasion. The question was a question, he took it, as between theism and anti-theism. The debate then followed, which is to be printed and published verbatim; we therefore defer any notice of it until the authorised report appears. At the second meeting, on Friday evening, Mr. G. B. Rothera occupied the chair again, and in opening the proceedings expressed his gratification at the excellent temper and high tone of the debate of the previous evening, saying he was pleased to see the earnest sustained and intelligent attention of the audience on that occasion. There were those who looked upon such discussions as these as dangerous and irreverent—he did not share in that opinion. There was an intelligence abroad that no longer permitted men to accept their beliefs on mere authority, but compelled them to find reasons for the faith that was in them. In this respect he could not but think that such discussions as that of last evening could not fail to be useful. The first requisite of religion was that it should be true; fear of the results of investigation should deter no man from inquiry, for the result in any case was gain, emancipation from delusion, or increase of assurance. That which was true in religion could not be shaken, that which was false no one would desire to preserve.

The High Pavement Chronicle, for September, has the following remarks: "Theological debates have an evil name, and justly so; for in the great majority of recorded instances they have proved fruitful sources of party spirit and personal rancour; while the seeming purpose of the debaters has been to glorify themselves rather than their respective causes. But this affords no proof that a discussion conducted with good temper and with personal humility may not be a great help and enlightenment to those who are feeling their way towards truth. Probably, the living voice may often put a religious experience with a force that will strike home to some hearts far more surely than the force of mere printed words; at any rate, the refusal to champion, on a public platform, truths that a man cherishes, is as grave a responsibility as the undertaking.

But it is said that in the extreme case of Atheism v. Theism, the devout and undoubting theist who may be present is exposed to the shock and peril of having the atheistic argument hurled at the fortress of his faith with all its terrible power. For our own part, we believe that it is futile to keep Faith hedged in from all assault; and that our Belief can only then become thoroughly healthy and hardy when it has been fairly confronted with the phalanxes of Unbelief. That there will be pain to many, we do not doubt, in this experience—perhaps bewilderment; but the pain and the bewilderment are on the path towards a still further and more profound assurance.

What the good or ill of the debate just concluded between Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Armstrong may be, it is not for us to judge—nor, we think, for any other. It is certain that some superficial result, not the most pleasant, will be evident at once, while the good, whatever be its measure, will be hidden away in secret hearts and not be manifest. But it must be remembered that, not the decided atheists, but the multitudes who waver and dare not quite trust themselves to believe in the Divine goodness and beauty that compasses them all around, are the most likely to have received some light, and that it was solely in the hope of helping them that—from one side, at least—the heavy task of this debate was undertaken.

AN EPISCOPAL ELECTION AFTER PRIMITIVE CUSTOM.

DR. PAKENHAM WALSH, Dean of Cashel, has been elected to the united see of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin. The present constitution of the Irish Church requires the election of a bishop to be made by both clergy and laity, each of them voting separately by "orders." A majority of two-thirds of both orders is requisite; and in the event of a failure to satisfy this condition, the election falls into the hands of the Bench of Bishops. At the election the Archbishop of Dublin presided, and congratulated the Synod on the fact that their work had been successfully accomplished, without the slightest tinge of heat or passion. The Manchester Examiner is struck with the quiet reversion of the Irish Episcopal Church to the custom of primitive times, and says: "We do not suppose that in apostolic or sub-apostolic days the clergy and the laity voted by orders. Indeed, the earliest officers of the Church seemed to be very careless about their orders—most likely because they thought that the officer existed for the sake of the people rather than the people for the sake of the officer. But putting aside these superficial differences, the principle of the thing seems, at the heart of it, to be essentially the same."

The growing custom of putting the choir at the pulpit-end of the church has the very serious drawback that it prevents a man from turning round and looking up at the organ in a critical manner just before the contribution-plate approaches his pew.

Addressing his students the other day, Mr. Spurgeon told a good story to illustrate the need of preachers being attractive. "When I was in Arran, quite recently," said Mr. Spurgeon, "I heard of a minister who preached in a certain church, and, at the close of the service, was strongly urged to promise for a future supply, the collection after his sermon having been unusually large. 'Dear me,' said the minister, with becoming pride, 'what might your ordinary collection amount to?' 'Last Sunday it was twopence-halfpenny.' 'What is it to-day, then?' asked the minister, expecting to hear a large sum. 'Eightpence-halfpenny,' was the reply. 'Woe is me,' moaned the minister within himself, 'for I gave the saxe-pence myself,'"

SOUTH SHIELDS.

WELCOME TO REV. R. C. SMITH.

ON Sunday week special sermons at the Unity Church were preached in the morning and evening by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Belfast, and in the afternoon, by the newly appointed minister, the Rev. R. C. Smith. The congregation was good, especially in the evening, and the collections exceeded the amount of any previous occasion.

On Monday a public tea and meeting were held to welcome the Rev. R. C. Smith. Mr. DRYDEN presided over the meeting, which was both numerous and influential, the church being well filled, not only by members of the congregation, but by friends from Newcastle, Sunderland, Barnard Castle, &c. Among those present were:—The Revs. J. C. Street, W. L. Spenser, T. W. Stoddart, B.A., W. J. Taylor, R. C. Smith, and J. G. Slater; Messrs. Hornby, Waller, Clephan, Lucas, Watson, J. H. Thompson, Geo. Lucas (Sunderland), J. Glendinning (Newcastle), Wm. Spoor, J. W. Mawson (Gateshead), and J. Banbridge.

Letters of apology were read from the Rev. Alfred Payne, of Newcastle, who is now in Switzerland, and who expressed his deep regret at not being able to be present; from the Revs. T. Elliott, of Sunderland; T. Leyland, of Burnley; E. Turland, of Ainsworth; and other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN said he had a great pleasure in presiding over such a numerous and influential and intelligent meeting. He asked them to carry their minds back to about eight years ago, when they commenced the work of spreading Unitarianism in South Shields. They then had the Rev. J. C. Street among them, and he gave them some lectures with such success that induced them to form a committee, with Dr. Lunge at their head. After the committee was formed the friends commenced to hold regular services in a small room in the then Mechanics' Institute. They did not dream then that they would so soon be able to build a church of their own. He remembered at that time that they could not sometimes manage to raise a hymn. On one occasion when they had their old friend Mr. Hopkirk preaching, they had to content themselves with reading the hymns. (Laughter.) However, they persevered, and by and bye they got the Rev. T. Leyland, and under his guidance and teaching they got on better and progressed, until to-day they possessed the church in which they were now assembled, free from debt, and they had also a harmonium of their own, and very good singing. (Loud applause.) When he looked back upon the past and compared their condition then with their present circumstances, he considered they had progressed very well indeed. In fact he did not think any congregation had made better progress in the time than they had in South Shields. (Hear, hear.) He must not omit to mention that their kind friends in Newcastle and Sunderland had helped them very much; to them and to their kind friend Mr. Street, who was ever ready to aid the cause in South Shields, they were much indebted for the great progress Unitarianism had made in the district. (Hear, hear, and applause.) In conclusion he would only remark that what they all desired and laboured for was to see the progress of free religion—such a religion as the Rev. Mr. Street told them about on Sunday night. They wanted to see the grand principles of true religious liberty become the principles of every man in South Shields.

Mr. T. HORNBY said he had been deputed by the committee of the church to give a hearty welcome to the Rev. R. C. Smith, and though he would rather the selection had fallen upon one more advanced in years, he must say that no one would feel more pleasure than he did in bidding their new minister welcome among them. He had felt great interest in to-day's proceedings. They had all looked forward to to-day with a considerable amount of anxiety and great hope, and they could not but be gratified at the large attendance of their friends and the kindly feelings that prevailed on all sides. (Hear, hear.) He believed in asking the Rev. R. C. Smith to come to South Shields the committee and the congregation had exercised a wise judgment. They had not had any ministers preaching as candidates. They merely invited Mr. Smith to preach for a couple of Sundays, and so satisfied were the congregation with those services that they asked him to become their minister—(applause)—and ever since the appointment was made all the members of the congregation that he (Mr. Hornby) had come in contact with had expressed themselves highly pleased, and with every reason. (Hear, hear.) When the late minister, the Rev. W. J. Taylor, sent in his resignation, grave doubts were expressed by some of the members of the committee as to what was to be done in the future, and many of the congregation were very despondent as to the position of the church, and did not see how they were to get another gentleman to fill the pulpit. Others however were not so dejected, and after going among the members of the congregation, the committee received such promises of support that they were able to go to the Northumberland and Durham Missionary Association and tell them what the congregation were able to do. The Association recognising the promised additional efforts of the congregation, responded in such a manner that the committee of Unity Church felt themselves in a position to invite ministers to come and preach to them. (Hear, hear.) While in conversation yesterday with a friend connected with a neighbouring congregation, he (the speaker) had been told of the struggles that his friend's congregation had endured during the past twenty-five years, and was told that at one of the services only two hearers were present. Such had never been the case at Shields, and remembering that they had been established only seven years and a half, and that with the help of outside friends they had built a church and paid for it—every halfpenny—and that they had already got through two ministers—(laughter)—he thought they were getting on immensely. (Laughter.) Well, the new minister they had got was the right man in the right place—(hear, hear)—and he believed success lay before the Unitarian Church of South Shields. (Applause.) He felt confident that the people connected with the church would rally round their new minister, so as to make the voice of Unitarianism heard in South Shields. (Applause.) He would conclude by offering, on behalf of the congregation, a welcome to Mr. Smith, and in doing so he welcomed him to their houses and hearths, where he knew Mr. Smith would join in their joys and share in their sorrows. (Hear, hear, and applause.) In welcoming Mr. Smith to the pulpit of Unity Church it was his pleasure to welcome him to a pulpit without a creed, whether old or newly invented. Mr. Smith was at liberty to speak whatever came into his mind and heart, believing as they did that there come from God daily revelations of his will and his desire in respect to man. It was to a pulpit such as this that he had the honour and privilege to welcome him. In conclusion, turning to Mr. Smith, the speaker said: On behalf of the members of the congregation I give you a hearty shake of the hands as a token of friendship, and I trust that the day is far distant when the ties connected with this day will be severed. (Applause.)

Mr. F. F. M. WALLER briefly seconded the welcome on behalf of the congregation.

Mr. ROBERT MYERS, on behalf of the Sunday school, also gave a welcome to the Rev. R. C. Smith.

Mr. JOSEPH CLEPHAN, president of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Association, expressed the pleasure it gave him to welcome Mr. Smith into the district. He was pleased to see such an excellent and successful meeting, and to see his old friend Mr. Street present. There was an appropriateness in inviting Mr. Street to take part in these welcome meetings, seeing that he might be termed the father of the church of Shields. (Hear, hear.) Having referred to the labours of the preceding ministers of the church, he remarked that Mr. Smith commenced his labours under greater advantages than did his predecessors, inasmuch as their pretty and commodious church was free from debt, and he had nothing to do but consecrate his energies to building up a strong and self-supporting church. He urged upon the members of the congregation to support Mr. Smith by attending the services every Sunday and joining him in carrying out the work of the church and concluded by again giving a hearty welcome to Mr. Smith and wishing him every success.

The Revs. W. J. TAYLOR and W. L. SPENSER, on behalf of the ministers of the district, joined in the welcome of the meeting and wished Mr. Smith every success.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, of Belfast, who was received with hearty applause, said: I have been asked to deliver a charge to the congregation of South Shields as well as a charge to your new minister. In the first place I will speak to the congregation. You have invited to your midst a minister, and by that invitation you mean that you believe that religion is a necessity of human life, and that you think it is desirable there should be labouring amongst you one whose whole energy and thought and power shall be devoted to your service. That is the meaning of your invitation. Now I want you to remember that by giving such an invitation you have taken upon yourselves a grave responsibility—you have to sustain your minister. I do not merely mean in the sense of money—though that must never be forgotten, for a minister could not live upon air—but I mean something more than that, namely, that you shall sustain him by your earnest work, by your cordial welcomes, by your steady fidelity to your principles, by your desire to train up your children in holiness, and by your determination never to let your minister stand alone, but that you, standing by his side, will make him feel that in these great fields of God's industry there are men and women true to the same religion as himself who will not shrink from the responsibility that is laid upon them. (Hear, hear.) Your invitation means that if there had been any slight differences amongst you in any way whatever, that in this new minister and in this new work you will forget your little differences, and in the spirit of God, and in the spirit of Christ you will be a united people, and let your minister see that you are united with him in the fellowship of the spirit of God. By your invitation you mean one thing more, that should your minister prove unfaithful—as I know he will not—that should your minister or any other minister, prove to be unfaithful, that you knowing the truth (which is so precious), having lived for it so long, you will not be faint-hearted, but believe and act upon it that the church is not the church of the minister, that the church is not bound up in any one individual, but that the church is the accumulated spiritual life of the people. (Hear, hear.) I won't say more to you. To you, Mr. Smith, I say with equal earnestness and with equally the spirit of consecration: You have accepted the invitation to this ministry, and in doing so you have accepted it as understanding that you are to be a minister of religion—you won't forget that. You will have many difficulties—public and private—but you will not, I dare say, shrink from any responsibility in connection with the great public questions which sometimes agitate the community, and you will not forget you have accepted the office of a minister of religion—that religion which deals with the grandest, brightest, and dearest part of human nature—you will remember that your life, which you consecrated some time ago to the work, is to be consecrated anew, and you will give to the ministry of South Shields the best fruits of head and heart and soul, and you will be absorbed in your work, remembering that it is the dearest work a man can engage in on this earth; you will also remember that even should your congregation not stand by you as I have told them they should, or should they even become faint-hearted, that upon your own shoulders is laid the solemn responsibility of working on in season and out of season, and that you will endeavour to make the dry bones live—for upon your shoulders is laid the responsibility of speaking the quickening word, even when all seems to be dead. If your congregation should prove faithless to you, you are to remember that you should be proved faithful among the faithless; and I have no doubt that you will find that, at the lowest, it is only the ebb of the tide of spiritual life, and that it will be followed by a great flood of spiritual life and power which will build up your church, and which will build up yourself. I hope you will go in and out among your people, and know them in their homes, and also make their children love you, for out of them shall come a great church. You should also be a father to the fatherless, and be in the true spiritual sense a husband to the widow, and likewise be to your congregation a living inspiration and a living example of holiness; and, although you may not reap any material reward, you will have the high satisfaction within you of having done your duty. One word more. I have known you as a fellow-worker. I have stood by your side in the open street, preaching to the people the gospel of everlasting truth. I have gone with you into many a humble cottage, and joined you in services among thirty or forty men and women who have just come from the factory; and I have also rejoiced with you at the cottage fireside, and joined with you in Christian worship. To you is the honour and distinction of having to a large extent inaugurated a work like this, to which I have alluded, in a northern city of Ireland—namely, Belfast. Now I want you not to forget that you can speak in the open air, and that you can address numbers of people; also that you can go to the fireside of people who will not at present come to church. I trust, sir, that you will not forget that you can do these things. You will, therefore, knowing the friendship I entertain for you, and the respect I have for your character, cordially and cheerfully receive from me the injunction to go to your work as a true man, and do it in a true spirit, letting your life be an illustration of the principles of religion, and may God give you your reward. (Applause.)

The Rev. R. C. SMITH, who was received with acclamation, said it was one of the most difficult duties he had to perform to return thanks when he felt not only that his heart was so full, but that the expressions of cordial welcome which had been given utterance to respecting himself were so real, hearty, and sincere. In the first place, he had to thank the Rev. Mr. Street for his presence there that evening. He had on previous occasions felt the cheering influence of his presence, and the advantage of the hearty grasp of his hand. To those kind friends who had also spoken cheering words of welcome he had to return his most sincere thanks, and he must say that since the first day he came to Shields he had received the greatest possible kindness. Upon his first arrival in the town there was only one face with which he was familiar, and the cordial reception he had met with from that gentleman and his family was but a sample of the kindness he had since experienced during his hitherto brief sojourn among them. Mr. Smith alluded to the several gentlemen who had publicly given him a welcome as the minister of that church; and in speaking of Mr. Joseph Clephan, president of the Northumberland and Durham Missionary Association, said he hoped that in due time the Unity Church at South Shields would become so prosperous as to obviate the necessity of assistance therefrom. Mr. Smith then proceeded to address a few observations to the congregation, and said he hoped that they would be regular in their attendance upon Divine worship, and that it would be their endeavour to make the church a power for good in the town of South Shields. (Applause.)

Mr. DOWNEY moved a vote of thanks to the ministers and lay visitors from a distance, and expressed the pleasure which the congregation felt in having their countenance and support.

Mr. WM. HORNBV, in seconding the resolution, said he joined in the hearty welcome that had been given to the new minister, and hoped that all the members would pledge themselves, as he himself had done, to be at the church every Sunday morning and night five minutes before the service commenced. ("Hear, hear," and applause.)

The Rev. J. G. SLATER (Mossley), Mr. JAMES WATSON (Newcastle), and the Rev. T. W. STODDART, B.A. (Stockton), responded in warm and appropriate terms.

Mr. T. HORNEY moved, and Mr. HANES seconded, that a hearty vote of thanks be accorded to the Rev. J. C. Street for his services on the previous day, which was carried with acclamation.

Mr. STREET responded, and expressed the pleasure it gave him always to come to Shields, and the special gratification it had given him to be present on that occasion.

Thanks to the ladies and to the chairman, followed by a hymn and benediction, brought to a close one of the most successful meetings in the history of the South Shields Unitarian cause.

MOSSLEY.—On Sunday afternoon, September 8th, the fourth annual service of song was held in the Free Christian Church, Stamford Road. A miscellaneous selection of pieces was very effectively rendered by a number of the scholars, assisted by the chapel choir, and under the leadership of Mr. Robert Schofield. The connective readings and an address were given by the minister, the Rev. J. G. Slater. There was a large congregation.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

MR. PAGE HOPPS ON THE BIBLE AND MODERN THEOLOGY.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held at Newport (Isle of Wight) on Friday week, and was attended by a numerous gathering of ministers and members. At eleven o'clock there was a service in the High-street chapel, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Leicester, who founded a powerful discourse on the text John xvi., 12—"I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," taken in connection with the words of the Poet Laureate, "The old order changeth, yielding place to new, and God fulfils Himself in many ways." The preacher remarked that one of the conclusions most surely resultive from the thought of the past twenty-five years was that it was quite impossible so to narrow God's revelation as to limit it to any past age, to any dead persons, or to any finished works. In fact, what they called God's revelation was really man's discovery, and when they said this it must always be seriously urged at present that this was not the language of religious revolt, but the latest language of intense religious reverence. The old and new Testaments, long believed to be the full and final revelation of God to man, were now seen to be precious records of the ancient religious musings and aspirations on the part of one member of the great human family. The Bible was not even consistent with itself. It would be wonderful and unnatural if it were, and as unfortunate as unnatural and wonderful. In it they had a marvellous variety of lights and shades, beginning with the composite work called the Book of Genesis, and ending with the mystical rhapsody called the revelations of John. They should expect that the pictures of God there presented should at least be consistent one with another, but they were hopelessly at variance. The ideas concerning man—the views of different writers respecting the future life—varied from age to age, and the Book, remarkable for so many things, was remarkable for nothing so much as its striking contrasts and suggestive inconsistencies. Each writer reflected the leading features of the thought of his age, or recorded his own fleeting ideas. Each fragment was interesting and valuable, if rightly used, and if there was any fragment utterly untrue, utterly unscientific, utterly immoral, it, too, was intensely interesting and instructive, and could not be spared; but none of these fragments, nor all of them, put together how they liked, could be called a final revelation from the Most High God. We must do, the preacher continued, and religious reverence and fidelity compel us to do, what those writers did for themselves, and what he believed, if they were here and could speak, they would beseech us to do—use our own judgments, question our own hearts; observe, reflect, experiment, and lifting up our living hearts to God find what they found, in their measure, light according to their need or their power to receive. Here there were three words which at once rose to their lips indicating the great objects of their search—God, man, eternity. It was a simple matter of fact that the thoughts of men and women did change from age to age. Beginning with the savage, the preacher traced the varying conceptions of the deity which had obtained in past ages, and, remarking that poor and low conceptions of God survived even now in the Christian church, he added it was one of the great necessities of the age that they should get rid of these imperfect and degrading views of the deity. The long processes of the past would help them to do so. In the first place, they must see that he was one. This was in harmony with the spirit of the age, and the tendency of science on every hand. We inferred one God for the simple reason that we had no room for another. Hence, also, we had gradually lost faith in an almost omnipotent Satan, not only because we disliked him, but because there was no room for him. From this we passed on to the second great truth that God was ever present in creation, and this again was a thought that was the product of and was in harmony with the spirit of the new time. It was to be regretted that in casting aside old-world traditions on this subject so many either gave up faith in God altogether or contented themselves with a vague pantheism which saw no difference between God and the works of God. For this orthodoxy was mainly to blame, for having bound up the two so closely together. Passing on to a consideration of the third truth—the unchangeableness of God—the preacher remarked that the God of the Old Testament was not unchangeable. On the contrary, he was exceedingly fickle, and even in our own day there was a survival of this in the Christian church, as witness the prayers for rain, or for fine weather, or the crying out to God against the cattle plague or the illness of a prince. This indication as to the state of the public mind as regarded the great Creator of the world showed how much yet had to be done to deliver us from Paganism and to bring us to a rational and real reverential religion. God governed us, not by caprice, but by law. He had mercifully ordained that as we sowed so should we reap, and his laws, prompted by eternal goodness, were based on eternal steadfastness. This led to the fourth truth—that God was impartial. The Old Testament and the ancient mythologies represented the deity as partial. The statement "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated" might stand at the head of a thousand representations of divine caprice and partiality, and this debasing view of the deity had a rampant survival in the half Pagan and odious doctrine of election, apart from merit and without reason, but according to the sovereign will of God. It was true that life was full of inequalities and conflicts, and this might seem to imply something like partiality, or caprice, or impotence on the part of Providence, but these inequalities, these conflicts and struggles of our lives, had their root in something very different from divine partiality or caprice, and they could be explained as beautiful and blessed necessities. The fifth truth was that God was as just and generous as he was mighty, and once more this was a modern idea. The God of the old mythologies was always strong enough, but seldom just or generous. The God of the Old Testament loved those who loved him. He cast off those who rejected him, and punished to the third and fourth generations. He was a jealous God—a man of war, who shook his glittering spear, laughed at the poor creatures who rebelled against him, and crushed them with his thunderbolts or consumed them with the fires of his wrath. This degrading idea of God survived in the doctrine of eternal torments—a doctrine which had its root in a very ancient piece of savagery in men's conceptions of the deity. This doctrine of eternal torments was notoriously out of harmony with the spirit of the age, and the fire was alight in all the churches that would burn it out. For very sufficient reasons, pain and sorrow and sin might be allowed to exist here, but the eternal existence of them, if decreed by God, would be an eternal blot upon his honour and his name. This was the very ground for rejecting and denying the doctrine of eternal torments, and this view would ultimately put out the everlasting fires of hell, and destroy the horrible belief in the eternal implacability of a good, and just, and gracious God. Proceeding to speak of man and his destiny, the preacher said it was strange that man, who had learned to analyse the atmosphere of the sun and to measure the diameters of the stars, had never been able to comprehend himself; but if they at once perceived that he was neither a fallen God nor a hopeless beast, they would arrive at the first great truth—that man was the noblest creature of God, on a pilgrimage, and in process of development. This was one of the grandest products of the spirit of this age. Man had been hitherto regarded as a fallen creature who, beginning his being perfectly noble, wise, and pure, fell into infinite disgrace and miserable bondage, so that he was now a wreck to be somehow saved, and not an imperfect creature to be naturally and harmoniously developed. From right views of God would grow the great truth that man's failures, struggles, pain, were all educational or remedial. There was no chance, no accident, no ultimate misery in it. Once these pains and struggles were regarded as memorials of an ancient curse, and even work, man's honest toil was looked upon as part of that curse. We were now learning that life was a great education—that every pain we suffered had its beautiful uses. God had us all at school, and the great Master was teaching us to think, not planning to save us the trouble of thinking, which would be the most deplorable thing. He could do for us. It was plain that but for struggles, and pains, and experiments, and failures, and defeats, God could never have reared a race of educated men. Puppets he might have reared, machines he might have constructed, receptacles for indolent and unappreciated pleasures he might have made—but men and women, never! Closely connected with this was the thought that man, as a creature or child of God, had a claim upon the eternal justice and goodwill of God. This was a thought that was not properly insisted upon. If man was God's creature, made to be developed through an orderly process of education, he had a claim on God's eternal justice and goodwill. We had had no choice in the matter, but were here altogether independent of any volition of our own, and he felt that we had a right to demand goodwill and generosity for ever and for ever from the Being who placed us here, whether we liked it or not. This led him to the last of the three subjects they were discussing—the future life—and if what he had said was true, here was a rock standing on which the outlook should be steady and clear into the future life. Quoting from Emerson, he said the indestructible spirit of man, at what was called death, passed into the spirit world where all real things are, all deathless energies, all vital essences, yea, the mighty God himself. This was the world of shadows—that the world of eternal realities. No violent change passed over man at what we called death. In fact, the man began there as he left off here, rid of the body, thank God; but retaining all that belonged to the spirit. Purity or impurity, love or hate, wisdom or foolishness, the education of this life would be continued in that; and this suggested the last thought, that the future life would be one of education, as this had been—a life of change, of struggle, a life, perhaps, more or less of disappointment, but a life of progress and of ever beautiful and brightening hope. This made an end of the fearful superstition, the horrible cruelty of the thought that at death the miserable condition of the lost would be fixed for ever and ever, or that they would go to heaven and be at once as bright and beautiful as they could wish for ever and ever. Having quoted from Charlotte Brontë, whose view of the future life was, he said, as free from baseless and horrid superstition as from mere speculation, the preacher asked if what he had endeavoured to put before them was not all they wanted for a working faith to live by and to die by, and was it not their sacred mission to make these things known? Let them not faint because they progressed no faster. We should die, and our places be taken by others. A thousand years were as one day in the purposes of the Eternal. Who could doubt that these things would live who believed in the living God, and who could doubt that He would ultimately work all things in this poor world as fast as men could bear it, and after the purposes of His own blessed and unchanging will?

The service closed with singing and prayer.

THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING was held at the Wheatheaf Hotel, following an excellent cold collation provided by Mrs. Read. On the motion of the Rev. B. L. GREEN (Newport), seconded by the Rev. THOMAS TIMMINS (Southsea), Mr. H. Blessley, of Portsmouth, was unanimously voted to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN called on the Rev. B. L. GREEN, the founder of the feast and their hospitable host, to read letters from absent friends. These included a letter from the President of the Association (the Rev. H. Hawkes, B.A., F.L.S.), who expressed a wish to retire from the presidency, as he was not able to work as he had done before; from Mr. Robert Pinnock, J.P., absent in Switzerland; Mr. T. Chaffield Clarke, also in Switzerland; Mr. G. S. Coxwell, of Southampton; Rev. W. Agar, of Poole; Rev. J. W. Smith, lately settled at Ringwood; Mr. Henry Pinnock, J.P., in London; Mr. B. K. Spencer, Southampton; and Rev. W. Clarke, of Guildford.

Mr. JAMES SHEPARD (Southampton), the treasurer, submitted his report, which showed a balance in hand of £34. 9s. 8d.

The Rev. D. AMOS (Southampton) read the report of the Association (the Secretary, Mr. Haddon, was unable to be present) which stated that much anxious thought had been given to the closed churches at Chichester and Wareham, and that attempts have been made which, it is hoped, will ultimately prove successful to recommence services in both these towns.

Mr. SMITH presented the report from the church at Southampton, in which mention was made of the engagement of the Rev. D. Amos, under whose ministrations they hoped to see a considerable addition made to their numbers, and who, though coming from an orthodox pulpit, had exhibited a full, broad, liberal spirit, which could not fail to enlighten the minds of his hearers. He had submitted a scheme for improving the management of the Sunday schools, and using the latent talent of the congregation.

Mr. BOND gave an account of the High-street congregation, Portsmouth, from which it appeared that during the year 24 Sunday evening lectures had been delivered, which had been largely attended. The whole of the chapel premises had been renovated. The Sunday school and libraries had preserved their efficiency; and

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS, of the same town, followed with an able and earnest speech, beseeching all present to cling more closely to the grand fundamental truths which had been so eloquently expounded by Mr. Page Hopps in the morning.

Mr. SMITH (Ringwood) submitted an encouraging report of their prospects there. It appeared that on the Sunday school much thought and care had been expended, and that the numbers and organisations had greatly improved. During the year the church has lost the valuable services of Alfred Balstone, Esq., which have been generously given and appreciated for a number of years, and since March last the charge of the congregation has been undertaken by the Rev. W. Agar, whose continued presence with them the church hopes to retain; and

The Rev. B. L. GREEN read a communication from the secretary of the Poole church, and afterwards presented the report of the Newport church, who during the past year had been slowly but surely increasing in strength. The Sunday school had rapidly increased, and a quarterly service had been begun in the chapel on Sunday afternoons, at which the mothers and friends of the children attended. The library, now numbering about 300 volumes, had been increased, and it was believed it would grow every year. A working meeting, which was attended by 20 or 25 women, was held weekly, and in this way they hoped to gain influence and do good in their midst. (Hear, hear.)

The CHAIRMAN moved the reception and the adoption of the reports.

The Rev. D. AMOS, who said he had not long seceded from an orthodox pulpit (and he thanked God he had), proceeded to criticise the annual general report, which he said was meagre in the extreme, and congratulated the secretary upon the ingenuity and cleverness he had displayed in writing a report when he had really nothing to write about. ("Oh," and a laugh.) More could be done, and more must be done in the future. The treasurer's account evoked a cheer, because there was some £30 on the credit side, but he would rather there had been £30 on the other side, as it would at least have shown that some work had been done. There were churches in the county with good endowments which were closed, and it would be a stain and a stigma until those churches were opened. He repeated that something more must be done if they would save the honour of Unitarianism in the South. They must never play fast and loose with orthodoxy. The creed of orthodoxy was dead. What they had to do was to preach a sober, rational, common-sense Christianity, and depend upon it they would obtain a hold on the hearts and minds of men. Let them be honest in their work, and if they were spared to another year he hoped a report would be presented which would awaken grateful feelings in all their hearts. He was proud to be one of them, and so long as he was associated with them he would do his utmost to promote the success of the Southern Unitarian Association. (Cheers.)

The Rev. T. TIMMINS, of Portsmouth, said that a great deal of work had been done which did not appear in the reports. (Hear, hear.) The great want of the Association had been a want of funds, and one of the first things to be done was to increase the amount in their coffers.

The reports were received and adopted.

The Rev. T. TIMMINS moved "that as the worthy president of the Association, the Rev. H. Hawkes, B.A., F.L.S., feels himself unable, owing to impaired health, to longer hold the office of president, the best and hearty thanks of this Association be presented to him for his zealous services during the past year, and for his earnest, valuable, and devoted labours untiringly rendered in the cause of Unitarian Christianity for upwards of 44 years in this district; and that this resolution, conveying also their warm regard and fervent prayers for his comfort and happiness in the future, be illuminated, framed, and presented to him as a slight token of their esteem and of their gratitude to him for his work so nobly done." (Cheers.)

Mr. BOND seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. SMITH, Robert Pinnock, Esq., J.P., of Newport, was unanimously elected president.

The Rev. B. L. GREEN moved the election of Alfred Balston, Esq., Mayor of Poole, as vice-president, which was seconded by the Rev. J. ELLIS, and carried nem. con.

Mr. Haddon having resigned the secretaryship, the Rev. B. L. GREEN moved the appointment of the Rev. D. Amos to that office. This was seconded by Mr. SHEPARD (Southampton), and carried unanimously.

Mr. JAMES SHEPARD was re-elected treasurer.

On the motion of Mr. CURTIS (Sandown), seconded by Mr. SHEPARD, and supported by Mr. SMITH and Mr. SCRIVENER, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. Page Hopps for his able and eloquent sermon in the morning, and the proceedings ended with the usual compliment to the Chairman.

After the business meeting a visit to Carisbrooke Castle was arranged, and a couple of hours or so were very pleasantly spent there.

In the evening the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS preached another eloquent sermon in the High-street Chapel from the text Isaiah xl, 3, "Make straight in the desert a highway for our God."

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The High Pavement Chronicle has the following: "It is with great gratification that we report the acceptance of the pulpit of the King's Road Chapel, Newark, by the Rev. John Fox, of Heywood, a minister held in universal respect for his steadfast and modest work throughout the Manchester district. Mr. Fox is no experiment, but a good man tried and proved, and we earnestly hope it is the beginning of better times for the little band at Newark. If they will get up a welcome meeting for Mr. Fox, and send an invitation to Nottingham, we will promise them a good contingent of hearty sympathisers. The new ministry begins at the beginning of November."

BOLTON: BANK-STREET.—On Sunday morning last the Rev. C. C. Coe preached a sermon on "The Thames Catastrophe," which is fully reported in the local paper. At its close he said: The occasional catastrophe which overtakes the pleasure-seeker calls for public protection from unnecessary risk, so far as that is possible; but it no less calls for thoughtful preparation on the part of those who run such risk. Let us enjoy life so that enjoyment is our highest culture; so that we are at our best and brightest; our minds most active; our hearts most tender; our kindly considerations for others most apparent and most real; then should death come suddenly upon us, we should have the satisfaction of knowing that our earthly career had indeed culminated, and that our last day had also been our best and brightest.

BARNARD CASTLE.—On Sunday evening, September 1st, a funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Lee on the death of Anne Taylor, aged 21, a member of the choir. It was a very impressive sermon, from Isaiah xl, 8, "The flower faded, but the word of our God shall stand for ever." There was a large congregation, chiefly composed of young persons, who were deeply moved during the service. We are glad to say that Mr. Lee is so far restored to health as to be able occasionally to take a service.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.—The annual meeting and soiree of the Band of Hope was held on Tuesday evening, September 3rd, in the Stanhope-street school-rooms, the property of Miss Whittle and Mrs. Smith, kindly granted by these ladies for the occasion. Upwards of 180 were present. After a very comfortable tea, the Rev. J. Pollard opened the meeting by a melody and prayer, after which the chair was taken by A. O'D. Taylor, Esq. The Secretary, Mr. A. Robb, read the annual report, which showed the society to be in a healthy condition. The average attendance at the ordinary meetings was 57. As many as nine pledges were taken one evening, and 88 members have been enrolled since April last. The Chairman, referring to the report, said that many, by reasoning and persuasion, coupled with the strong plea of personal example, had been the means of bringing numbers back to sobriety and usefulness. He then explained the principles of Bands of Hope, and said that in addition to having "hope" in our "band" we should have "faith"—faith in God and faith in mankind. The following gentlemen addressed the meeting in the course of the evening:—Revs. A. Gordon, C. J. McAlester, D. Thompson, R. J. Orr, and A. Buckley; Messrs. F. Sherlock, S. T. Nicholson, and Wm. Spackman. The Rev. J. Pollard then proposed a vote of thanks to Miss Whittle and Mrs. Smith for the use of the rooms which was heartily accorded. R. McCalmont, Esq., having taken the chair, a vote of thanks was conveyed to A. O'D. Taylor, Esq., for his kindness in presiding over the meeting. The singing of a melody and benediction terminated the proceedings.

LEICESTER.—On Sunday last the services at the Great Meeting were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Laird Collier, of Boston, U.S., and the large edifice was crowded in every part both morning and evening. The sermon in the morning was on Heaven, and where it is, and in the evening on Faith. Both sermons were characterised by the preacher's well-known eloquence, and were listened to throughout with the deepest interest and breathless attention. The discourses, too, were intensely spiritual and practical.

LOCHEE, DUNDEE.—On Monday evening a religious service was conducted in the Weaver's Hall by Mrs. C. A. Soule, of America, assisted by the Rev. H. Williamson. There was an attendance of about sixty. The discourse of Mrs. Soule was full of instruction, and was evidently appreciated by the greater part of the audience. This hall was the scene of some of the early labours of the Dundee minister, until it was closed to him for ten years by special resolution of the proprietors. A few months ago the restriction was withdrawn. The experiment of holding a meeting for worship having proved fairly successful, a similar service will be attempted at some future time.

MADRAS.—A letter of thanks has been received from the Rev. Wm. Roberts, Unitarian missionary at Madras, for the pecuniary help afforded to him and his people during the famine. He states that there are about 50 families under his charge, mostly poor; that assistance from the Mansion House Fund, though applied for, was not given; that instead they were referred to the Friend-in-need Society, but no reply was received. The timely help given them, he says, has been the means of alleviating their sufferings.

NEWCHURCH.—The annual flower services in connection with the above place was held on Sunday, August 25th, when there was a beautiful display of hot-house plants, ferns, and wild flowers, with which the chapel was tastefully decorated. An excellent and appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. A. Lazenby to a very large and appreciative congregation. The plants were kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. Worswick, Greenbank, Rawtenstall; Miss Lord, Ashlands, Newchurch, and members of the school and congregation.

STRANGEWAYS UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.—On Saturday, September 7, the teachers, elder scholars, and their friends went to Hollinwood by bus for a ramble, under the leadership of the Rev. Jos. Freeston, who was present as the representative of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. The afternoon was fine, and the party had a pleasant walk round by Daisy Nook and Crime Water. After tea at Crime Mr. J. T. Swallow in the chair, Mr. Freeston, said, in the course of a very interesting lecture on specimens of wild flowers, which had been gathered during the afternoon, that the object of the Association in providing for his presence on such occasions was not so much a botanical or scientific one, but rather to awaken in the minds of Sunday schools teachers a perception of the grandeur of God's works in nature, as disclosed in the study of botany, and to promote the more general and efficient teaching of the scholars in such subjects. A vote of thanks to the lecturer brought a very enjoyable afternoon to a close, and it was felt that much was owing to the Sunday School Association for the promotion of such gatherings under the direction of Mr. Freeston.

SAFFRON WALDEN.—On two previous occasions we have been visited by S. P. Low, Esq., of London, grandson of the Rev. Stephen Philpot, who collected the money from the London, Kent, and Sussex Baptist churches in 1782, and erected our present chapel. This gentleman is a native of our town, though for many years past he has lived in London and Croydon. He has attained to high and honourable positions in the great city, being a member of the Honourable Companies of Tinplate Workers, Wire Workers, Cloth Workers, &c., and Lord Lieutenant of London. Our cause here has ever had in him a warm, tried, and invaluable friend. Two weeks ago, instead of going to the seaside for their holidays, Mr. Low brought his family here to spend them. Their presence at our service encouraged us all. On the 30th August the members of our congregation, to the number of sixty, gathered at the temporary residence of Mr. Low by request. He had a large and beautifully decorated tent erected on the lawn, and our garden party was carried out in full. The band of the 17th Essex R.V. was engaged, and their enlivening strains cheered us all. At six o'clock we sat down to a solid repast with Mr. and Mrs. Low and family. Afterwards some of the men enjoyed their pipe, and the ladies a chat. Presently, in well chosen words, Mr. Low welcomed the entire company and expressed the great pleasure it gave them to see so large a meeting of old and new friends gather around him on this occasion. He then called particular attention to the receipt accorded to Ram-mohun Roy, and the way in which Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen was received in England. The former made a deep impression upon him in early life, the latter he had taken part in, and it spoke in no uncertain tones of the growth of thought, expansion of mind, and religious liberty in our day. It rejoiced his heart, he said, to be amongst his friends again, and he hoped in years to come he should be amongst them much oftener than he had been. This was responded to by our minister at some length, when he proposed that the best thanks of the company be given to Mr. and Mrs. Low. Mr. T. Harris, an old resident of the town, seconded this proposition in a speech of some length, when it was carried with three times three. Singing, recitation, speaking, and music filled in the evening. On September 4th the scholars of our Sunday school assembled and marched to Mr. Low's residence, and after games sat down to a substantial meal. The repast over they were addressed by Mr. Low, who told them how he had left the town when a little boy, going to London, where by hard work he had got on in the world. He urged upon them that life was no lottery, but hard, laborious work. To this Mr. Brinkworth responded, and said he had been entrusted by the friends to request Mr. and Mrs. Low to receive, as a small proof of their gratitude to them, a Bible. The inscription on it read as follows:—

"Presented to Stephen Philpot Low, Esq., by the congregation of the General Baptist Chapel, Saffron Walden. Sept., 1878." Mr. Low accepted the gift, and said he should prize that proof of their affection for him and his family. Mr. Low, Jun., also addressed the children. A vote of thanks was proposed spontaneously by Mr. E. Brinkworth, seconded by Mr. Edward Fuller, and given to the family. Miss Low then went round, and gave to each scholar and teacher one shilling each. Never will the 30th of August and the 4th of September be forgotten by the friends. On Sunday evening, September 8th, Mr. Low conducted the entire service in the chapel, when all the available space (including aisles, gallery and pulpit stairs) was crowded. He made special reference to the dire calamity on the river Thames on Tuesday week, and a request has been preferred to him to allow the address to be published.

SHEFFIELD.—Upper Chapel was filled with two large congregations on Sunday to hear the Rev. Robert Collyer. The morning sermon was on "Reserve Force," and the evening on "Half-way Christians, or the journey from Ur to Canaan." The characteristic eloquence, originality of treatment, quaint humour, and spiritual force of the preacher were manifestly appreciated by the listeners. The encouraging influence of such services is not easily over-estimated, and we feel a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Collyer for what he has done in awakening our churches and their ministers to a higher sense of their position and its duties. We learn that there were many in the audience belonging to other religious bodies, who expressed themselves delighted with the services on Sunday.

WALSALL.—A marriage, which caused more than ordinary interest, was celebrated at the Unitarian Free Church, Walsall, on Sunday morning week. The bride was Miss Sanders, who for nearly three years has been the organist of the chapel, and the bridegroom was Mr. William Hodgkins, also a member of the congregation. The choir assembled in full force to do honour to the occasion, and quite a congregation had taken seats in the body of the chapel. The marriage service—the one contained in the Rev. Charles Voysey's Revised Prayer Book—was conducted by the Rev. Peter Dean; the choir singing an opening sanctus and the responses, and leading a marriage hymn; and at the close the pro tem. organist (Mr. Howard Clark) played Mendelssohn's "Wedding March." On Wednesday night a coffee-party in connection with the marriage was held in the Unitarian schoolroom. The chief business of the night was the presentation of a mantelpiece clock, in black marble (supplied by Benson, of London, and for which members of the congregation and choir had subscribed), to the newly-wedded pair. The Rev. Peter Dean made the presentation, expressing the good wishes of the friends of the place for the recipients, and giving them advice as to their married life. He was followed by Mr. James Anderson, the choir-master, who spoke on behalf of the choir. Mr. Hodgkins then, on behalf of himself and his wife, briefly acknowledged the kindly gift and expressions.

WARRINGTON.—We are glad to state that the Rev. Richard Pilcher, B.A., is about to open a series of classes for the winter season at Cairo-street. On Monday night last a tea meeting was held (over 100 young people being present) to inaugurate the movement, the Rev. Richard Pilcher in the chair, who explained that on Monday night there would be a mutual improvement class for young men and women; on Wednesday night there would be a Bible class; on Thursday night a singing class, and on Friday a foreign language class. He earnestly welcomed all to join them. A programme of amusements was then gone through, after which Mr. Pilcher announced a lecture on "Reading as a fine art," and stated that, as the mantle of Philip Carpenter had fallen upon him, by their assistance he hoped to be worthy of it.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN IRELAND.

To the Editors.—In your issue of the 23rd ult. a correspondent undertook to inform your readers on the above topic, and to establish a distinction, unperceived by yourselves as editors, between "the principle of Non-subscription in the sense usual among Unitarians" and the procedure of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim at Ballyclare.

To do this, your correspondent rested his case upon certain very definite statements, viz.: (1) that the Northern Presbytery puts "doctrinal questions;" (2) that these questions are "usual;" and (3) "public;" (4) that there is a "necessity of having" them "put"—unless, indeed, a candidate take "time by the forelock" and contrive somehow or other to "escape" them. It was immediately pointed out that this whole series labours under a common defect, viz.: that it does not contain one solid grain of fact, inasmuch as no doctrinal questions, public or private, are necessary, or are in use, or have ever been put. As a matter of course, your correspondent at once abandons each and every of these statements on which he had relied. Most probably the exigencies of your space have compelled its omission, for I do not perceive that you have printed the frank apology which your correspondent must surely have addressed to your readers.

However, your correspondent still believes that, on other grounds, he can make something of his case.

First, your correspondent quotes your report of the Ballyclare ordination, to draw from it a conclusion, the opposite of that which you have already expressed as your own, in a leader which your correspondent describes as "paragraphs likely to mislead the unwary." He thinks, in short, this ordination, as reported by you, did not conform to the principles of Non-subscription, in "the sense usual among Unitarians;" you think it did. Now "the sense usual among Unitarians" is a matter of opinion, on which you are to the full as likely to have just ideas as your correspondent.

Again, your correspondent quotes an important resolution. He speaks of it as passed "at the inaugural meeting of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, in January, 1862." "Inaugural," a newspaper term, has nearly the same meaning as the English word, first. But the first meeting of the Northern Presbytery was held 4th April, 1862. There was a preliminary meeting on 21st February, at which it was decided to form that Presbytery. The meeting of 5th January, at which the resolution quoted by your correspondent was originally brought forward (and rejected), was the meeting of an earlier ecclesiastical body. In the wording of this resolution, which became the standing rule of our Presbytery on 4th April, 1862, he is nearly right, but not altogether so. To pass by divergencies of no moment, he italicises the words "without being fully satisfied by his own explicit declaration or by answers to questions asked." The resolution really runs "or by his answers to questions asked;" thus disposing of that appearance of dictation which the altered wording may bear. It is well known that when this resolution was drawn public doctrinal questions, with dictated answers, were the rule in some Presbyteries. That the Northern Presbytery should mention the practice of questioning in a modified form was most natural; that it should put it by in a secondary place is most significant; that it has never in any shape employed it, is the simple fact.

Your correspondent admits that our procedure "may be consonant with freedom, and may be Non-subscription." The concession is worth obtaining, even though accompanied by a scoff.—Faithfully yours,

DOING AND SAYING.

At the Ritualistic church of St. Mary Magdalen, at Bradford, on Sunday week, there was prayer for souls of those who had perished in the Princess Alice. The movement Rome-wards progresses rapidly.

A woman digging in a field near Michalkov, Galicia, has discovered the regalia of the elder Cyrus, who fell in a campaign against the Massagete about 529 B.C. The intrinsic value of the golden ornaments is estimated at £10,000.

The late Mr. P. Ellis Eyton, M.P., has left by his will £2,000 to found a scholarship for a North Wales boy, tenable at the University College of Wales. This bequest quickly follows that of the late Mr. Henry Parnall, of Bishopsgate, who has left £5,000 for the general purposes of the college.

A new periodical, the International Presbyterian, of which Dr. Blaikie, Edinburgh, is to be editor, is to be started next January. It is to be the organ of Pan-Presbyterianism, and is the magazine which the Pan-Presbyterian Council agreed to establish if the way to do so seemed open. Dr. Blaikie has a difficult task before him.

At a meeting of "Passionist Fathers" in "Paul of the Cross", Highgate Hill, London, last week, the head of the order in Paris, Father Dennis, said that in the last twelve years no fewer than 800 English, Irish, and American Protestants had been received into the Roman Church at Paris by the Passionist Fathers. This is politically important.

Princess Marie of Germany, the bride of Prince Henry of the Netherlands, is one of the most highly cultivated woman in Germany. Devoted to scientific studies, she is also a good musician and artist, and an excellent linguist, being particularly well acquainted with Latin, while directly her engagement with Prince Henry was decided the Princess began to learn Dutch.

Public executions in France will probably very soon be things of "the barbarous past." The revolting scenes which occurred at the recent double execution have created a strong public feeling against the present system, which is in itself a compromise, inasmuch as the day for which an execution has been fixed is kept as close a secret as possible. It is stated that M. Dufaure, the Prime Minister, is now studying the question of capital punishment within prisons, and has sent for information as to the German and English systems.

The members of the International Prison Congress, which has just concluded at Stockholm, were entertained by the King, who made a great impression. An English delegate writes that on this occasion his Majesty addressed men of nearly every nation in Europe in their own tongue with rare fluency and facility. His Majesty urged that legal punishments should not tend to the extinction, but to the amelioration, of the offender, and that the spirit of justice could act in association with feelings of humanity and love of our neighbour.

What a polyglot people Lord Macaulay's New Zealander will think us, when, some ages hence, the now perpendicular obelisk on the Embankment topples over again, and that jar deposited by the Bible Society comes to be opened. Besides a French Bible, an English Bible, an Arabic Genesis, and a Hebrew Pentateuch, it contains the third chapter of St. John in 215 different languages. More curious still among what may be called the literature of the monolith was the penny pamphlet sold in the crowd containing a vivid biography of Cleopatra.

Some consternation has (the East Anglian News says) been caused amongst the Essex Conservatives owing to Mr. Wood (who is to preside at the Hinckford Conservative gathering next week) having revised the toast list, and to the toast of "The Bishop and clergy of the diocese" added that of "Ministers of all denominations." Meetings have been held, the Bishop of St. Albans communicated with, and we understand, as a compromise, "All ministers of religion" will be proposed. Several gentlemen have, however, in consequence declined to attend.

The marriage laws are being brought up again. Disgusted by the scandals of the Divorce Court, the High Church party have made up their minds apparently to commence an agitation for teaching their view of marriage—a view totally opposed to the teaching lately made popular by public meetings and illegal books. The question actually did come before the Pan-Anglican Synod. It is coming before the Leeds Diocesan Conference next month. It will probably be touched upon at the Church Congress; and there is some idea of commencing an agitation by a public meeting in London.

The activity of the Holy See extends in all directions, as two items of recent news will show. The first is that the Vatican is much concerned at the frequent revolutions in the South American republics, and, in view of extending religious teaching, and rendering the population more peaceable and law abiding, has decided to increase the Catholic Propaganda and the number of bishoprics in those States. Several conferences have recently been held by the Cardinals on the subject. The other item is the announcement in the Catholic Times, that the representatives of the Catholic Press are to be invited to an audience of the Holy Father on the 2nd of February next. Pio Nono held a similar audience on the 2nd February 1877, but the coming event is to be much more splendid. The Catholic Times says: "The influence of the press is, at the present day, all-important, and the universality of odious and anti-religious ideas imposes more strictly than ever upon Catholic Journalists the duty of keeping to the standard prescribed by the Vicar of Christ. They have, too, in the loyal submission and attachment of the faithful generally to the Holy Father, an example worthy of their imitation. It is well that the Holy Father, girt around as he is with afflictions, should receive all the consolation which loving Catholics are capable of affording; and we are sure that the homage of men, who can effect so much good, will be especially grateful to his paternal heart. This movement will, too, do much to unify the action of Catholic journalists, and the voice of him who is their light and guide, will encourage and sustain them in their labours. A splendid phalanx will then, we trust, assemble to give testimony of their fidelity and obedience to their supreme leader." In all this it plainly appears that the aim to the Catholic Revival is first and last to establish the sole authority of the Pope. Already might it not be said by those who talk of Rome, that her "wide walks encompass but one man?"

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE IN BLACKPOOL.

THE calamitous wreck of the Princess Alice stirred up a benevolent wish in the minds of certain musicians, and of the Directors of the Blackpool Winter Gardens to do something to assist the Mansion House Fund in aid of the sufferers. Accordingly Mr. E. Stevenson, the manager, arranged to give a concert of sacred music on Sunday afternoon last. Madame Alice Barth and Mr. G. W. Travener, together with Mr. F. Vetter and the gentlemen of his orchestra, all proffered their gratuitous aid; some fifty or sixty ladies and gentlemen belonging to the choirs of nearly all the places of worship in Blackpool, were desirous of assisting. Every employé at the gardens arranged to pass through the turnstiles, and the proprietors of the local newspapers consented to advertise the concert in their columns free of charge. The billposter said he should only be too glad to give his services for so praiseworthy an object. These efforts were, however, suddenly obstructed by the Rev. C. H. Wainwright, the vicar, who wrote to the Secretary to say—

My dear sir,—I have written to London for an opinion as to the legality of your advertised Sunday concert, and have received this afternoon the reply that it is clearly illegal by the statute 21 Geo. III., c. 49, sec. 4. . . . I am sorry that it should be the Winter Gardens which have attempted to introduce Sunday concerts.

The directors, however, at a special meeting, decided that the concert "shall take place, as announced, but no charge whatever will be made for admission." The programme consisted of selections from Mendelssohn, Haydn, Handel, Bach, Vetter, and Costa. Madame Barth hearing of the vicar's objection wrote to him the following note:—

Sir,—Hearing that you raise legal objections to the Sacred Concert, to be held at the Winter Gardens here on Sunday afternoon next, in aid of the Thames Collision Fund, I feel compelled to ask what authority you find in Scripture for this interference? Allow me to remind you that "the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath," and that our Saviour's own words bade us to do good on the Sabbath Day. Why, then, are we wrong in trying to relieve some of the sufferings of our fellow creatures? As I feel, sir, very strongly on the above subject, I trust that you will accept this as my apology for troubling you.—Yours truly, September 12, 1878.

ALICE BARTH.

The vicar has not replied to this letter. The concert was held. The usual charge for entrance is 6d. Although the afternoon was very wet, the sum realised as voluntary offerings amounted to £160. os. 9d., which represents nearly six thousand sixpences. Twenty gentlemen undertook the collection throughout the Hall, and six little girls, neatly and quietly attired, were placed in prominent positions, each holding a little basket with a card across the breast, bearing the words, "I am collecting money for the poor little orphans." These little orphans received nearly £24. It is estimated that nearly 10,000 people were actually present.

At the Unitarian Church the Rev. A. B. Camm, on Sunday morning last, selected as the topic of his discourse "Providence and the Thames Calamity," and what he had to say with immediate reference to the Winter Gardens concert was unequivocally in favour of the step which had been taken by the directors of that institution. The offertory at the evening service was devoted to the same noble purpose, when Mr. Camm gave a very interesting sermon on "Natural Laws." The collection realised £3.

ON ROMANS IX., 5.

(REVISED.)

MANY of our readers are aware of the doubt which attaches to the punctuation and consequent rendering of this verse, and will be glad to hear of any fresh light which recent inquiry has thrown upon the subject.

In the Authorised Version the verse stands thus: "Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen." A more exact adherence to the Greek order of the words would have expressed the latter part of the verse thus: "of whom Christ came as concerning the flesh, who is over all, God blessed for ever." This slight change is worthy of note, in connection with the following statement.

In the translation of the Epistle by Professor Jowett, the verse reads thus: "Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came. God, who is over all, is blessed for ever. Amen." This is also substantially the rendering of Davidson, of Weizsäcker, Meyer, and many recent authorities of the highest character. This change of rendering depends on the punctuation of the verse, which, in the critical texts of Lachman and Tischendorf, has a full stop after the word rendered "flesh," marking off the next following words as an independent sentence.

Little light as regards the division of the words has been hitherto derived from the ancient manuscripts of the New Testament. These, it is well known, contain very few stops, and not only so, but they do not separate the words from one another. Thus, in this verse, the text runs, TOKATAΣAPKAOΩN. It is, consequently, sometimes a little uncertain how a sentence should be read, and what kind of a stop should be introduced. In the present case, a very important difference of meaning arises according as one stop or another is used after the word σάρκα (flesh). The editors of ancient New Testament texts have not always been careful to represent such stops as do exist in the manuscripts, and it occurred to the writer to examine the most ancient codices which he could gain access to, with the special view of ascertaining how this verse is pointed. The following are the results:—

(1) The Vatican manuscript (B), at Rome, has a stop after the word σάρκα exactly the same in appearance as the point following the word "Amen," at the end of the verse, thus ΣΑΡΚΑ·ΟΩΝ. There is no space, however, between the letters A and O to indicate that the original writer intended a point to stand there. Nevertheless, as the ink of the stop and of the letters is apparently the same, it is very probable that the stop is in this case a prima manu; and according to Tischendorf many of the stops in this manuscript are so.

(2) In the Alexandrine manuscript (A), in the British Museum, a stop occurs in the same place; and not only a stop but a small space, to make room for it, thus: ΣΑΡΚΑ·ΟΩΝ. The colour of this stop is exactly the same as that of the adjoining letters, a faded brown, indicating that letters and stop are from one original hand, which of course the occurrence of the little space also indicates.

(3) In the Codex Ephraemi (C), which the writer had recently an opportunity of examining in the Bibliothèque Nationale, at Paris, the same stop occurs, only it is not a point but a little cross (x), such as elsewhere occurs in this manuscript. There is also a small space, leaving room for the cross. This latter may not be from the original hand, but the space must be so, and it appears likely that originally there was only a point where now the cross is; such as is found after some words in the same immediate context in this manuscript.

Whether the Sinai Manuscript (Aleph), one of the four reputedly oldest MSS. of the New Testament, contains the same stop, the writer is unable to say. The fac-simile published by Tischendorf represents neither stop nor space. But this is not conclusive against the existence of a point in the original, seeing that the editors of fac-similes have not always been careful to represent the stops, as in the case of the fac-simile of the Vatican B by Vercellone. Possibly, some reader of these words may have the opportunity of examining the original (Aleph) in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. It would be interesting to know whether the stop exists or not in this manuscript.

It is needless to add that the translations of Jowett and Davidson, as well as the critical remarks of Winer, Meyer, and other more recent scholars, are greatly confirmed by the heretofore unnoticed presence of this stop in the three great and ancient manuscripts above referred to. Woide, it should be added, in his fac-simile edition of the Alexandrine, has given the stop, though (in the copy which the writer recently inspected) it is represented in an imperfect kind of way, and not exactly in the position which it holds in the manuscript.

STRAY THOUGHTS BY THE SEASIDE.

OUT by the seaside, with God's blue sky above and the wide expanse of a glorious ocean stretching into the far distance—a man ought to feel well-disposed to everybody and everything on such a day, and to fall in with the spirit of Nature who seems to be uttering her wish:—"Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men."

But, we all know, Jessica was never merry when she heard sweet music; and perhaps the fine day affects me as the sweet music did Jessica. Perhaps I am melancholy like Jacques because of a temperament given to moralising, and the habit I have long indulged in of using my leisure on Sundays to go a preaching. Whatever be the cause, I cannot turn my eyes from the sea to the shore and the people crowded there without feeling something of the cynic rising within me. A many there are here seeking change and rest— young men and maidens, old men and matrons—some with the bloom of youth upon their faces, hurrying on in the race of life to fulfil their mission, resolved to do and dare and take the consequences; others who have done this before and now are restless and uneasy, there being always some "one thing needful" which eludes the grasp.

Here we have an Elysium—a Paradise—a rest for the "weary" and "heavy laden," a portico for the Stoics, and a garden of pleasure for the Epicureans. But what rest is there for the Christian warrior? How shall the sinning—the criminal, the pauper, the beggar—be won from the errors of their ways, and brought to their Elysium?

Lying not far from me is a young man, who should be in the prime of his bodily stature. He has wasted his substance and his character in indifferent living. His mother before had shown the way, and he followed. He had a bright and an inquiring mind, but his aspirations after a higher life—dimly lit up at best—were extinguished by Creed Christians ridiculing and slighting his scientific notions. I suppose there always will be lip service, cynical professors, who will play the Pharisaic "holier than thou" part—and reflect shame on the lessons of the Master—Christians who practically ignore the Christian spirit of doing good, as the essential sympathetic link in Church life. They are Evangelical to the letter—not the spirit—and stand aghast and denounce others for not taking their interpretations of the Master's thought. Like a Doctor of Divinity I once knew, they want a bond of union after their own opinion. And so they denounced this young man. Once he was in a fair way—steady, a Church member, and active in the Sunday school, but it was insisted that Christianity meant thinking in a certain direction; and, having no helps in his way of thinking, felt that sympathy was withdrawn from him, and so he dropped out of the ranks. The end was, he appeared in the police court, and it need not be said what that means. Now of all folks in the world religiously-professing people should be the last, incidentally, to contribute to a result like this. A man, of course, goes wrong of his own motion, but then other people may indicate and smooth the way for his downfall; and had I, by cynical sneering at even impertinent questioning, done so in his case, I should feel self-convicted of the neglect of a Christian duty. I cast my eye over the promenade at this place, and I see every variety of character—the young full of "fancy and fashion," the stalwart man and woman airing themselves in relaxation from ordinary duties, and the aged and the invalided. How one's heart ought to go out in good will to all. I should be sorry to know that one of these—even the little child playing upon the sands—was indifferent about believing the truth. Love of the truth is a prime necessity. Jesus tells us the spirit of truth will make us free. He was not shocked because men expressed what they conscientiously thought to be true—though its form was unconventional. Unitarians can never be wrong in seeking fellowship with the good and the true, the brave and heroic children of God.

I happen to know many of these people, and I know too much of them and of human nature to call any of them bad, though many are giddy, vain, self-indulgent pleasure seekers. Every one of them, I feel assured, would be ashamed to be detected in a meanness. And there is a great deal of good in some which others there shut their eyes against. There, for instance, goes a man I know who is a good Catholic. He believes, too, in getting on in the world, and has some regard to outward appearances. You tell me you have no brotherly feeling towards such a man because he does not believe in your creed. I say so much the worse for you and your creed; you belie your professed discipleship to Christ. That man, to my certain knowledge, is a good husband, and a devoted father to his children. Such a man cannot but be a Christian. He has in him some of the spirit of the Master. This fine day, while others enjoy themselves he gives himself the duty of airing his little sick ones, inviting ozone to do its curative work. People tell me I am to condemn him for the mode of his thought. Ye, of little faith, with your unjust scales would weigh the cup of cold water against your own belief, and find the cup weightless! But it may be asked, "Could you worship with Catholics?" Yes, certainly, so long as the worship is purely devotional to the One true God. It is when creeds and intellectual theories are insisted upon as essential to belief that I should part company with the religion of sects (Catholicism and Episcopalianism among the rest), for every honest man must be true to his thought. Mostly it is the religion of the intellect and ignorant bigotry, nurtured by creeds, grown up, that converts religion into a system of "Accredited statements" which have well-nigh made it as formal as processes of law. Witness, for instance, the recent scene at a funeral in a village in Suffolk, where the Rev. George Drury, rector of Claydon-cum-Akenham, interrupted a short funeral service outside the churchyard, on the ground that the dead child was not a Christian, as it had not been baptised, and that it was his duty to teach his parishioners that "manhood and feelings had nothing to do with it," nor had "religious conviction" or "humanity" anything to do with it. Witness, too, the experience of the Shakers misguided by Mrs. Girling. The heart of man groping for the living God would keep all men in religious fellowship, not split them into the peculiarities of sects. I have a hope—will it ever be realised?—that the day will come when all men can join together in devotional worship, in the grand old temples which stand as monuments of man's devotional nature, from a common sympathy with the Divine, as universally as they now enjoy "the sunshine and the shower." To make religion a system of thought is but to repeat the errors of past ages. A good man sees good continuously. Oh, but you say he is a Theist, or a Deist—a man of science in love with "evolution"—and he deserves to be hit hard. Indeed! and are you the man to hit him? Is your daily living better than his? Friend, show me your faith by your works. Who made you judge over another man's conscience? or gave you the right to stone him for the mode of his thought? Such a Christian philosophy will not do now. Historical Christians must not subordinate living Christians.

As I sit here and see the number of happy faces that pass me, and hear the jovial glee of the young ones making sand pies, and darning the sea in its tidal ripples to come an inch beyond a marked line, I cannot but be impressed with a deep sense of the goodness of the Great and Good God who presides over all; and take to heart what a blessed thing it would be if in our moments of enjoyment we could ever keep bright the Psalmist's inspiration high above creedal Christianity—"Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"

WEEK EVENING AMUSEMENTS FOR SUNDAY SCHOLARS.

[A REPORT presented by the General Purposes Committee to the General Committee of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and adopted by them at their meeting on July 29th, 1878.]

Valuable information on this subject has been received from several friends, to whom the best thanks of the Committee are due. The plans described being very various, and depending much upon the details of their working, it will be best to quote at some length from the accounts received before attempting to sum up the results, and to determine what our Committee may venture to recommend to the associated schools.

Of the Domestic Mission, the Missionary writes:—

The history of our main and most successful effort is simply this. I found that many of our young people—I mean those from sixteen to twenty years old, or a little more—were being tempted by their natural love of dancing and company to go to the dancing saloons and classes, which in large towns are very dangerous in their society and influence. On my expressing dissatisfaction with this habit, I was asked by several if they might meet once a week at the Mission to dance, so as to keep it amongst themselves. On consideration, I said Yes; and on one night (first Fridays and afterwards Mondays) we met, varying in numbers from twenty to forty, and just danced, and I played for them, and watched to stop any rough play or bad manners. We limited the attendance strictly to attendants at the Sunday school and evening service. I frequently tried to introduce other amusements, but for two or three years dancing was too popular, and they would have nothing else. Once or twice I found individuals who broke faith, and went to the dancing classes; but I put it to them clearly that they must give up one or the other, and they nearly always stuck to us. The last two years I have managed to introduce other games between the dances, though nothing intellectual or particularly elevating will go down with them. I allow "Tersey," "Dumb Crambo," "Railway" "Hotel," "When? Where? and Why?" but not often.

My impression, after some years, is that on the whole this experiment has succeeded very well in keeping our elder scholars and teachers to the place, and making them feel it their home and headquarters; and I have no reason to think that any counterbalancing harm has been done. At first the rage for dancing increased; but it burnt itself out gradually, and the same lot still come, with a few exceptions.

For the younger ones—the boys of twelve to fifteen or sixteen—I had for several winters a club-night once a week, with draughts, dominoes, quartett-cards, "Solitaire," "Go Bang," and such games, galvanic battery, Zoetrope, microscope, sometimes stereoscope, and volumes of Illustrated London News. Fifty to sixty used often to be there, and they behaved on the whole very well, though noisy and careless with the games. I did not limit the attendance to Sunday scholars, and lots of street boys came in.

This last season I gave this up, and instead of it had a more limited club, exclusively Sunday-school boys, meeting every night of the week if they liked, down in the girls' schoolroom, and managing their own affairs entirely; but after some weeks they dropped off, and it was given up. I found it hard to keep up enough variety of games, and they like more active occupations. On Tuesdays most of them attended the meeting of the Juvenile Templars, and did not need the club.

In summer time a lot of the boys form a cricket club, and we lend them bats, wickets, &c., and a football. At present they have two distinct clubs, with bats, &c., and meeting at — Park.

They are immensely eager to start a drum and fife band; but it costs money to start it, and their enthusiasms last so short a time that I have not decided to give in to their wish. I would rather have a set of handbells.

We have had a Thursday night class for the three R's for some months, but it is now closed for the summer. About twenty to twenty-five boys and girls came.

Of the "Social Evenings" at the — Sunday School, Miss — writes:—

They have been going on for seven winters, and I hope we shall be able to continue them, as they seem to do good, give pleasure, and to be a refining and civilising influence.

The idea occurred to my brother and me that we might have a meeting of our classes—his the senior boys', and mine the senior girls'—on some evening in the week, for amusement and sociability. Our fellow-teachers were doubtful whether this mixing of boys and girls was advisable, but it has been perfectly successful. Only on one occasion during these seven years have we seen the slightest rudeness. The attendance varies, perhaps, from thirty to fifty. We have had more, especially at the dramatic performances and Shakspeare readings. We now invite the first classes of both schools, as well as the seniors, and the young people are free to bring a friend when they like, with the understanding that they are responsible for their being pleasant, orderly guests. A few members of the congregation sometimes join us, and we are glad to see as many of the teachers as can come. My brother and I are the responsible managers, and take the part of hosts, shaking hands with our guests as they arrive, and getting introduced to strangers. We think this important, and conducive to good manners. They are of all ages from fifteen to thirty, more young women and girls than young men. This gives us some dissatisfaction. We would like the meetings to be as much enjoyed and sought after, and as regularly attended by the youths as they are by the girls, and we are on the look out for the reason and the remedy. They are almost all workers in factories and warehouses. Our meetings are fortnightly, and from eight to half-past nine. We generally begin with piano-playing. Then follows a lecture or paper of about half an hour's length, and games and singing end the entertainment. This is the last list of our doings:—Readings from "Adam Bede" (Mrs. Poyser); the Solar System; Beethoven, with illustrations; Stanley's Explorations in Africa; Oliver Goldsmith; Readings from "Alice in Wonderland"; Salt, with experiments; Volcanoes; Rhine Legends, with songs and pictures; tea party.

We have till this last time begun and ended with the reading of a Shakspeare's play, but having had the most suitable ones are leaving that vein for the present. Occasionally some of our elder scholars have prepared short papers—biographical for the most part—and this we encourage as much as we can. The games we find most popular are such as "Post," "Guessing Circles," "I sent my ship to the Cape," Acting Rhymes, Charades, &c. All acting has to be carefully supervised. We have hitherto drawn the line at dancing, but I am personally inclined to overstep this.

The great point is to have the intercourse between teachers and taught unofficial, and genial, and friendly, and to help our young people to meet in a pleasant and sociable fashion for rational recreation.

At one of our large schools a dancing class was started some years ago, in order to counteract the attractions of dancing classes elsewhere. Our correspondent writes:—

The class was open to the two elder classes of young men and young women; it was well attended, and was considered a success. The numbers would be perhaps thirty, or more.

In such a scheme a great measure of the success would depend upon the choice of a good teacher, one to whose authority the young people would readily bow. And, again, it would be too much perhaps to expect any such efforts as these to be productive of unmixed good; and now and then cases might occur of these opportunities being abused by the scholars, and such, no doubt, would tend to bring the whole thing into disrepute. Still, I cannot but think that we must face this question of amusement; the young people must have it, and if it is not provided for them at the school under proper superintendence, they will run heavier risks to get it elsewhere. Probably, if they join classes for dancing at the Mechanics' institutes or other places, they will adopt a style of dancing less simple and less refined than anything they would have learnt at the school; and, moreover, they will be unable to choose their associates as carefully.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the London Sunday School Association of the Holbeck Mission, at Leeds, Mr. Councillor Mathers said:—

We have made it a point in the government of our Sunday schools to provide entertainments throughout the whole year. In the summer we have upon Saturday afternoons short excursions into the country, and some of us make it our duty to prepare some short notice of the district into which we are going; and in the winter we give dramatic entertainments. We have a perfect stage and apparatus for the purpose. Now let me tell you that, though this alone has shocked the sensitive feelings of many of our orthodox friends, they have felt the necessity of following our example, because the children of their own denominations are seeking two sources of pleasure—they are either going into the town, or coming down to us. And in order to rival the attractions we hold out, they are introducing a class of entertainments which I should trust Unitarians will never be ashamed of encouraging. Now, in connection with our schools we have a library and reading room; and also a room in which various games, such as chess and draughts, are played. Then we have our old scholars' society, which four or five times a year gathers the old scholars and teachers together. We have also our parents' gatherings, which are very delightful occasions indeed; our temperance association, and several other methods in practice for promoting and strengthening the bonds of union amongst us.

BOLTON DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION

THE annual meeting of the above Association was held at Hindley, on Thursday, September 12th. The day was fine, and a good number of friends were present, among whom were Revs. C. C. Coe, Geo. Fox, E. Allen, C. H. Osler, G. Ride, A. Rushton; Messrs. Philemon Moore, I. Barrow, T. Carter Hollins, — Anderton, M. Knowles, B. Richardson, J. Jones.

Divine service was conducted by the Rev. E. ALLEN, of Walmsey, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. C. H. OSLER, of Darwen, from Acts xvi., 30. After the service tea was partaken of, and a meeting held in the new and commodious schoolrooms. The chair was taken by the Rev. A. Rushton, the minister of the Hindley Congregation, and after a hymn

The CHAIRMAN gave a brief address, in which, after cordially welcoming the Association, he referred to the noble religious ancestry the members of the Association possessed in their Presbyterian forefathers. He related an incident of the rise of Presbyterianism in Hindley, and loved to think that their congregation had its beginnings in the shepherd whose prayers were so highly prized by the afflicted one for whom they were offered. Mr. Rushton, in drawing attention to the new room in which they were gathered, also expressed a hope that before long the congregation would rejoice in a renovated chapel.

The Rev. GEO. FOX, the secretary, read the minutes of the last meeting and the financial account. He also addressed the meeting at some length on the sentiment of the "Bolton District Unitarian Association." The Association had pursued the even tenor of its way for the last 52 years, through many changes. If the chapels connected with the Association had not increased, yet there were marks of vigorous life in each, and each rejoiced in alterations or additions in the shape of new schoolrooms. The Association was unpretentious in its character and aims. It had indeed been despised for its smallness, but it did a useful work in its own way. It was valuable as affording an opportunity for the members of the same "household of faith" of meeting together, and it stirred up the congregation when its annual gathering took place. Their position as Unitarians was yet an isolated one, and they needed the stimulus that such an organisation was able to give.

Mr. ANDERTON, of Hindley, referred to the time, 50 years ago, when he first visited the Hindley chapel, and pointed out the great improvement that had been made in the chapel and its surroundings since then. He would be glad to hear some statement from the ministers of the congregations of the district as to the work being done by them.

Mr. ISAAC BARROW, of Bolton, proposed a vote of thanks to the officiating ministers. Speaking in complimentary terms of the services rendered by Messrs. Allen and Osler, he said men needed the direction a sermon gave, even though there might be diversity of opinion about the sermon itself. He also expressed his sympathy with the Association as giving the country congregations the only chance they had of having the presence of their brethren of other churches among them in any number.

The Rev. C. C. COE seconded the vote of thanks. He felt it a privilege to meet his friends and neighbours on such an occasion, and to join in the services of the day. It was a delight to him to be a hearer, and, after his recent experience of unmitigated orthodoxy in Scotland, to listen to such a discourse as had been given by the preacher.

The vote was unanimously passed, and a cordial welcome given to the Rev. E. Allen, who had recently settled at Walmsey.

The Rev. C. H. OSLER responded for himself, and said it was a privilege to him to belong to any section of the Unitarian Church. Freedom of speech was allowed him, even though there might be criticism.

The Rev. E. ALLEN also acknowledged the vote of thanks and the cordial welcome given to him. He had heard disparaging remarks on the Association, and was agreeably surprised to see so large a meeting. The meeting was a sufficient rebuke to those who believed the Association useless. He spoke on the characteristics of Protestant Dissenters as earnestly following their convictions, and said that while they were proud of their Presbyterian ancestry, they should strive to be fruitful in good.

The meeting was now considerably thinned, owing to the arrival of the train—time for many from the various congregations.

The Rev. GEO. RIDE, of Chorley, spoke on the sentiment "Prosperity to our Missionary Associations." He referred to the new zeal which the Bolton District Association had kindled in his congregation when it last visited Chorley, and spoke on the good work which was being done by the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission.

Mrs. FARROW, of Park Lane, moved a vote of thanks to the Hindley Congregation for their hospitable reception of the Association. It was to her a real pleasure to come to Hindley, as the friends appeared so united, and made such efforts to provide for the entertainment of their neighbours. If, during the coming winter, they should have any public entertainment, she would be glad, as a token of her goodwill, to give them her services. (Applause.)

The Rev. GEO. FOX seconded the resolution, which was carried.

Mr. JONES and Mr. HARDMAN responded on behalf of the tea makers, and the choir, who had, in the course of the evening, sung several anthems, acknowledged their share in the resolution by leading off the verse, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The meeting, which had been very successful both in numbers and interest, then separated.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

THE session of the Home Missionary Board was opened at the Memorial Hall on Wednesday afternoon. There was a large attendance, and among those present were the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A. (principal and literary tutor), Rev. W. E. Odgers, M.A. (theological tutor), Rev. James Black, M.A. (missionary tutor), Dr. Marcus (voluntary German tutor), H. Rawson, Esq. (chairman of committee), E. C. Harding (treasurer), Rev. H. E. Dowson and Mr. Francis Nicholson (secretaries), Revs. S. A. Steintal, G. H. Wells, M.A., W. G. Cadman, Chas. C. Coe, F. G. S., J. Harrop, Chas. T. Poynting, B.A., W. C. Squier, F. H. Jones, B.A., P. M. Higginson, M.A., J. K. Smith, J. B. Lloyd, A. Ashworth, J. T. Marriott, Messrs. Robt. Nicholson, W. G. Rayner Wood, Smith Golland, Thos. Diggles, G. H. Leigh, Royston Oliver, J. H. Reynolds, John Phillips, W. H. Herford, B.A., John Armstrong, Philemon Moore, T. Parry. The session was opened with nineteen students, being the largest number since the foundation of the institution.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS, in entering upon his duties as theological tutor, delivered the opening address, which was an exhaustive survey of the study of Biblical criticism, and concluded with these words:—But I am hurrying to action without saying anything of my own studies, or my own plans and methods. That is just as well. I could say no more, however I might try, than this: I am a pupil of John James Taylor. I have striven, and am resolved ever to strive, to cultivate his spirit of thoroughness in labour, sincerity in thought, candour in speech, singular fairness in discussion, and sympathetic regard for the conclusions of others. I ask you to regard this aim and resolution as my principal qualification for teaching others.

INDUCTION OF THE SUCCESSOR TO THE LATE REV. S. MARTIN.

ON Sunday morning week the Rev. John Felstead, late of Nottingham, commenced his duties as pastor of the Conigre Chapel, Trowbridge, by preaching morning and evening to crowded congregations. The morning's discourse was founded on Matt. vi., 10, "Thy kingdom come," and at the close of a masterly sermon the preacher said: I have chosen these words this morning because you and I, you as a congregation and I as a preacher, meet under peculiar circumstances to-day, and we expect to meet together week by week to worship in this place; and what is our object? Our object is indicated in the text, "Thy kingdom come." Why do we come together here? We come because there is a certain desire in our heart to see the world made better than it is, to see righteousness reigning in the world; a desire that the kingdom of God may come. We meet that this desire may be strengthened within us, and that in some measure through us it may be accomplished. If we pray "Thy kingdom come," we do not desire that a great change may take place merely in the world around us, but rather and chiefly do we want it in the world within us. If we say, "Thy kingdom come," it is but saying with the Psalmist, "Create in me a clean heart, O God." Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. Bend your thoughts on self-improvement, and in proportion as you do that, will the desire grow stronger within you for the world's improvement; will you be filled with earnestness as you pray "Thy kingdom come;" and thus living to improve yourself, your own spirit and character, your daily life will be a force, working slowly and unconsciously it may be, but working not without the Divine energy, to bring about the fulfilment of the prayer. Earnestly do I hope and pray that God will make use of the ministry that begins here to-day to help on the reign of God, the reign of the righteous Father, the reign of righteousness and the reign of joy in your hearts, in the hearts of all of you; that He may use this ministry to strengthen within you the spirit which finds utterance in this great prayer—"Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy kingdom come."

The evening discourse was founded on 1 Samuel xii., 23, "Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you; but I will teach you the good and the right way." The sermon was listened to with breathless attention by a crowded congregation.

BURNLEY.—On Sunday, September 8, 1878, the annual school sermons in connection with Trafalgar-street Church, were preached by the minister, the Rev. Thomas Leyland, and the occasion was seized for the introduction of a novelty, so far as Burnley is concerned. A flower service was held in the morning, and the church was tastefully decorated with beautiful plants and flowers kindly lent for the occasion. Mr. Leyland delivered a most interesting address bearing upon the subject of flowers, basing his remarks upon the saying of Jesus: "Consider the lilies," &c. The congregations during the day were large. The collections amounted to £17. 14s. On Monday morning all the cut flowers were presented to the Workhouse Hospital.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE PULPIT.

[FROM THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.]

It would be no compliment to anybody's memory to copy Charles Lamb's account of his aunt, "a dear and good one, whom single blessedness had soured to the world," and who used to tell him that he was the only thing in it that she loved. Who does not remember her? There she sits before our eyes, prim and quiet, gravely dressed, not a thread awry in all her attire, slicing the French beans into the "china basin of fair water;" and the odour of the beans comes to us across the years, just as it did to her nephew, when he wrote that immortal account of his "Relations." The maiden aunt, for all her asperities, was "a fine old Christian;"—the sweet humourist underscores the words. She was, he says, from morning till night "poring over good books and devotional exercises." Her especial favourites were Thomas à Kempis, in Stanhope's translation, and a Roman Catholic prayer-book, "with the matins and complines regularly set down." She was "daily admonished" that these books were "Popish," but daily read them, as devoutly, at least, as Mrs. Varden did her "Protestant Manual." For all that she went regularly to some Protestant church on Sunday. She had scarcely ever read any other book than the "Adventures of an Unfortunate Young Nobleman;"—but she was a woman of strong sense and fine wit. It is important to notice this, in order that we may not attribute to weakness the perfect catholicity of the good old soul's religion. Lamb tells us that, finding the door of the chapel in Essex-street open one day, she went in, liked the sermon, and the manner of worship there, and frequented the place at intervals for some time after. Now the preacher was Theophilus Lindsey. So here we have a shrewd old lady worshipping at church and at the Unitarian chapel by turns, and filling up her time with a Roman Catholic prayer-book and Thomas à Kempis. Upon her visits to the Unitarian chapel, and her liking for the sermon and the services, Lamb quietly but very instructively remarks—"She came not for doctrinal points, and never missed them."

I will ask leave to finish my anecdotes at one stroke. A few years ago, at a certain place of "worship," where the preacher just then was a "very advanced" man, I was a little surprised to be recognised by a gentleman whom I knew in business, and should have supposed to be a most conventional churchman of the ordinary stamp—and I found he was a regular seat-holder, and "supporter of the cause." The next time I met him—in the very thick and clatter of business it was—I remarked, among other things, that Mr. Blank was an intelligent man, and that his addresses were highly informing, but that there was a grotesque contrast between his address and the hymns sung—which were from Martineau's Selection—and that he never "warmed the cockles of your heart." My friend—the sort of man from whom you would not look for sentiment—replied, "Yes, that's it, he doesn't lift you up, as Martineau does."

Not long ago, an American newspaper contained a very sensible letter from a lady, who said that she had been educated in "Liberal Christianity," and was accustomed to attend the services of preachers of the "Liberal" school, but that she feared she should be driven to church, where she would be pretty sure of hearing a plain sermon, perhaps an encouraging one, and where she would escape controversial inuendoes, and the incessant worry of a "scientific theology" which never seemed sure of anything. After a week of trouble and worldliness, she said she wanted a "sanctuary" on Sunday, and yet she found at the "Liberal" church that the very prayers were tinged with the circumlocution of (what is very tiresomely called) "modern thought," while the sermon was half of it a discussion more or less direct of the bases of belief.

I entirely sympathised with this lady, and thought at once of Charles Lamb's aunt, and of my business friend who wanted to be "lifted up" when he went to a place of worship. It was just what I wanted myself, and what most people want, with whom the Sunday's service is anything but routine. Nor is the trouble or difficulty in question by any means peculiar to places where the preachers are openly classed as belonging to "Liberal" schools of thought.

[The writer then refers to the tightening of the strings of dogma at present proceeding in the great mass of Dissent; and says of the difficulty thus arising, with other concomitant difficulties:—What with the pressure of the money question (when it is real and not a mere matter of "position"); the pressure of creeds; and the dread of being forced into false situations by that sort of publicity, or meddling from without, which tends to reduce even strong men to social puppets, it is scarcely possible to feel too strongly for Mr. A., Mr. B., Mr. C., or hundreds of their brethren. The momentary "gain" to the repressing side, he says, will come out of the mill a short time hence in the shape of a dead loss, with compound interest; and meanwhile there is no such school of scepticism as the writing or preaching of the man who has allowed himself to be thus dealt with.]

But let us not dwell upon the dark side of this subject too long. It is unnecessary, for even what has gone before will have given a sharp stab to many a heart. Let us rather cast about for help and consolation.

Is it possible that we may find both in Lamb's sketch of his old-fashioned aunt, who went to the Unitarian chapel in the morning and read Thomas à Kempis in the evening? Perhaps we may. It has often been remarked that we find a greater number of converts from Roman Catholicism among Unitarians than in any other religious body, and that Unitarians, especially educated ones, are peculiarly apt to pass over to the other camp. I do not affirm this in either clause; but supposing it to be true, I still less admit the usual explanation: which is, that extremes are apt to meet, and that the transition from a maximum to a minimum of belief—as in the case of Blanco White—is natural. But we need not inquire into the truth of the report, for in any case there is a salient point of contact between the Unitarian and the Roman Catholic, and we may readily find illustrations of it in the hymns and devotional writings that are most beloved on both sides. On each side the process of exclusion differs, but on each side we may almost go so far as to say the main current of the devotional life is rid of dogma. In the case of the Roman Catholic, the question of dogma is, so to speak, handed over; and to the great disembarment of the soul: in the case of the Unitarian, there is, to speak roughly, all but nothing that could embarrass; so that on each side the simple worship and love of God has free course in his creature. Of "Catholics," personally, I do not know much—though the best books of devotion bearing any such name are familiar to me. But I have an intimate knowledge of Protestants of all names, and I know no such examples of what I should call devoutness pure and simple as among the Unitarians. Let us recall the case of the two Newmans, both living. There are strong resemblances between the writings of the two brothers, considered simply as writings; but that is only collaterally interesting; the point is that you may pass from Mr. Francis Newman's devotional book "Theism" to Thomas à Kempis and St. Augustine without feeling any jar. Of course, we must except from the scope of this remark all the numerous passages in the Catholic writers in which dogma relating to Jesus, the Trinity, original sin, &c., finds a place. But the great fact which I have just indicated remains; and we may note in the best Unitarian hymn-books an extraordinary number of devotional poems from Catholic sources.

Now it would be unwise to risk the practical value of this line of comment by pushing it to its limits; but it surely has a practical value. If we select from Thomas à Kempis, and the most advanced Unitarians, instances of the kind of devotional writing in which the Catholic and Unitarian feel alike at home, and in which other religious persons also feel at home until they set to work to look for what they call "the distinguishing doctrines of the Gospel," we shall find that this covers a large tract of ground available for public devotion—ground which has to be covered in all public religious services. The practical difficulty for the harassed preacher is not removed by this consideration, but it is much lightened—supposing him to be a deeply religious man. In that case he will find it comparatively easy to keep to the King's high road—and only a few cantankerous persons will trouble him about it.

It may safely be laid down, however, that only a small number of religious teachers have—or show that they have—that supreme "call" to the work which first and finally makes itself heard in the spiritual depths of the man's nature and that of his hearers. The greater number of preachers are religious lecturers. Our most accredited evangelists, even, show a great deal too much of the art—or the genius—of the advocate. It would do them all good, by way of alternative, to be confined for a space to the Psalms and the Gospels, as hunting grounds for pulpit topics. There is a capital story, a true one I believe, of a gentleman who, being in some strange town, got downright weary of hearing sermons from Paul's Epistles at different places of worship, and at last went in half-despairing hope to some little chapel outside the fashionable circle. "Perhaps among this simpler people I shall stand some slight chance of hearing the word of Jesus," said he. The preacher's text that evening sounded like a jest to him; "Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus," &c.

It has been quite in the course of nature that of late years so much more attention has been paid to the devotional part of the service—at least, in the more cultivated congregations. This has been some relief to the preacher; it has shortened the sermon; and under the stronger emotional impressions produced by the greater emphasis laid upon the prayer and praise, some practical difficulties have been shaded off a little. There has also been a largely increased leaning towards "practical" sermons. For great part of this we are indebted to "High Church" preachers. I recall with something like amusement the first discourse I ever heard in a Ritualistic place of worship. There was a crowded fashionable congregation, with a splendid service; and the sermon, which occupied twelve minutes bare, was on "the sin of backbiting." It might have been taken every word from Mrs. Trimmer; but it was a very good homily of a sort too much wanted. So far as sermon proper was concerned, the preacher might almost have been a Mussulman. It was the devotional portion of the service which was intended to produce the strongest, or at least the most diffused impression, and it did.

No preacher of good intelligence and fair reading, especially if young, can help being much harassed in what one might perhaps indicate as the interval between study and pulpit, and then, again, between pulpit and study. The majority of "religious" critics have little advice to give to sufferers in these matters beyond what amounts to this: Try not to have doubts about anything—i.e., sit down upon the safety-valve, and risk an explosion. There are evident signs of increasing pressure from without in this or some such sense or senses. But what the harassed and sometimes almost heart-broken young preacher requires is rest—a breathing-space. If he has a true vocation for the work of the religious teacher, he will find some help in confining himself for a time to the simply devotional, the simply practical, and the objectively exegetical. If, in addition to this, he will, by an effort, determine from time to time, as well as he can, the lowest terms to which he can be logically reduced as to his creed, and how much of what he is "expected" to teach can be got within those lines, without any attempt at deceiving others or himself, he may safely hope for the highest assistance ever vouchsafed to the human conscience in these cases, and must surely save his soul alive; while the congregation—with whom we began—will be "lifted up," healed, and rested—a thing which does not too often happen to the hearer even of the most sincere, eloquent, and evangelical preachers. It is one thing to be excited, and "religiously" taken out of yourself for a time. This may be useful; but it is another and a higher thing to feel healed, soothed, and rested. The effect of a vigorous, aggressive, evangelical sermon may be to a watchful, intelligent hearer even more disturbing than one in which the preacher invites you to make your spiritual meal off his own doubts or his private and peculiar trick of dealing with what he calls "modern thought." Neither brings you any nearer to the secret of the Almighty; or soothes you into love, worship, and acquiescence afar off. Neither lifts you up; and lifting up is what you too often need.

So absolute is the spirit of liberty, which is the vital and essential point of what we call Unitarianism, that it has always been found impossible to reduce it to a formula. The endeavour has often been made to bring it within the limits of a creed. You might as well try to bend the sunshine. You cannot confine a spirit which is as broad and general as the encasing air.—George William Curtis.

A young philosopher of seven years of age who had not got far enough to hear the Holy Scripture disputed by science, listened attentively in his father's parlour the other evening to a warm discussion on the Darwinian theory, and, after the guests had departed, somewhat surprised the paternal with: "Father, I don't believe Mr. Darwin is right." "What?" said the parent, looking down at this unexpected reasoner, who stood before him with a little Bible in his hand: "You do not? and why?" "Because, papa, my Bible says, 'God created man in his own image,' and I don't believe it was a monkey." "Well, well," said the sire, laughing, "run along, Tommy; you are too young to talk about such things." "But, papa, almost the next verse says, 'God saw everything he had made, and behold it was very good.' Now it wasn't good if men were monkeys, was it? For you are gooder than a monkey, ain't you, papa?"

A WATER-LILY.

O STAR on the breast of the river,
 O marvel of bloom and grace,
 Did you fall straight down from heaven
 Out of the sweetest place?
 You are white as the thoughts of an angel;
 Your heart is steeped in the sun;
 Did you grow in the golden city,
 My pure and radiant one?
 Nay, nay, I fell not out of heaven;
 None gave me my saintly white;
 It slowly grew from the blackness
 Down in the dreary night.
 From the ooze of the silent river
 I won my glory and grace.
 White souls fall not, O my poet;
 They rise to the sweetest place.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE AIMS AND MEANS OF JESUS.

I.

By admission of RENAN, STRAUSS, and STUART MILL, equally as by the reverent homage of Christians of all varieties of theological confession, the life of JESUS fills the central position in the moral history of the world. The question, then, naturally arises—What was the purpose of it? Its aim was not of an intellectual but of a spiritual character, and therefore it is irrelevant to compare it, as is sometimes done, with that of ancient and modern philosophers. It was to awaken and nourish love by that kind of knowledge which appeals to the sympathies, and enkindles the heart to the pursuit of personal holiness. Inspired by this object, JESUS pierced beyond the spiritually inefficient externalisms which the Jew had substituted for inward principles, and went straight to the heart and conscience in order to impel men to the culture of a right spirit. And he began with individuals because society can be spiritually regenerated only through the reformation of the individual members of it.

Starting with this principle, observe how far-reaching are the aims of JESUS. They are not limited by the land of Judea, nor bounded by distinctions of sex, age, condition, or nation. Instead of being narrowed by Jewish notions they extend to the human race. Beginning, as all spiritual ennoblement must begin, by redeeming individuals from lower conditions of life, and infusing into them "a new heart" of faith, and hope, and love, he formed aims of the widest possible extent. It stands out as an unexampled fact that of all spiritual teachers and reformers, JESUS alone formed the grand conception of benefiting humanity, without respect of country, age, or time. Philosophers necessarily addressed themselves only to the cultivated. Only the trained intellect could appreciate them. It was "wasting their sweetness on the desert air" to expound their subtle theories to the multitude. They had no message to give, and no arm to bring salvation to the common people. JESUS is at the head of spiritual teachers in the breadth of his aims. It is a sublime idea. A workman's son, but he rises to the height of the vast conception of a universal spiritual regeneration. How shall it be explained, except it be taught him of GOD? No social, civil, or political influence is at his command to ensure dominion for him. The pride of his haughty countrymen, to whom other nations are barbarians, is an influence of exclusion. But, as if this prejudice were powerless to bias him, he nourishes the large intention of quickening into higher life the human race throughout the world. How shall it be accounted for, except it be the inspiration of GOD? No section of men confines his affection. He loves not men but man. His philanthropy bears the stamp of universality. And the principles he teaches are as wide and comprehensive as the love he displays. There is no example like it. In political history the Roman Empire is the grandest fact. It spreads from the Thames to the Euphrates. It was a tree that grew and was strong, in height reaching to heaven, in branches to the ends of the earth. It attained sovereignty throughout the length and breadth of the civilised world. But the Roman Empire compassed only universal political sway. It ruled in civil polity: it dreamed not of moral conquest. It could not, at least it indisputably did not, achieve the rescue of the people from degradation. It proved itself powerless to touch the morals of mankind. It was left to a man born in a little country town of proverbial meanness—to a man unaided by the intercourse of learned society, which broadens the mind—to a man unassisted by the favour of the rich and the support of the great—to present to the world the spectacle of aims of universal spiritual supremacy, and to enrich the world with such pure ideas of God, with such lofty principles of human duty, with such glorious and permanent simplicities of religion, with such calm and quiet confidence in immortality, that there may be safely predicted for them a dominion that shall be completed only when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdoms of our GOD and of his CHRIST.

In order to give effect to this great idea, which was the travail of his soul, what were the means JESUS used, and what are the principles he taught? Look at the agencies employed. A candid consideration of them will compel the acknowledgement that they are unique. JESUS springs out of the ranks of the poor. He receives no knowledge of science, and acquires no learning, art, or eloquence, in the usual sense. He studies in no school of rhetoric to gain the secret of arresting the attention and winning the admiration of the world by commanding speech. Universities, academies, and libraries are not within his reach. He is under no obligation to Egyptian wisdom and Essenic philosophy. Attempts have been made to prove otherwise; but those who have made them evidently admit the difficulty of proof by their elaborate efforts to establish out of the very slenderest materials what was and still is only an assumption, and what ever will be an assumption, unless the Synoptics could be blotted out of existence and the Fourth Gospel alone remain. When JESUS enters public life his course is calculated to prevent him attaining any influence, calculated to arrest his mission almost before it begins. No circumstances of position are his to endow him with control over his fellow men. He associates not with the social and religious leaders of the nation. They are looking for a political emancipator; but his teaching and his manner of life are the continual disappointment of such material expectations as centre in him. They are characterised by national bigotry; but instead of feeding it, as a hunter for popularity would do, he sets himself to stem the current of prejudice. They are cherishing fond hopes of continuing in religious supremacy over all peoples; but he proclaims that the crown shall be worn by others, and the inheritance pass into alien hands. They are wrapped up in purely Jewish interests; but he preaches a gospel of unconfined human interests. They conceive it a degradation to acknowledge the co-equality with them of other peoples; but he, instead of courting fame and status by fostering that notion, as a time-server would have done, proclaims the principle of human brotherhood and urges the duties involved therein. Are these the methods to result in triumph? Are these the agencies calculated to eventuate in spiritual empire? Presenting to the Jewish people no point to fascinate their intellectual or national pride; crushing their dearest hopes of political deliverance and coming re-ascendency; opposing, in his spirit of universal love, the antipathies of the nation; exciting the animosity of the chief priests, elders, and rulers of the people; rebuking with almost superhuman boldness the Scribe, the Pharisee, and the priest for their shameful misuse of power and their still more shameful hypocrisy; dispensing to his followers only a cup of suffering; devoting his ministry chiefly to the poor and the ignorant, the outcast and the despised, and thus incurring contempt; paying the penalty of of his sublime and saintly unselfishness in hatred, persecution, and death—who would predict that such a teacher would win in all succeeding generations victories transcending all other moral conquests recorded in the pages of history?

MIDDLE CLASS SCHOOLS.

WRONGS OF THE NON-SECTARIAN TEACHER.

THE difficulties of selecting a house are admittedly of a serious character. Situation, accommodation, and expense, present requirements sometimes incompatible. The neighbourhood is eligible, but the rooms are small; or the aspect is good but the cost excessive; or the rent is reasonable but the chimneys smoke. These, however, are "trifles light as air" compared with the perplexities which beset the conscientious parent in search of a school for his children. Salubrity is properly the prime consideration. Health, at all times of the first consequence, is, with the young, the foundation-stone on which their after life must be built. When this is secured, the competency of the teacher, and other conditions, may be ascertained with more or less facility. But then comes the "religious difficulty!" If the parent be a Churchman, a Methodist, or a Baptist, he has the wide field of orthodoxy from which to select the tutors of his children. It is an embarrassment only of choice. Whether his child learn the catechism of the Episcopal Church, or the doctrines of JOHN WESLEY, is a matter of little moment. In his estimation, a belief in them is the indispensable condition of salvation; and he is not particular to a shade as to which of its manifold shapes orthodoxy may assume. But of one thing he is well-assured—that he will preserve his son with sacred care from the dangerous negations of the Unitarian or liberal schoolmaster. Doctrine in some shape he will have. Catechism must be judiciously intermingled with bread and butter. Experience and skill in his profession; high moral qualifications; exceptional personal aptitudes—these are all very well, but the flavour of orthodoxy being wanting, all the rest is "naught."

It would be easy to indicate some of the many evils which are thus inflicted on the cause of a sound education and the interests of national culture. Most excellent and conscientious teachers there are in every church and sect. Elementary justice demands this admission, and candour makes it unstintingly. But quackery, sycophancy, and cant also find shelter, repose, and success within the borders of their honourable and dignified vocation. The scrupulous are shouldered out by the crafty, and modest merit pines while self-assertion wins confidence and—pays. And it is the religious prejudices of the parent which render him the easy prey of the astute but shallow instructor; afford the readiest means of imposition; and open widest the gates of reputation and fortune.

But how much more rugged is the path of the non-sectarian teacher, especially if he bear the obnoxious name of Unitarian! There is no class in the community which more sadly experiences the odium theologicum than the liberal master or mistress of a private school; whilst the cases are not few in which a professional instructor, however competent, finds access to employment barred, or preferment stopped, by his conscientious beliefs. For these most intelligent and worthy persons, the age of persecution is not yet gone, nor the penalties of pecuniary martyrdom unknown. Inquiries as to ability and experience are made and are promptly met, and terms that seem satisfactory arranged—when, lo!—at the solemn inquisition which the religious parent makes, finally but uniformly, on the critical point of theological belief, and the reply which alone can be conscientiously made—dense clouds of dread and distrust at once descend upon the scene, and the interview is summarily closed, or the correspondence stopped, by the shock of orthodox bigotry. The loss of pupils is a painful reminder that the rewards of culture and fidelity are not secured by the profession of unpopular views. But, at least, it may be supposed, that some compensation will accrue from the faithful support tendered by fathers and mothers, who, themselves attached to the Liberal churches, will strive to preserve the minds of their children from doctrinal views which they have discarded as erroneous and pernicious? They, who have unlearned perhaps, some of the mischievous errors of their childhood, will dread the inculcation in the case of their young ones, of unworthy conceptions of God, and false views of his relations to man,—with the spurious history, unsound logic, and bad metaphysics, which, with mental throes and rendings of the heart, they have renounced as untenable? Expectations reasonable enough but, unfortunately, untrustworthy too! By a strange thoughtlessness or perversity, liberals in theology often subject their children to illiberal teaching, and, publicly supporting rational views, privately encourage the importation of irrational doctrines. Nor is this mischievous inconsistency committed by the laity only of our free-thought churches. One hears occasionally of the same error on the part of their preachers,—men educated, perhaps, at a non-subscribing college, appointed to an unplugged pulpit, and preaching the advanced results of a scientific theology. No wonder is it that, under such conditions as these, our young people, indoctrinated at school with the errors of the popular creeds, drift off by shoals from the profession of principles for which their fathers have made sacrifices, and to churches from which they publicly dissent! No wonder that a facile compliance with the prejudices of the day leads to the primrose path of social consideration and pecuniary gain; no wonder that distrust, disesteem, and neglect, encumber with thorns the way of the enlightened and the faithful teacher!

We ask for these reflections the thoughtful attention of our readers and friends; and a frank compliance, on the part of all professors of unpopular faiths, with the course to which, with unmistakable directness and force, they seem to us to point.

THE NOTTINGHAM DEBATE.

WE give this week four speeches of the first night's debate at Nottingham (September 5th), between the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, on the question "Is it reasonable to worship God?" Mr. Armstrong undertook the duty of asking Mr. G. B. Rothera to preside, and that gentleman did so, and opened the proceedings. He said: The question is one, I take it, between Theism and Atheism. It is not enough to postulate a Deity, and then ask whether it is reasonable or not to worship him. What I think we have a right to ask is, that the gentleman charged with the affirmative of the proposition shall adduce such evidence as will establish satisfactorily the conclusion that there is a Deity to worship. The position of the Atheist, I take it, is not one of disbelief, but of simple unbelief. He does not say that God is not, but he affirms the lack of evidence for the position that God is. (Hear.) He does not even say that there may not be a God. What he does say is that if there is a God he has failed to manifest himself, either by the utterance of his voice in audible revelation, or by the impression of his hand upon visible nature. I take it, therefore, and think Mr. Armstrong will be prepared to accept the position, that it will be incumbent upon him, at the outset of the discussion, to address himself to a consideration of the proofs in favour of the position that there is a God to worship. If he succeed in this, then, I think, there will be a very difficult and trying ordeal before Mr. Bradlaugh to prove that, God, being existent, is not entitled to the reasonable worship of his creatures. (Applause.)

"IS IT REASONABLE TO WORSHIP GOD?"

MR. ARMSTRONG, who was cordially received, said: Mr. Chairman and friends—I wish to say two or three words at the outset of this debate as to its origin. You are many of you aware that a short time ago Mr. Bradlaugh visited this town, and gave a lecture in the defence of Atheism, from this platform, in answer to Professor Max Müller's Hibbert lectures. I was led to be present then, and offered some remarks at the close. Mr. Bradlaugh rejoined, and in the course of his rejoinder threw out, in a courteous manner, a challenge for me to meet him and discuss these weighty matters at further length. I thought no more of it then, not conceiving it to be my duty to take up that challenge. A few days afterwards, however, I received a letter from the Secretary of the Nottingham branch of the National Secular Society, stating that many persons had been much interested in the words that fell from me, and that they would consider it an obligation conferred upon them, and others earnestly in pursuit of truth, if I consented to meet Mr. Bradlaugh in this manner. I replied, that for my own part, I was but little sanguine of any good effects, or a balance of good effects, resulting from such a meeting; but that the invitation being couched in such courteous and earnest terms, I would consult with friends on whose judgment I placed reliance, before finally replying. I consulted these friends and at the same time thought the matter over; and I came to the conclusion that, though it has undoubtedly happened that on too many occasions theological debates have been the root of bitterness and strife, yet, nevertheless, two men really in earnest about what they have to say, and speaking to persons also in earnest, who have come neither for amusement nor excitement—I came to the conclusion that a debate, conducted with tact and temper on both sides, might (may I say by the blessing of God?) conduce rather to good than to evil. (Applause.) Under these circumstances, I accepted the challenge. I did so though, as I said in my letter to the chairman, it is distasteful to me, because if I make anything of this occasion it can only be by exhibiting to you my inmost heart. We are not going to talk in a superficial manner—we are not going to bandy compliments, nor, I hope, exchange rebukes; but each of us, is going to search his inner consciousness, and try to express to the audience that which he finds therein. It is, perhaps, more distasteful to me on this occasion than to Mr. Bradlaugh, since I find, or believe myself to find, in my inner consciousness certain facts which Mr. Bradlaugh will no doubt tell you he does not find in his inner consciousness. These facts are to me of the most solemn and sacred nature conceivable, and to expose them before a large and public audience is a thing very like a sort of martyrdom. If I were not confident that, however little you may sympathise with what I say, you will treat it with respect and consideration, I would never consent to drag the sacred thoughts of my soul before you to hold them up as an exhibition. (Hear.) I am to maintain to-night—not to demonstrate (as you will see if you look at the bills)—the proposition that it is reasonable to worship God. Mr. Bradlaugh has not necessarily to disprove, but to impugn, that proposition. Now, all I have any hope of doing to-night is this—to show that it is reasonable for me and for others conscious of mental phenomena in themselves more or less akin to those of which I am conscious, to worship God. Would that I could touch you with the beauty and the sweetness of this belief—would that I could hold up before you, in all its glory and sublimity, in all its strength and holiness, the beauty and the sweetness of the worship of God. Could I do so, I should take your imagination captive. I think I should get the suffrage of your reason. It is as though, sir, to-night, I had been called upon to prove that my dearest friend is worthy to be loved—aye, even that my dearest friend exists; for, if God is ought to us, he is our dearest, nearest friend—present when all others are taken from us, a sure refuge in every moment of temptation and of woe; the very highest and most intimate reality of which we conceive—the sum and substance of all existence. Well, now, how do I know this God? Who is this God of whom I speak? Let me try to tell you how it seems to me that I have made acquaintance with him. I find that at certain moments of my life there is that which I can best describe as a voice—though it is a metaphor—addressed to me, influencing largely my conduct. I find that there are in me, as in all men, strong instincts, strong desires, strong self-interests—some lower, some higher, some less worthy, some more worthy, than others. I find that but for this voice of which I speak I should be entirely swayed thereby, as, so far as I can see, the brutes of the field and the forest are swayed thereby. But I find that sometimes, at moments when these instincts are the very strongest within me, and when I am about to throw myself into their realisation and give them expression in fact—I find, sometimes, at these moments that there comes to me somewhat which, so far as my consciousness delivers, is not myself. There comes to me somewhat stopping me from indulging these instincts and bidding me to curb them. I find at other times that my instincts of self-preservation, of self-regard, of pleasure-loving, and so forth—my appetites—would lead me to hold back from a certain course of action. So far as I can judge, looking into my own mind, myself is against that course of action. It appears to my reasoning powers and inclinations that I had better keep out of it. But there comes now somewhat which comes from outside, and which is no part of myself, which says, "Go and do it." That was so when I received the invitation to this debate. Again, I find that on certain occasions—alas! that I should have to say it—I have defied this monitor, I have done that which it told me not to do, or not done that which it bade me to do. I find then that there enters into me from somewhere—I know not from whence—pangs of remorse keener than ever came from any personal sorrow, more biting than ever came from any physical pain. There have been times however—let me thank God I can say so!—when I have obeyed this voice, followed its dictates in spite of all myself seeming to drag me from it; and my experience is that on these occasions there has entered my soul, from whence I cannot tell you, a peace surpassing that given us in any other circumstances—a peace in the light of which the sorrows that at other times might cut me to the heart seem light and small, a peace in the beauty and holiness of which these sorrows seem wonderfully diminished. I will tell you what I call the source of that voice which I fancy speaks to me in that fourfold manner. I call the source of that voice "God," and that is the first thing I mean by God. I call the source of all these monitions and admonitions, these exhortations and rebukes, this voice of reproval and of approval, the voice of God; because I must give it some name, and that seems to me the simplest and the truest name I can give it. I might perhaps, be inclined to doubt whether all this is not fancy (though I hardly think I should) if, so far as I could gather, it were an unique experience of my own; but I find it is not so. I find that this voice is recognised by every true man and woman I meet. They may obey it or not, but they recognise it, and allow that it is there. I behold the picture by Millais of the day before the awful massacre of St. Bartholomew. I see the maiden leaning on her lover's bosom while he looks down upon her with looks of love and tenderness, and she tries to tie around his arm a scarf. She knows of the impending massacre, that all Protestants are to be slaughtered, and she would fain put this badge upon his arm as a secret signal to preserve him from the sword. Does he accept this method of escape? Although his inclination is to remain with his beloved, the strength of his right hand is given to tear the badge from his arm, and he faces death, not with joy, but with an exceeding bitter sorrow for the moment—he faces death in simple loyalty and obedience to the voice which has spoken to his heart. That is an experience which you will all recognise—one which, in less or in greater force, we have all had. Whatever explanation may be given—and, doubtless, Mr. Bradlaugh has an explanation of his own—this voice of conscience is to me one of the primary evidences of the existence of God. Nay, I will not call it an evidence; it is God speaking to me. (Applause.) The conscience has been described by Mr. Voysey, in his recently-published sermons in refutation of Atheism, as follows: "The collision is so complete between the higher voice and the impelling instinct, that one can only feel that the two are radically different in nature, and must have had a different source. . . . To have the power of doing intentionally what one shrinks from doing, and to deny oneself the pleasure which is so fascinating, and which one longs to do, is to prove the immense superiority of our inner selves over the universe." To have the power, as that man, that Huguenot, must have had, to deny one's self the pleasure which is so fascinating and for which one longs, is to prove the immense superiority of our inner selves when hearing the voice of God over the visible universe. Again, speaking of conscience, Voysey says: "The conscience which makes us mortify our flesh with its affections and lusts, which often and often mars our happiness and embitters our pleasure, upbraids us with reproaches and stings us with remorse, that voice which hushes our cry for happiness, which will not endure a single selfish plea, but demands unquestionable obedience, and bids us fall down in the very dust before the Majesty of the Deity—we all, in our secret hearts, revere this power, whether or not we obey it as we should. At least, we pay to it the homage of our inmost souls, and feel how great and grand it is to be its slave." Now, sir, I desire to pass on to another method, by which it seems to me that I apprehend this Being. Having made the acquaintance with this awful voice—and the philosopher Kant said two things filled him with awe, the starry heavens and the moral nature in man—I pass on to another matter. Behold the starry heaven itself. I know not how it is with you, but I tell you my experience—and we are told by scientific men that we must bring everything to the test of experience. Sometimes when I have been out of temper—as I am sometimes, like other people—sometimes, when I have been much distracted with cares, when troubles and pains have been thick upon me, it falls to my lot to go out beneath the starry heaven. What is it that I experience in my soul? I go through no process of metaphysical reasoning, I do not argue with myself, but I simply feel that there is a Divine presence there, in whose hand are all these stars and all the worlds—a great voice singing, "I am strong and I am good, and you are safe nestling in my hand." I know not if that corresponds with the experience of many—I feel sure; and let me ask such not to drive away these holy feelings, but to trust them as the assurance which God gives of his presence. It may be that in those lakes and mountains which you, sir, have seen of late, you have heard a message whispering to your soul of a peace beyond the peace of earth—of a presence before which all things are well. In others, not so sensitive perhaps to the beauties of natural scenery, such experience comes in the tones of music—in some grand symphony or some sweet song; and they feel lifted into some presence in which it is a joy to be, and which fills their soul with peace. That presence I call, having no other name for it, the presence of God. Observe, that in this I am not philosophising about this cause—I am not saying that God is the cause and so on; I am only relating the experience of my consciousness, reported to you as faithfully and truly as I can read it. Let me read what Professor Blackie wrote the other day: "Many things can be known only by being felt, all vital forces are fundamentally unknowable." And, says Francis Newman, that arch-heretic: "The astronomer is ever aware of the presence of gravitation and the electrician sees all things pervaded by electricity—powers described by the mind, unwitnessed by any sense, long unknown to the wise, still unknown or undiscerned by the vulgar; yet this perception of things hidden is not esteemed cloudy." Now, having made some acquaintance with this awful, inscrutable something, to which I venture to give the name of God, I venture to lift up to it the voice of my soul, and strive to throw myself towards that Being. And what is my experience? Let us go to experience again: I find when my mind is bewildered and in doubt, when it is all involved with difficulties, that somehow, when I address that Being, there comes to my soul "clear-shining," and I see things plainer and more beautiful than before. I appeal to him in pain and sorrow—not with the coward's prayer, but simply asking that I may feel his presence, to endure it; and the pain and sorrow have become light on the instant assurance that God is there to comfort and console. I pray to him in weakness, when my strength fails, and what is the result? That a new manhood comes to me, and I feel that wondrous power which over-arches all the worlds, and I feel that I have in me also somewhat of his strength. I appeal to him, last of all, in temptation, when the wrong deed presses closely on my inclinations, and what do I find? That strength is given me to stand up against temptation, and he answers according to the immemorial prayer of Christendom: delivers from temptation. This is experience, or I fancy it is. It is not theory. Again, I am in gladness. When is my gladness greatest, and when is it richest? Why, when it flows up and out, in thankfulness and adoration, to the source to which I trace it. Then my gladness seems to receive an influence which lifts it up above. No gladness is the true gladness without that. Let me conclude this half-hour by reading a very short extract from Professor Newman. Speaking of the instincts of mankind, he says:—

And the instinct of Religion is the noblest of them all. The bravest, the most enduring, the most fruitful in mighty deeds, The source of earliest grandeur, untiring of scattered tribes; Even in the crudeness of its infancy, when unpurified by science, Yet teeming with civilisation, with statesmanship, with letters, Mistress of all high art, and parent of glorious martyrs. And if from it have come wars, and bigtries, and cruelties, Through infantine hot-headedness and unripeness of mind, We take your aid, O Sceptics! to purge it from all such evils, And kindly honour we pay to you for your battles against superstition; Yet the very evils ye deplore, prove Religion's mighty energy, And the grasp deeply seated which she has within human hearts. (Loud applause.)

Mr. BRADLAUGH: Thanking you, sir, for acceding to the request which I would have gladly joined in had I had any right of acquaintance to entitle me to make it; thanking you for undertaking what is always a troublesome duty, however well a debate may be conducted, of presiding over a discussion, permit me to say one word only as to the opening which fell from your lips. There is only one phrase in that which I desire to note, so as to save myself from the possibility of misapprehension. I quite agree with the view you put of the position the Atheist takes, except that if Dualism be affirmed, if more than Monism be affirmed, if more than one existence be affirmed, and if it be the beyond of that one existence which is called God, then the Atheist does not say there may be one, but says there cannot be one; and that is the only distinction I wish to put as against the very kind words with which you introduced the speakers this evening. The question for our debate is, "Is it reasonable to worship God?" and to determine this question it is necessary to define the words "worship" and "God," and next to decide whether belief in God is reasonable or unreasonable; and, secondly, whether worship is, under any, and if any, what, circumstances, reasonable or unreasonable. And I am afraid I must here except that, in the speech to which I have just listened, and which, from its tone and kindly style, is perfectly unexceptionable, there is not one word at present—it may possibly come later on—which may fairly be taken as approaching a definition either of the word "God" or the word "worship." By worship I mean act of reverence, respect, adoration, homage, offered to some person. According to this definition, worship cannot be offered to the impersonal, and according to this definition it would be unreasonable to advocate worship to be offered to the impersonal. Under the term "worship" I include prayer—which is evidently, from the opening, also included in the term "worship" by the rev. gentleman who maintains the opposite position to myself—praise, sacrifice, offerings, solemn services, adoration, personal prostration. For the word "God," not having a definition of my own, I take, not having yet gathered, in what has fallen from Mr. Armstrong, enough to enable me to say that I understand what he means by it—I take the definition of "God" given in Professor Flint's Baird lectures; not meaning by that that Mr. Armstrong is bound by that definition, but asking him to be kind enough to note where he thinks that definition is incorrect, and to kindly tell me so, for my guidance in the latter portions of the debate. By "God," for the purpose of this debate, I shall mean a self-existent, eternal being, infinite in power and in wisdom, and perfect in holiness and goodness; the maker of heaven and earth. And by "self-existent" I mean, that, the conception of which does not require the conception of antecedent to it. For example, this glass is phenomenal, conceived, as all phenomena must be conceived, by the characteristics or qualities which enable you to think and identify it in your mind, but which cannot be conceived except as that of which there is possible antecedent and consequent, and which, therefore, cannot be considered as self-existent according to my definition. By "eternal" and by "infinite" I only mean illimitable, indefinite, to me—applying the term "eternal" to duration, and the word "infinite" to extension. I take Professor Flint, or whoever may hold the definition I have given of God, by "maker" to mean originator; and then I am in the difficulty that the word

"creator," in the sense of origin, is, to me, a word without meaning. I only know creation as change; origin of phenomena, not of existence; origin of condition, not origin of substance. The words "creation" and "destruction" are both words which have no other meaning to my mind than the meaning of change. I will now try to address myself to some of the arguments that were put forward by Mr. Armstrong. He said that to him the notion of entering into this debate was distasteful to him, and he addressed somewhat of an inquiry as to my own feeling on the matter. No! the discussion of no one subject more than any other is distasteful to me, unless it be of a personal character, in which it might involve my having to say things upon which I should not like to mislead and upon which it would be painful to me to state the facts. Then a discussion would be distasteful to me; but such a discussion as this is not any more distasteful to me than the discussion of an astronomical or geological problem; and I will urge to those who go even further and say, that not only is such a matter distasteful, but that the discussion of Theism is really immoral, to such I would read from a recent volume entitled "A Candid Examination of Theism":—"If there is no God, where can be the harm in our examining the spurious evidence of his existence? If there is a God, surely our first duty towards him must be to exert to our utmost, in our attempts to find him, the most noble faculty with which he has endowed us—as carefully to investigate the evidence which he has seen fit to furnish of his own existence, as we investigate the evidence of inferior things in his dependent creation. To say that there is one rule or method for ascertaining truth in the latter case which it is not legitimate to apply in the former case, is merely a covert way of saying that the Deity—if he exists—has not supplied us with rational evidence of his existence." Now, that is the position I am going to put to you; and there ought to be nothing distasteful to anyone in proving most thoroughly the whole of the evidence upon which his supposed belief in God's existence rests. The grounds of his belief ought to be clear to himself, or they are no sufficient grounds for his belief, even to himself. If they are clear to himself they ought to be clearly stateable to others; because, if not, they lie under the suspicion of not being clear to himself. That which is sufficient to him to convince him, is either capable of being clearly stated—although it may not carry conviction to another—or it is not. If it is not capable of being clearly stated, I would suggest it is because it does not clearly exist in his own mind. Now, Mr. Armstrong says that he feels as if called upon to prove that his dearest friend ought to be loved, as if called upon to prove that his dearest friend exists. He spoke of God as being to him his dearest friend, and he followed that with some words as to which I am not quite sure whether he intended to use them in the sense in which they fell upon my ears. He described God as "the sum and substance of all existence." I do not want to make any verbal trick, and if I am putting more on Mr. Armstrong than he meant to convey I should like to be put right when he rises again, and I will ask him if he considers God to be the sum and substance of all existing; and, if he does not, I will ask him in what respect he distinguishes between God, in his mind, and the sum and substance of all existence; because clearly, when he used those words he had some meaning in his mind, and I should like to know these two things: First, do you identify God in your mind with the sum and substance of all existence? If not, in what respects do you distinguish God in your mind from the sum and substance of all existence? If you say that you identify God with the sum and substance of all existence, then I ask, are we included in that sum and substance of all existence? And if we are included in that sum and substance of all existence, is it reasonable for one phenomenon or for a number of phenomena, to offer worship to any of, and to how much of, what remains? Then he addressed himself to the very old argument, which he put so beautifully, when he said: "How do I know God?" and launched into what is known as the argument for conscience, an argument very fully stated by Professor Flint in the Baird lectures to which I have referred. Mr. Armstrong said, and here I will take a little exception; he said: "In me, as in all men here, are strong instincts; in me, as in all men, there are strong desires; in me, as in all men, there is a voice." That is just the blunder; that is not true. I do not mean that in any sort of disrespectful sense. If you take a volume like Topinard's "Anthropology" you find that men's desires, men's emotions, and men's instincts all vary with race, all vary with locality, with type, all vary with what Buckle called "Food, climate, soil, and life surroundings;" and I ask, if there be this variance in individuals of the same race at the same moment, and if the members of the same race vary in different places and ages, as to their instincts, desires, and emotions, I ask you whether there has been the same variation in the source of it? You say the source is God, and if so, how can a variable source be a reliable object of worship? Then let us see a little more. "I do not desire to do something, but my monitor says 'Do;'" or the reverse; and this voice is the evidence of Deity. I should have been obliged if Mr. Armstrong had defined exactly what it was he meant by conscience, because here we are going terribly to disagree. I am going to deny the existence of conscience altogether, except as a result of development upon organisation, including in that, transmitted pre-disposition of ability to possible thought or action. But if that be so, what becomes of this "still small voice," what becomes of those desires and instincts? The mere fact that the mother may have worked in a cotton-mill while child-bearing and have had bad food, or that the father may have beaten her, his brutality may result in the awakening of a desire and instinct exactly the opposite of that which Mr. Armstrong has, and the organisation fitted for repeating which may be handed down through generations. I stood this morning for other purposes at the doors of Coldbathfields Prison. One man who came out gave a sort of shrill whistle and plunged into the crowd with a defiant and a mocking air, showing that his conscience, his monitor, said nothing to him except that he was glad he was outside, and ready to war with the world again. (Applause.) I am not wishing to press this view in any fashion unkindly or unfairly; I am only wanting to put the thing as it appears to me. I want to know: "Does Mr. Armstrong contend that there is a faculty identical in every human being which he calls conscience, which does decide for each human being, and always decides, in the same manner, what is right and what is wrong? Or does he mean that this 'monitor,' as he calls it, decides differently in different men and in different countries? And if 'yes,' is the source different in each case where there is a different expression? And if 'yes,' is it justifiable and reasonable to offer worship to an uncertain source, or to a source which speaks with a different voice, or to a source which is only one of a number, and of which you do not know how far its limit extends, and where its jurisdiction begins or ends?" Let us follow this out a little more. We have not only to define conscience, but we have also to define right and wrong, and I did not hear Mr. Armstrong do that. I did hear him say that when he had done something in opposition to his monitor he felt remorse. I did hear him say there was struggling between himself and his monitor, and here I had another difficulty. What is the himself that struggles, as distinguished in his mind from the monitor that he struggles against? If the struggle is a mental one, what is mind struggling against? and if it is not, how does Mr. Armstrong explain it? Let us, if you please, go to right and wrong. By moral I mean useful. I mean that that is right which tends to the greatest happiness of the greatest number, with the least injury to any. I am only following Jeremy Bentham. That is my definition of right. Many matters which have been held to come within that definition in one age have been found in another age not to come within it, and the great march of civilisation is that from day to day it instructs us in what is useful. I submit that instead of adoring the source of contradictory verdicts it is more reasonable to find out for ourselves some rule we can apply. For example, here Mr. Armstrong's conscience would not raise any particular objection to his taking animal food, unless he happens to be a vegetarian, and then, I am sure, he would conscientiously carry it out; but the majority of people's consciences in England would raise no great objection to taking animal food. Yet in China and in Hindustan hundreds of thousands of human beings have died because vegetable food was not there for them, and their consciences made them prefer death to tasting animal food. I want to know whether the conscience is from the same source here as in Hindustan, and I want to know, if that is so, which people are justified in worshipping the source? Take the case of murder. Mr. Armstrong's conscience would clearly tell him that it was wrong to murder me. And yet there are many people in this country who would not go to that extent. But I am going to take a stronger illustration. There are a number of people who think it perfectly right to bless the flags of a regiment, and to pray to the God whom Mr. Armstrong asks me to worship, that a particular regiment, whose flags are blessed, may kill the people of some other particular regiment as rapidly as possible. This shows that there are confusions of mind as to what is meant by murder, and a like confusion exists on a number of other matters on which the monitor is mis-representing. And then Mr. Armstrong has said, "I mean by God the source of admonition, rebukes, remorse, troubles," and he says: "It is a conscience voice which is recognised by every true man and woman." I am sure he would not wish to put any position stronger than it should be put, and he put it, too, that this was the feature in which man differed from the brutes. I am inclined to tell him that not only there is not that recognition to-day amongst the physiological and psychological teachers, but that we have a number of men whose researches have been collected for us, who show us that what you call the still small voice, this monitor, these desires, instincts, emotions, are to be found—varied, it is true—right through the whole scale of animal life. Wherever there is a nervous encephalic apparatus sufficient you have—except in the fact of language—wider distinction between the highest order of human race and the lowest, than you have between the lowest order of human beings and those whom you are pleased to call brutes. I will now only take the illustration of the eve of St. Bartholomew, which is fatal to the argument of Mr. Armstrong. He gave the Protestant lover—a very fine character—rejecting the symbolic bandage, and preferring to die for his faith; or, as Mr. Armstrong put it, "to face death in simple loyalty rather than play the hypocrite, and the source of that feeling was God." Was that the source of the feeling which led Bruno to be burnt at the stake as if for Atheism; or for Vanini, burnt for Atheism; or for Leszcynski, burnt for Atheism; or for Mrs. Besant, robbed of her child because of her avowal of Atheism? (Hisses.) You are hissing; wait whilst I answer. Is the source of your hissing, God? Then what a cowardly and weak thing, and little fitted for worship must be that source. (Applause.) I desire to deal with this subject in all gravity, in all sincerity, in all kindness, but I plead for a cause—weakly, it is true—for which great men and women have died, and I will permit no insult to it in my presence—(cheers)—knowingly I will pass none. I believe my antagonist to meet me loyally, honourably, and honestly, and I believe him to meet me earnestly and sincerely. I believe he has no desire to wound my feelings, and I do not wish to wound his; and I ask you, the jury here, to try to follow the same example set by him in this debate. (Cheers.)

Mr. ARMSTRONG, being received with cheers, said: It is very difficult indeed to think on these deep problems under consideration with excitement amongst the audience present, therefore I hope that you will be as quiet as you can. I will begin at once with a confession—and this, at any rate, will be a testimony of my candour—by saying that the moment I had spoken certain words in my opening speech I thought, "Mr. Bradlaugh will have me there;" and he had me. (Laughter.) The words were those in which I spoke of God as the sum and substance of all existence. Now, to me, God is a much simpler word than the phrase, "sum and substance of all existence." Whether God be the "sum and substance of all existence" I know not, for those words convey to me less clear meaning than the word "God" conveys to me. The source, moreover, of my immediate knowledge of God is such that it can make no asseverations whatever upon deep questions of metaphysics, as to what the "sum and substance of all existence" may consist of. Mr. Bradlaugh has taken a definition of God from Professor Flint. He is a Scotchman, and Scotchmen are very fond of definitions. (A laugh.) Very often, too, their definitions obscure their subject-matter, and it is far harder to get any proper significance from them than in the thing which they intended to define. I am utterly incapable of saying whether that definition of Professor Flint's is an accurate definition of God or not. What I mean by "God," and perhaps Mr. Bradlaugh will take it as the best definition I can here give, is the source, whatever it be, of this metaphorical voice—of these intimations or monitions, that come to me in certain experiences which I have. Mr. Bradlaugh, of course, devoted much time to answering Professor Flint. He asked whether God was the source of that loyalty with which the Atheists he mentioned went to the stake, and I say from the bottom of my heart, that He was. God knows the Atheist though the Atheist knows not Him. God is the source of loyalty of heart, in whomsoever it may be. If others are led to propound propositions which I believe to be false, and if they dispute other propositions which I believe to be true, do you think that God is going to judge them for that, so long as they have been true and faithful to their own reasoning powers? (Applause.) Mr. Bradlaugh noticed the phrase which fell from me, about a discussion like this being distasteful to me. I did not say that the matter under discussion was distasteful to me. I did not say that a discussion under other conditions would be distasteful to me. I did not say that it was at all distasteful to me to search the grounds of my own belief, for my own belief would be poor indeed were not such search my constant practice. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Bradlaugh laid great stress, during the greater part of his speech, upon what appear to be, in different races and in different climes, the different and contradictory deliverances of conscience. That difficulty is one which has been felt by many persons, and dealt with, well and ill, by various writers. The difficulty is one of importance, and it arises, perhaps, from the word "conscience" being used in various different senses. My use of the word "conscience" is simply as being that voice of God (as I still call it) which says, "Do the right; don't do the wrong." It does not in anyway say what is right or what is wrong. That which I call the right, like so much of our manhood, is the gradual development and evolution of history, and it is largely dependent, as Mr. Bradlaugh says, upon climate and other external surroundings. We have to reason about what is right and wrong. We must have gradual education of the individual and of the race to get a clearer and more worthy conception of the right and wrong; and all I claim for conscience is that the man having resolved in his own mind what is right and what is wrong, this conscience says, "Do the right, and do not the wrong." Therefore, in states of barbarous society, where misled reason has induced persons to think certain things were right which we look upon as crimes, still the voice of conscience must necessarily tell them to do the right. The thing is right to the individual if he thinks it right. It may be a terrible mistake of his—it may be a terrible mistake to believe or teach certain things; nevertheless, the voice of conscience says, "Do the right;" it does not define what the right is. That is one of the things which God leaves to be developed in humanity by slow degrees. Thank God, we see that the idea of the right and the wrong is purifying—is clarifying in the course of history. The conception of what is right and what is wrong is better now than it was a hundred years ago; the conception of what is right and what is wrong is better still than it was a thousand years ago. Many of the things then considered laudable are now considered base; and many of the things then considered base are now considered laudable. This voice of which I speak, however, like all other voices, may not be equally perceived at all times. Supposing that you were at school, and a certain bell rang at six o'clock every morning. If you accustom yourself to rising when the bell rings, you will naturally enough go on hearing it; but if you get into the habit of disregarding it, and turning over on the other side for another nap, the bell may sound loudly but you will cease to hear it. So it is, I take it, with the voice of God, which ever speaks—which ever pleads—but against which man may deafen himself. He may make himself so dull of understanding that he may not hear it clearly. Not only the individual man's own obstinacy may make him dull of hearing, but it must be conceded that this dullness of hearing may descend to him from long generations of those from whom he proceeds. It may be a part of his inheritance. But it does not follow that this voice does not exist, and that it does not still plead with him if he had the ear to hear it. No man is so lost but that if he strives to hear, that voice will become to him clearer and more clear. I ask you here whether you find any difficulty in deciding what, to you, is right or wrong? Mr. Bradlaugh is very fond of definitions. The words "right" and "wrong" are so simple that any definition of them would only obscure them. I know, and you know, what you mean by right and wrong. If I say of a thing, "That is not right, don't do it," you know what I mean. Can I speak in any plainer way than to say of a thing, "That is not right?" If there is no better way of explaining what you mean than this—if there is no plainer way—it is best not to attempt to define the word, because the definition would only tend to obscure it. Not being much accustomed to debates of this description, much of what I desired to say in the first half-hour was not said. I am told that all this experience which I have been trying to relate to you is fancy, and I am asked to prove that there is some being who can be imagined to be this God whom I believe I hear speaking to me. I might ask, "Is it not enough that not only do I think I hear this voice, but that so many hundreds and thousands of the great and good have also thought so? Is it not enough that many of the great reformers, many of the great leaders in the paths of righteousness and mercy, in this England of ours, tell us that they hear this voice?" You must, if you deny it, either think they lie or that they are deluded. When Newman, Voysey, Theodore Parker—the glorious abolitionist of America—say that it is their most intimate experience, it is somewhat shallow to assert that there is nothing in it. I am not one of those who think that the existence of a God can be proved to the understanding of every one in a large audience on à priori grounds. At the same time the balance of probability on à priori grounds seems to be, to me, strongly in favour of Theism. I find that there is, in my own mental constitution, a demand for cause of some kind for every phenomenon. I want to know what has led to the phenomenon, and I find a good many other people are apt to inquire in the like direction. Even very little children, before they are sophisticated by us teachers and parsons, want to be informed as to the causes of things. Another point—I cannot help believing that all cause must be intelligent. Yes, I knew that would go down in Mr. Bradlaugh's notes; but I say again, I cannot conceive of any cause which is not intelligent in some sort of way. (Applause.)

MR. BRADLAUGH: There are two things which are evidently quite certain so far as my opponent is concerned; one is that we shall have a good-tempered debate, and the other that we shall have a candid debate. He has said frankly, with reference to the definition of God, that he is perfectly incapable of saying whether the definition of Professor Flint is correct or not, and he has, I think I may say, complained that I am too fond of definitions. Will he permit me on this to read him an extract from Professor Max Müller's recent lecture: "It was, I think, a very good old custom never to enter upon the discussion of any scientific problem without giving beforehand definitions of the principal terms that had to be employed. A book on logic or grammar generally opened with the question, What is logic? What is grammar? No one would write on minerals without first explaining what he meant by a mineral, or on art, without defining, as well as he might, his idea of art. No doubt it was often as troublesome for the author to give such preliminary definitions as it seemed useless to the reader, who was generally quite incapable in the beginning of appreciating their full value. Thus it happened that the rule of giving verbal definitions came to be looked upon after a time as useless and obsolete. Some authors actually took credit for no longer giving these definitions, and it soon became the fashion to say that the only true and complete definition of what was meant by logic or grammar, by law or religion, was contained in the books themselves which treated of these subjects. But what has been the result? Endless misunderstandings and controversies which might have been avoided in many cases if both sides had clearly defined what they did and what they did not understand by certain words." I will show you presently where this need of accurate definition comes so very strongly. Mr. Armstrong is quite clear that he knows what right means; he is also quite clear that you know what he means. That may be true, but it also may not, and I will show you the difficulty. Suppose there were a thorough disciple, say of some bishop or church, who thought it right to put to death a man holding my opinions. That man would think the capital punishment for heresy right, Mr. Armstrong would not. That man's conscience would decide that it was right, Mr. Armstrong's would decide that it was not. What is the use of saying you both know what is right? The word right is a word by which you label certain things, thoughts, and actions, the rightness of which you have decided on some grounds known only to yourselves. It may be they are pleasant to you or disagreeable to your antagonist. I, in defining morality, gave you my reason for labelling the thing with the same "right." Mr. Armstrong has given you no reason whatever. Mr. Armstrong says that conscience is the voice of God which says: "Do that which is right, don't do that which is wrong." Yet the divine voice does not tell you what is right and what is wrong. Hence that conscience talking to the cannibal: "It is right to eat that man, he's tender; it's wrong to eat that man, he's tough"—(laughter)—and the voice of God says: "Eat the tender men because it is right; don't eat the tough men because it is wrong." I ask how that illustration is to be dealt with? If the voice does not in any way enable you to determine the character of the act, then it simply means that what you call the voice of God asks you to continue committing every error which has been bequeathed you from past times as right, and to avoid every good thing because in past times it has been condemned and is yet condemned as wrong. If that is to be the conclusion, then I say that the voice of God is not a voice to be worshipped, and that it is not reasonable to worship such a voice; and taking that to be the definition, I submit that upon that a negative answer must be given in this debate. Mr. Armstrong very frankly and candidly says that the conception of what is right and wrong is being cleared and purified day by day. That is, the conception now is different to what it was one hundred years ago, and better still than it was a thousand years ago; but the voice of God, a thousand years ago, told the Armstrong and Bradlaugh then living to do that which conscience said to them was right, and which the conscience to-day says is wrong. Was God governed by the mis-education, the mis-information, and the misapprehension of the time? If the God was outside the ignorance of the day, why did he not set the people right? Was he powerless to do it? In which case, how do you make out that he is God? Or had he never the willingness to do it? In which case, how do you make out that he was God good? And if he preferred to leave them in blindness, how do you reconcile that? Then we are told the voice is not always clear, but that you may make it more clear by a habit of obedience. That is so, I suppose. And you may transmit the pre-disposition to the habit of galloping to horses on this side the ocean, the pre-disposition to the habit of trotting to horses on the other side the ocean; to thinking Mohammedanism in Turkey, and to thinking another "ism" in England, and some other "ism" in Hindustan. You do not transmit the actual thought any more than you transmit the actual gallop or trot, but you transmit the pre-disposition, given the appropriate surroundings to reproduce any action physical or mental. And the source of this is God, is it? I vow I do not understand how the Theist is to meet the contradiction thus involved. Then Mr. Armstrong says that when he uses the word right, he defies anyone to make it plainer. Let us see what that means: I forge a cheque; Mr. Armstrong says that's wrong. Why? Oh! it is a dishonest and dishonourable thing, it tends to injure, and so on. But let us see whether you are always quite clear about these things? When you are annexing a country for example; praying to your God that you may annex successfully, and that he will protect you when you have annexed, does not your conscience run away with you, or does God mislead you in some of these things? Is it not true that the moment you get outside the definition of the word "right," and the moment you say: "I have a standard of right which I will not tell you, because nothing I tell you will make it clear" you are launched at once into a heap of absurdities and contradictions? You think it is right to have one wife, the Turk thinks it right to have two. How are you to determine between them? It only means that one of you has labelled bigamy "right" and the other has labelled it "wrong." You must have some kind of explanation to justify what you are talking about. We had an argument offered by Mr. Armstrong which, if it meant anything, meant that the voice of the majority should prevail. Mr. Armstrong said that it was not only his experience, but that of thousands of others. Does he mean to tell me that problems of this kind are to be determined by an untrained majority, or by the verdict of a skilled minority? If by a majority, I have something to say to him; and if by the skilled minority, how are you to select them? In his first speech, which I did not quite finish replying to, we were told that God's peace and beauty were apprehended in lakes and mountains. But I have seen one lake—Michigan—the reverse of peace and beauty; I have seen little vessels knocked about by the waves, and dashed to pieces; and I have seen Mount Vesuvius when it has been the very opposite of calm and beautiful; and I have heard of the houses at Torre del Grecco—though I have never seen it—being burned in the night by the fiery lava stream. Where is the peace and beauty of that scene? You can take peace. Given a lake, and I can show you a tornado. Given a mountain, and I can give you Vesuvius with the fiery stream burning the huts of the fishers on the slope of Torre del Grecco. Did God do this? Did God run the two vessels into one another on the Thames, and have those hundreds of people drowned? If you take credit for the beauty you must also take debit for the pain and misery. (Applause.) Well, then, I am told that religion is the noblest of all instincts. Max Müller tells us—whether that be true or not, as Francis Newman puts it—that religion is a word about which people never have agreed in any age of the world; about which there have been more quarrels than about any other word, and about which people have done more mischief than about any other word; and I will ask our friend to explain, if it be the noblest of all instincts, how is it that people have racked each other, and beheaded each other, and tortured each other by, or in the name of, this religion? We are told, and I am thankful to hear it, that we sceptics have purged it of a great deal of mischief, and we hope to do more in that way as we go on. (Applause.) And here—and I want to speak with as much reverence as I can on the subject of prayer, and it is extremely difficult to touch upon it without giving my opponent pain—so I will deal with it as a general, and not a personal question. Mr. Armstrong said, after speaking of how he prayed against temptation: "He answered me as he has answered the immortal prayer of Christendom and delivered me from temptation." Why does he not deliver from the temptation that misery, poverty, and ignorance bring to the little one who did not choose that he should be born in a narrow lane, or a back street, in an atmosphere redolent of squalor and filth? This little one, whom God can lift out of temptation, but whom he lets still be cold and miserable, whom he sees famishing for food, him whom he sees go famishing to the baker's, watching to steal the loaf to relieve his hunger—why won't he deliver this little one? Does Mr. Armstrong say: "Oh, the little one must know how to pray before God will answer him"? Oh, but what a mockery to us that the source of all power places within the reach of the temptation—nay, puts as though surrounded by a mighty temptation trap, so that there should be no possible escape—that little one, and then gives way to the skilled entreaty, high tone, habit-cultured voice which Mr. Armstrong uses, while he is deaf to the rough pleading of the little one, and allows him to sink down, making no effort for his recovery! I have only one or two words more to say to you before I again finish, and I would use these to ask Mr. Armstrong to tell me what he meant by the word "cause," and what he meant by saying "cause must be intelligent"? By cause, I mean, all that without which an event cannot happen—the means towards an end, and by intelligence I mean the totality of mental ability—its activity and its results in each animal capable of it.

SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY.

THE annual sermon in aid of the Wollaston Road Schools was preached on Sunday afternoon in the chapel, Lower High-street, by the Rev. Robt. Collyer, of Chicago. Very considerable interest was displayed by the members of the Unitarian body in this and the neighbouring towns in connection with the appearance of Mr. Collyer in the Stourbridge pulpit, and there was consequently a crowded congregation. After the devotional services Mr. Collyer announced as his text these words from Rev. ii., 13, "Antipas my faithful martyr."—At the close of the service there was the usual collection in aid of the schools. This amounted to £38.

By way of giving the members of the Stourbridge congregation, as well as numerous friends from a distance, a third opportunity of hearing Mr. Collyer—for he had preached at the usual morning's service—tea was served in the school at Wollaston Road. A large number were present. After tea the Rev. D. Maginnis invited Mr. Collyer to state his opinion upon three subjects:—(1) The means of rendering Sunday schools successful; (2) the operation of the Maine Liquor Law; and (3) the use of the Bible in public elementary schools.—Mr. Collyer, in complying with the invitation, said that as a whole Sunday schools were a great success in America; and one of the great elements of that success was the mixing of children together on a perfect equality. The establishment of mission schools was found to have a humiliating influence upon the children, and to have a tendency to deteriorate their character as well as the character of the schools. They had many social celebrations throughout the year in which class distinctions were completely obliterated, and all were treated without distinction as on the same social level. With regard to the Maine Liquor Law, there were many who had depreciated it, and had contended that where the law was stringently enforced drunkenness was most prevalent. This, however, was a great mistake; and he believed that the operation of the law had been very successful in preventing the sale of intoxicating liquors to young persons, who thus grew up without any taste for drink, and were fortified against its influence. He had seen more drunkenness in one week since he came to England than he had seen in a year in America, for the public drunkenness to be seen in large towns in England was a thing altogether unknown in the part of the world where he came from. Then, with respect to Mr. Maginnis's third question—the use of the Bible in the schools in America. Compromises of different character had been attempted; but they had all broken down, and the opinion was now becoming universal that religion must be taken care of by the denominations, and that what the people paid for that only must they have in the schools. In Chicago it was a settled matter that public education should be entirely secular, and that religion should be left to be dealt with by the different branches of the Christian church.

MONTHLY MEETING OF PROTESTANT DISSENTING MINISTERS.

The monthly meeting of the Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties was held on Monday at the Stourbridge Chapel. There was service at half-past eleven, and the sermon was preached by Mr. Collyer. The chapel was again crowded, and by common consent the sermon was the most able and eloquent of the three the preacher had delivered.—At the close of the service the ministers were entertained at a collation in the Victoria Hall, and a large number of friends were present to meet them. Mr. Charles Cochrane presided. The ministers present were—The Revs. M. Gibson, W. Cochrane, James Orr, B. Wright, George St. Clair, W. R. Smyth, P. Dean, J. C. Odgers, W. C. Walters, D. Maginnis, J. Harrison, C. Denman, Henry Eachus, Edward Myers, Jas. Alsop, J. Dean, John Robberds, T. B. Broadrick, R. Collyer, W. Manning, James Black, John Cuckson, and J. W. Lake.

"The Queen and Royal Family" having been duly honoured, the Chairman proposed the sentiment, "Civil and Religious liberty all the world over."

The Rev. M. GIBSON, in replying, said that he believed the phrase "Civil and religious liberty" was first associated with the name of Charles James Fox, who was certainly an earnest advocate of it. Since his time there had been wonderful progress, for in our own country at the beginning of the present century a Unitarian was liable to imprisonment for avowing and attempting to spread his convictions. It was only in 1813 that a law was passed protecting the persons of those who impugned the doctrine of the Trinity. Many years afterwards it was found that the property in their hands which had been bequeathed for religious purposes was unsafe, and it was not till 1844 that the charter of their liberties was fully confirmed by the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. (Applause.)

The Rev. D. MAGINNIS (who occupied the vice-chair) announced letters of apology from the Revs. H. W. Crosskey, J. Gordon, C. Clarke, and Mr. Herbert New, and went on to propose that the company should give a hearty welcome and their grateful thanks to Mr. Collyer. Though he belonged now to the United States they could not forget that England raised the boy—(applause)—and he thought that great Chicago should be a little generous and send its great man round the world to carry with him that spirit peculiarly his own, infusing fresh life into the dead or dying remains of many of their organisations. (Hear, hear.) For himself he might say—he felt it so deeply—that a season of greater spiritual refreshing he had never experienced than under the services of Robert Collyer on that and the previous day. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN briefly spoke of the great kindness he had experienced at the hands of Mr. Collyer when he visited Chicago.

Mr. COLLYER, who was received with much cheering, said he felt it a great pleasure to be present at that meeting. He was touched in his heart by the welcome they had given to him, and had realised something of the spirit and purpose of that Midland conference. He remembered very well when his dear friend, Mr. Cochrane, came to see him in Chicago, with a note from brother Maginnis. He had a feeling which had not been disturbed by something like half a century's experience, that his first impression of a man was the true one. If he liked a man at first sight he liked him ever after (hear, hear); and he remembered how genially he was impressed when Mr. Cochrane came to see him, and how he said in his heart, as they said in the States, "You are one of the men to freeze to." (Cheers.) He always hoped to see him again; and so when the time came for him to visit England one of the pleasantest things that befel him was to come to Stourbridge, to preach in the church, and to meet that Midland conference, and thus to get some little insight into the life they were living, and into the spirit and aim of their liberal churches in that region. Since he came to dinner there they had drunk the health of the Queen, and he might say that no people could cherish a deeper reverence for that noble lady, the Queen of England, than did the people of America, and this was especially the case with those born in England. (Hear, hear.) He assured them that their hearts in America beat with true loyalty to her Majesty as a lady and as a Queen, and he did not think that the history of England could furnish a parallel to the triumphant procession which the Queen would make from New York to San Francisco, if she visited the States. (Cheers.) But when Mr. Cochrane began to talk about the advantage of not electing a chief magistrate every four years, he began to wonder if he (Mr. Cochrane) had got the right end of the string. It was an excellent thing to have a good King or Queen, but when there was a bad one they would be glad to be rid of him or her. Of course, when they had as good a man at the White House as they had now, they wished to keep him; but he thought that a hundred years ago, if it had been in keeping with the English constitution, they would have been glad if old George III. had been turned out, and so saved to England the finest colonies she had. (Cheers.) From what he had seen he felt how entirely their hearts were one, and that it was a real privilege to present to them the best congratulations of the churches of the West. He felt how entirely the churches of the West and the churches of England were one in aim and purpose. They felt alike in the search of religious freedom and truth, and in the promotion of the Christian spirit and the Christian life; and they would rejoice in common when they saw that feeling spreading far and wide till it took the whole world captive in its sweet and holy thrall. (Cheers.) He thought that in America they had better opportunities than the churches in England. It never occurred to anybody in America to wonder whether they were uppermost or undermost. They had given up that problem altogether—(hear, hear)—and the question was never asked as to whether Unitarians were to be considered outsiders, or whether they were to be held insiders. (Cheers.) They had gone along doing the best they knew—doing their work in some sincere fashion, and saying their word fearlessly; and in their city of the West he might venture to say that men of their persuasion, the Unitarians, occupied as good a position in the public estimation as any Church in the world.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.—The Rev. John Murray has resigned the pulpit at Ilminster; and the Rev. E. M. Geldart, M.A., has been compelled, for a time at least, to cease his labours at Croydon owing to ill-health.

ACCINGTON DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The annual soiree in connection with the above Association took place on Saturday last in the Oxford-street Schoolroom, Accrington, when about 150 partook of tea. After tea, the president, Mr. Peter Bibby, opened the proceedings with a few remarks, and called upon the secretary and treasurer to read the reports for the past year; after which, addresses were given by Mr. John Heys (deputation of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association), the Revs. A. Lazenby, Thos. Leyland, H. S. Solly, M.A. Mr. Solly distributed the certificates and book prizes to the successful candidates at the April examinations, sixteen having obtained second-class certificates, five first-class certificates with books, and two honours certificates with books, in the elementary grade; and in the advanced grade, three first-class certificates with books, and nine honours certificates with books—total thirty-seven, from two schools. The meeting was also interspersed with music by the Accrington, Burnley, and Padiham Tonic Sol-Fa singing classes. A vote of thanks to the deputation from the Manchester Association, proposed by the Rev. W. Mathews, seconded by the Rev. E. W. Hopkinson, and the election of officers for the ensuing year, with the usual votes of thanks to the chairman, brought one of the most successful meetings to a close.

BLACKPOOL.—On Sunday week a harvest festival took place at the Unitarian Free Church, Banks-street. It was the first festival of the kind ever held in Blackpool. The chapel was beautifully decorated for the occasion. On the wall over the pulpit was placed an inscription from the Psalms, "Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness." The letters were made of straw, and fastened on a ground of scarlet cloth, around which was a border of wheat, barley, and oats, roped together. Surmounting the design was a sheaf of corn with a reaper's hook on either side. In front of the pulpit was an elegant vase of choice flowers with a fountain of water playing in the middle. Other parts of the interior were decorated with sheaves of corn, flowers, fruit, and vegetables. The floral decorations were very tastefully carried out under the direction of Mrs. Camm and Mrs. J. Marsden. Flowers and fruit were contributed by friends from Stockport, Offerton, Bury, Pendleton, Manchester, and Blackpool. The unpretentious little chapel, which the law of the land deprives of God's daylight on one side, and which is otherwise architecturally peculiar, for once presented a very attractive appearance, being crowded at both services. The offertory was £7. 10s. 6d.

BALLYMENA.—The Sunday-school held its annual soiree on Monday week. After tea, the scholars, their parents, and friends adjourned to the meeting-house, where a musical programme was commenced by the choir, who, assisted by a number of friends, sang the spirited chorus, "March of the men of Harlech." An address followed by the Rev. D. Matts, who read the attendance of scholars during the year, and distributed prizes to the most successful of them. The interesting occasion afforded a favourable opportunity to the members and friends of the church of presenting Mr. William Fielding, who is about to leave home for the study of the Christian ministry, with a number of choice books as a token of the esteem in which he was held for his long and faithful services in connection with the congregation and Sunday-schools. The choir then gave a selection of choruses, part songs, solos, and duets. Mrs. H. Fielding kindly presided at the harmonium. The entertainment was much enjoyed throughout, and elicited frequent marks of approval. A cordial welcome was given to friends from other churches who were present, and was heartily responded to by Mr. Thomas Taylor.

CWMBACH.—The children and a few others, in all seventy-two, connected with our Sunday school, enjoyed a good substantial tea in a field, the use of which was freely granted by Thomas Thomas, Esq., Cefnpennaruchaf, on Thursday, the 5th inst. After doing ample justice to the tea, &c., the children entered with zest into various innocent games, to which they devoted all their energies for a few hours, and, as night came on, they were reluctantly compelled to return to their homes, but not before the inner man was replenished again. The ladies of the congregation presided over the cloths laid on the green sward. Among those present we noticed the aged Rev. Titus Lloyd, Nottage and Wick. He preached twice on the preceding Sunday at our chapel here. Before the happy assembly dispersed, thanks were proposed and carried with acclamation to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas for the great kindness shown by them to all present.

DUNDEE: MRS. SOULE'S SERVICES.—The Unitarian Christian Church was opened on three successive evenings last week for simple religious services, conducted by Mrs. Soule, with the assistance of the minister. The attendance each evening was encouraging, a considerable number of strangers being present. Mrs. Soule's addresses were listened to with the greatest attention and interest. A large portion of the sermon delivered on Tuesday evening appeared in Wednesday's Evening News.

DUNFERMLINE.—On Sunday next an attempt is to be made to revive the cause of Liberal Christianity in this town. The Music Hall has been secured, and Mrs. Soule intends to devote herself for a time to this field. The Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, will take part in the opening services.

HEYWOOD.—A floral and harvest thanksgiving service was held on Sunday last, when the chapel was neatly decorated with choice plants, vases of cut flowers, and fruit. The Rev. J. Freeston preached appropriate sermons.

ILKESTON.—On Sunday last the Rev. A. W. Worthington, B.A., of Mansfield, preached two excellent sermons in High-street Chapel, Ilkeston, on behalf of the Sunday school connected with that place of worship.

Notwithstanding tempestuous weather, the congregations were as large as usual, and the services proved an undoubted success. Hymns were sung by the scholars, and selections on the organ were given by the organist. The collections amounted to over £5, which, considering the bad state of trade in this locality, is very gratifying. The annual school treat was held on Wednesday, when a large number of the scholars and their friends went to the Nottingham Arboretum, and spent a very pleasant day at that attractive resort.

LONDON: KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday afternoon last, September 15, a very pleasant and joyous service was held, viz., the children's harvest service, which was conducted by the Rev. J. Taylor, of Carter Lane Mission, who gave a most appropriate address from Galatians v., 22-23. The church was nearly full, for the parents and friends, with a good number of old scholars, glad to join in, in the old familiar place, mustered in strong force, and 30 or more of the Hampstead school came down as usual to join their friends at Clarence Road. The church had been tastefully and profusely decorated for the occasion. The offertories for the day, amounting to £4. 14s. 11., were given to the Sunday school. In the evening the service was continued by the Rev. P. W. Claydon, pastor of the church, a large congregation being present. Special anthems were sung morning and evening by the choir, all aiming at making it a day of thanksgiving to God for all his mercies. On Monday the fruit and flowers were taken as a thanks offering to the Central Sick Asylum, Cleveland-street, for the kindness shown to one of the scholars who died there last June.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.—The committee of this Society have arranged for the delivery, at Dalston, Peckham, and Hammersmith, of three courses of four lectures each, on the Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in each of the four weeks commencing on 23rd October next. The lecturers will be the Revs. S. Fletcher Williams, J. Page Hopps, R. A. Armstrong, and A. W. Worthington, B.A.; and their aim will be directed as illustrating the positive side of the religious faith cherished by Unitarians.—A social meeting of the members of the Society and their friends will be held at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, on Wednesday, 16th October, when the discussion will be opened by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton. Further particulars will appear in advertisements to be published later.

LEICESTER: GREAT MEETING.—On Sunday evening last, the Rev. J. Page Hopps preached a special sermon at the Great Meeting, on "A Rational and Christlike View of the Future Life: suggested and rendered inevitable by the late loss of life in such catastrophes as the sinking of the Eurydice and the Princess Alice, and the pit explosion in South Wales." The chapel was filled. The sermon is fully reported in the Leicester Daily Post.

LEICESTER.—A "Free Christian," whom our readers will at once recognise as the minister of the Free Christian Church of this town, writes to the Leicester Daily Mercury in explanation of his views regarding operas and theatres. It will be remembered that last winter Mr. Wright delivered a lecture on this subject, of which we gave an abstract, and which was afterwards published. It seems that the views therein expressed have been somewhat misrepresented, and the letter to which we now refer corrects these statements, and urges afresh the opinion which Mr. Wright strongly holds as to the benefit done by the theatre and the great desirableness of removing abuses and making the theatre all it might be. The letter is too long for insertion, but we give the following passages:—"On grounds of experience in our modern town-life, we may be sure of this, that, if they mix at all with companions, our young people will want to visit a theatre now and again, if only on special occasions, and if the church condemns them, they will do it either unknown or in defiance of the church. If they cannot do it decently and quietly while connected with religion, they will cut their connection; letting religion go to the winds, while they go to the theatre, and often worse." "I do not say that therefore the church should do all it can to encourage theatre-going. But, in the face of facts, I ask, is it not worth while to consider whether the church is acting wisely in assuming an antagonistic attitude towards the theatre altogether? Still further, I cannot but look upon the theatre as an agent in national education, manners, and morality. Not equal to the church, of course. But that might also be said of a temperance meeting, a political club, a picnic, the Granby, a Y.M.C.A., &c., &c. And yet these things exist and are useful. So is the theatre useful in its own place, and might be more so." "The masses do not go to church; you will not find them at museum lectures; nor in mutual improvement classes; nor at temperance hall meetings; nor even at home much, except at meal-times and sleeping-times. Their habitation on earth is the workshop, the drinkshop, or theatre. 'They ought to be elsewhere,' do you say? But they are not, you see. And yet they need an inbreathing from something higher, and in my opinion the theatre is doing this for the masses more than any other institution. We have had an illustration of it in Leicester during the past week. Although some church and chapel-going people were among the crowds at the theatre, sure enough the mass of men and women in those crowds are not connected with any church or chapel. But they witnessed 'Hamlet' on Monday night, and that 'psychological drama,' 'The Bells,' on Tuesday night. Here were influences to exalt them above ordinary earthiness. Here were words and actions to educate the intellect, to arouse the moral activities within them, to enlist their feelings on the side of what was brave, patient, just, and good."

MANCHESTER: CROSS-STREET CHAPEL.—We understand that the soiree, in commemoration of the Rev. Wm. Gaskell's fifty years' ministry of Cross-street Chapel, will be held in the Town Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday evening, October 15th.

NEWRY: PRESENTATION TO REV. JOHN A. CROZIER. On Thursday evening week the members of the Temperance and Band of Hope Society held their annual meeting. The room was tastefully ornamented, and there was a large gathering. Mr. Greig, the secretary, moved that Mr. Robert M'Alpine take the chair. Mr. M'Alpine said that in August last it was suggested that a presentation should be got up to Mr. Crozier, and it was felt that it could take no better form than that of a portrait of himself. He had been the chief instrument in the promotion of the temperance movement in their midst. Mr. Robert Roland then read an address to Mr. Crozier. At the conclusion the portrait was unveiled, and was found to be an exceedingly life-like one of Mr. Crozier. Accompanying the portrait was an elaborately illuminated address. Mr. Crozier made a suitable acknowledgement, and the remainder of the evening was spent in an enjoyable manner. When the items on the programme had been gone through the fife and drum played several airs, and the proceedings were brought to a close by the band playing the National Anthem.

NEW ZEALAND.—An old subscriber writes to us:—A gentleman who has been for some years residing, with his family, at Wellington, New Zealand, writes to know if there is any hope of inducing a Unitarian clergyman to visit that place, as he thinks there is a very good opening there for an able preacher of liberal views, the inhabitants being very sick of Calvinistic teaching.

NORWICH.—The funeral of the late Mrs. Hannah Shaw Bolingbroke took place at The Rosary, on the 11th inst. It is not possible to convey any adequate idea of the range of the deceased lady's activities, or of the consequent repute in which she was held amongst the young, the poor, and the Christian workers who looked to her for counsel and help in manifold schemes of usefulness. Her name was a household word in philanthropic circles. Her venerable figure was familiar to all who were not absolutely immersed in their own affairs. She will live in the minds and hearts of the generation that is springing up, as she has long done with those who gathered about her grave. Hers is, indeed, "the memory of the just," which blossoms sweetly and lasts long. The Rev. Alx. Gordon, who conducted the funeral service, spoke of the varied claims which a life like Mrs. Bolingbroke's had upon the grateful affection of survivors, and the stimulus which she had derived from her religious principles. On Sunday morning a larger congregation than usual afforded additional proof of the enduring regard in which she is held by many who do not belong to our household of faith. Mr. Perris discoursed on "Life Crowns," from Rev. ii., 10.

PENDLETON.—On Sunday last the annual scholars' festival was held, when the Rev. Chas. C. Coe, of Bolton, preached two excellent and appropriate sermons. The congregations were good both morning and evening, and special hymns were sung by the children. The chapel and school were decorated with flowers and ferns, the bulk of which were sent to Salford Dispensary. The offertories amounted to £15.

PORTSMOUTH: HIGH-STREET.—This Unitarian Church has been handsomely decorated by a band of earnest, tasteful workers, and presented with the fruits and flowers of the harvest time, richly displayed, a very bright and attractive appearance. The sermons were thoroughly entered into and enjoyed by the large congregations present, and the collections, morning and evening, amounted to more than for a numbers of years past.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—The Mutual Improvement Society in connection with Unity Church has entered upon new life, and the first meeting of the autumnal session was held on the 11th inst. in the schoolroom. The Rev. R. C. Smith presided. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Dryden, Downey, W. Hornby, T. Hornby, D. Bell, &c. The proceedings were diversified by readings, &c., by Mr. Carbutt, Master F. C. Smith, Miss Dryden, Miss Stevenson, &c. A tea and coffee supper was served up at nine o'clock, to which about forty of the members sat down. A most enjoyable evening was spent. The programme for the coming session is a very full one, composed of essays, lectures, and entertainments.

WARRINGTON.—At the recent meeting to inaugurate a series of week-evening classes, Mr. Birchall said that the mantle of Philip Carpenter had fallen upon the Rev. Richd. Pilcher, and he hoped by their assistance he would be found worthy of it. By mistake, last week, this sentiment was attributed to Mr. Pilcher himself.

WHITCHURCH: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—On Thursday evening, September 12th, the annual congregational meeting of the above church was held, under the presidency of the Rev. W. Carey Walters. A committee of fifteen was elected for the management of congregational affairs, with Mr. W. Milne Watson as secretary, and Mr. John Gresty as treasurer. The building account showed that the total cost of the church, including fittings, had been £908. 2s. 8d., of which £133. 12s. 8d. had still to be raised. It was resolved to endeavour to extinguish this before the new year. Mr. R. J. Fletcher and Mr. John Gresty promising £10 each, and the pastor guaranteeing to collect £60. It was decided to hold a sale of work before Christmas to clear the remainder. The magazine account showed a small deficiency. Mr. Watson agreed to defray a fourth of this, and Mr. W. B. Black to collect the rest. Under the able management of Mr. Alex. Martin the sale is increasing, and it is hoped that this year it will be quite self-supporting. The current expenses account showed that since January, 1877, £277. 1s. 4½d. had been raised (altogether exclusive of grants), and £275. 12s. 2d. spent, leaving a balance in hand of £1s. 9s. 2½d. £10. 10s. of this had been sent to the Indian Famine Fund, and £8. 13s. 3d. to the Midland Christian Union, besides individual subscriptions to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday-school Association, and other societies. Through the kindness of friends, a valuable library has been purchased for the Sunday school, which now numbers 360 volumes, and is extensively used.

BUXTON.—On Sunday last harvest thanksgiving services were held. The fruit and cut flowers were kindly contributed by R. Peacock, Esq. The services were conducted by the minister, the Rev. A. M'Creery, B.A. The morning sermon was founded on Psalm civ., 24, and was a forcible and eloquent plea for unwavering belief in the existence of an overruling, wise, and kindly Providence. The evening sermon was founded on the words "Be ye thankful," when gratitude to God was urged as one of our plainest duties, and indicated a state of mind which must bring joy to ourselves.

AN OFFER.

To the Editors.—As this is not a money-making announcement, but purely "for the good of the cause," will you allow me to say that I have a large quantity of my "Confession of Faith, concerning God, Jesus, Salvation, the Bible, and the Future Life," to give away, that I invite applications, and that I will forward them to any address. I only stipulate the applicants pay for postage. For every fifty asked for, twopence halfpenny in halfpenny stamps should be enclosed. People who can distribute the tract need not be afraid of asking for too many. It is stereotyped, and I will print and give away any quantity that may be asked for up to the end of October.—Yours, &c.,

J. PAGE HOPPS.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN IRELAND.

To the Editors.—As to the manner of Mr. Alexander Gordon's last letter to you, I have nothing to say; it speaks for itself. As to the matter of it, I offer a few words of reply.

Let it not be forgotten that my contention is that no man can enter the ministry in connection with the Northern Presbytery of Antrim without having "by his own explicit declaration" or by "answers to questions asked," satisfied the Presbytery as to his opinions respecting Christ and Revelation. If a man does not want to be questioned he makes what he is pleased to call a "voluntary" declaration. Having bent his neck to satisfy the Presbytery, what need is there to ask him to do it? Mr. Alx. Gordon and others have done this.

What I affirmed I proved. Mr. Alx. Gordon is very brave in denials, but happily his affirmations fully establish what he denies. He denies that questions are asked, but he admits that the Presbytery must be satisfied on some "matters of faith." He plays a good deal with the word "questions," but he says that the resolution of his Presbytery requires that a candidate will not be admitted without being "fully satisfied by his own explicit declaration or by his answers to questions asked." Usual or unusual, private or public, formless or formulated, cannot any man see clear as if written in fire letters across the sky the question, "Do you believe these doctrines?" Mr. Alx. Gordon proved, as I proved, that the Presbytery is a testing body, and he shows that they claim the right to ask questions. But he says no theological questions have been asked. Why not? Because the intrants have "taken time by the forelock" and given the needful assurances beforehand. What need was there to question these "voluntary" answers? They wanted to be ministers in connection with the Presbytery, they knew the conditions, and they complied with them.

Mr. Alx. Gordon thinks he has secured your adherence to his views of non-subscription. I doubt it. I may, however, safely leave this in your hands, especially as he allows that "you are to the full as likely to have just ideas as your correspondent."

But Mr. Alx. Gordon is nothing if not critical. He refers to an "important resolution" which I quoted. He explains to your readers the meaning of the word "inaugural," and he describes it as a "newspaper term." He affirms that the first meeting of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim was held on 4th April, 1862. He also declares that the resolution which I quoted was "brought forward (and rejected) at a meeting of an earlier ecclesiastical body." Having said so much by way of criticism and correction, he then admits that "in the wording of this resolution which became the standing rule of our Presbytery on 4th April, 1862, he (that is your present correspondent) is nearly right, but not altogether so." The discrepancy he points out is as follows. I said, "by answers to questions asked"—Mr. Alx. Gordon says it is "by his answers to questions asked"—there may be some grave difference here, but I fail to see it. If a man had to answer questions, I suppose the answer would be his!

But neither for the word "inaugural"—the newspaper term—nor for the date of the passing of the important resolution, nor for the omission of the word "his"—if it is an omission—am I responsible. I quoted these from a letter written by the Rev. J. Scott

Porter to the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., in April, 1875. Mr. Porter ought to know whether they are correct or not.

I quote a few other words from the same letter which will fully establish the statements I have made. The "Presbytery requires to be satisfied by testimonials of the zeal, personal character, &c., of the intrant; and by his own express assurance that he accepts the Lord Jesus as the Christ of God, and the Christian Religion as unfolded in the Scriptures as a Divine Revelation. . . . The Presbytery will not dispense with it." Taking these words in connection with Mr. Alx. Gordon's admissions, and my own statements, what room is there left for even the shadow of a doubt that in the Northern Presbytery of Antrim there is a definite theological test to which every minister must submit ere he will be allowed to enter its narrow fold? Any man with a straight, clear vision will see this in a moment.

By "explicit assurance," or "in answers to questions asked," the Presbytery insists upon being satisfied, and every minister within its bounds has been compelled to satisfy it. Mr. Pilcher declined to give the needful satisfaction, and said, "I have always ministered to a non-subscribing congregation, and should be sadly out of place in any other." Mr. Alx. Gordon had no difficulty in giving the required assurance, and hence, when the opportunity came, he entered upon his position in what he calls "our Presbytery."

The great question I have raised is, however, of more importance than any of Mr. Alx. Gordon's doings. It concerns all our churches, and every minister in our body. If real theological freedom is wanted, it must not be sought in connection with the Northern Presbytery of Antrim.—Yours truly, JAMES C. STREET.

DOING AND SAYING.

In Italy there are from 8,000 to 10,000 Protestant communicants, with 60,000 adherents.

In a somewhat remarkable article, the Watchman recommends to the Wesleys the reading of the Book of Psalms by minister and people in alternate verses at morning service, and hints that they might as well be chanted if the congregations would permit it.

The cost of School Board education to the ratepayers is becoming less, as we have frequently pointed out that it must do as the children earned more of the Parliamentary grant. Taking the whole of England and Wales, every child in a Board School cost the ratepayers one and sevenpence less in 1877 than in 1876. On the whole the report for the past year is the most encouraging which has ever been sent out by the Education Department. It proves that the hard work and sacrifices of several years have begun to tell at last.

The Sheffield Telegraph says that the question whether the teacher of an infant school at Cromford, near Matlock, Miss Dexter by name, should be allowed to give Scripture lessons on "The Fall" to the children under her charge, came before the Belper School Board on Tuesday week. The Rev. R. L. Lloyd, Unitarian minister, of Belper, said the teacher knew no more about the subject than his shoes did, and he should not allow any child of his to receive instruction from anyone on such a subject. Mr. Smedley generally agreed with Mr. Lloyd, and other members having expressed their ideas, the consideration of the subject was adjourned for a fortnight.

On Wednesday the Congregationalists of Lancashire opened their new and enlarged College buildings at Whalley Range, near Manchester, and Nonconformity has just occasion to plume itself on the possession of one more thoroughly well-furnished scholastic foundation. The extent of the alterations and additions made to the old Independent College may be estimated from the fact that £22,000 has been expended upon the new enlargements. With the generosity that has almost become characteristic in this denomination, about £12,000 has already been subscribed to the Enlargement Fund.

The Roman Catholics in Switzerland are disputing with the Old Catholics for the possession of the churches and the church property in several parishes where the Old Catholics have obtained the supremacy. The Great Council of Berne having been appealed to, has given the following decision: "Church goods have the character of communal property; they belong to the totality of the parish, and, therefore, they must be regarded as indivisible. The churches and church goods belong neither to the Old Catholics nor to the Roman Catholics, but to the church congregations of the parishes in question; to these congregations alone does it belong to declare what form of cultus shall be introduced, and the State (as guardian of the principle of communal self-government and the liberty of religious congregations) refuses to mix up itself in an inter-confessional controversy, or to favour one confession rather than another." We commend this decision to the attention of certain loud-voiced Church defenders in this country.

The Pope has addressed to Cardinal Nina, the Pontifical Secretary of State, a letter dated 21st August, and only now published, explaining at length the programme and the policy of the Holy See. Respecting the negotiations between Germany and the Vatican, the Pope says the state of the Catholics in that country called for his special solicitude. The Church, without doubt, will be happy to see peace restored in Germany; but such a result will be fortunate also for the Empire. Relative to the Eastern Christians, the Holy See will make every effort to promote the interests of religion in those regions. Proceeding to touch upon the state of things between the Vatican and the Italian Government, the Pope adverts to the complaints of his predecessor, Pius IX. on this head, and speaks in condemnatory terms of the suppression of religious bodies, the law of universal military service, and the establishment in Rome of heretical churches and schools. "In this deplorable state of things," he says, "we lift our eyes to heaven and place our trust in God. We are not unmindful of the duty imposed on us by our apostolic office, and shall perform it."

A Unitarian Christian in the Northern Whig criticises an article from the London Examiner on "Missionaries." The writer in the London Examiner, speaking of the extreme rarity of the better class of natives in Calcutta, Bombay, or Madras, or of the highly cultivated young men of India, ever embracing Christianity, says, "Young Bengal or Young Bombay may have lost belief in his own religion, but he takes up with Unitarianism, or a new kind of Deism, and not with Christianity!" "This," says the writer in the Northern Whig, "is a very plain assertion that Unitarianism is not Christianity. I really had hoped that in the year 1878 no writer would have, either in insolence or ignorance, thus written of a school of thought which has been the pioneer of religious liberty throughout the civilised world, has produced the ablest defenders of Christianity against the assaults of scepticism, and, though as an organised Christian Church relatively small in numbers, now embraces among its adherents some of the choicest men in the liberal sections of many Protestant denominations, no matter whether such men would repudiate the name or not. Anyone who professes to be a disciple of Jesus Christ must be classed as a Christian. Unitarians most earnestly profess this discipleship, and, therefore, their claim to the name Christian is undoubted. Most Unitarians cheerfully acknowledge the paramount authority of Christ's teachings, and accept him as a special and divinely-appointed Messenger from God. I at once admit that some Unitarians regard him as simply the greatest and best of all the religious teachers who have from time to time appeared on the earth; but still they profess to be his disciples; and, for the exact quality of their discipleship, they themselves, and not their brethren, are responsible."

Mr. Le Page Renouf, her Majesty's Inspector of Schools in the metropolitan district of the Tower Hamlets, in his report for 1877, after stating that the great defect of which all examiners complain is want of intelligence, says: "It is perhaps natural that little children who know what a 'donkey' is, or a 'moke,' should not know what an 'ass' is, or that if asked how many legs a fish has, they should say 'four,' 'two,' or 'one;' but it is almost incredible that great girls, pupil-teachers in the East-end of London, should not know what is a 'mushroom,' or that both boy and girl pupil-teachers should habitually understand as a 'churchyard' the 'rampart' to which the body of Sir John Moore was hurried. One of the most favourite pieces of prose learned by pupil-teachers in their fifth year is the famous speech of Lord Chatham. I have not yet had one who understood what is meant by 'extending the traffic to the shambles of every German despot.' The meanings of the words were not always known, the sense of the entire passage never. An amusing story about a sow was lately given out for the composition of the pupil-teachers. A good many understood 'cow' instead of 'sow,' but the animal, whether as 'cow' or 'sow,' was in almost every case spoken of as 'he' or 'him.' The following is the account of the Indian mutiny given by a female pupil-teacher in her fifth year of service and the eighteenth year of her age: 'There was a dreadful massacre in India, and thousands were slain; it was placed under the hands of a governor, but he did not attend properly after the country, and so the people took the law into their own hands, and the country became in a dreadful state, men and children being killed. The Queen then became Empress of England.'

DUNDEE.—Last Sunday, the Rev. D. M'Collester, of America, preached at the three services in the Unitarian Christian Church, with great acceptance.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

ANOTHER INJUSTICE GONE.

Few English Nonconformists are aware that Scotch Dissenters when desiring marriage must have banns proclaimed in the Established Church, and, of course, pay fees. By Dr. Cameron's Marriage Notice Bill this relic of past inequality will be abolished, and at the beginning of the new year Scotch law will be similar to English law in this respect. To sum up, it releases Scotch Nonconformists from paying fees for nothing at all on the occasion of their marriage.

PRINCIPAL CAIRD ON WOMAN'S EDUCATION.

ADDRESSING the Students on the occasion of the first distribution of certificates, and other awards, in connection with the Glasgow University Local Examinations, on Wednesday week, Principal Caird said that the Examinations were important to the University, as partly supplying the lack of entrance examinations, and in other respects they were an important educational agency. Unfortunately the Universities closed their doors on the sex to which the larger part of his audience belonged. To those who cherished jealousy or silly prejudice against educated and learned woman he said that he had never met either man or woman who had been rendered less attractive by genuine culture.

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER OPINIONS.

GENERAL GORDON, the member for East Aberdeenshire, and the successful opponent in the Conservative interest of the late lamented George Hope, Esq. of Boardlands, is no great Tory after all; at least in matters bearing on the union of Church and State. Speaking the other day at the opening of a Free Church bazaar in Peterhead, he said that he cordially agreed with Lord Kintore in his hope and wish that the line of division which now separates, unfortunately separates, the churches in this country shall be lowered to such an extent that the wall of division will be no higher than will prevent us shaking hands over it. "I go further than that. I hope and long to see the day when the wall of separation will entirely disappear, and that there will be free access from the one to the other, and no line of division between them. Having thought a great deal on this subject during the last few years, I am convinced that as Christians we ought to arrive at this point. The points of difference are such that they ought and might be got rid of, and any exertion that I can make in that direction I shall most heartily and earnestly make."

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE SUNDAY MOVEMENT.

THE Sunday movement has just secured a great triumph in America as well as in England. In spite of opposition, the Permanent Exhibition at Philadelphia has been opened to the public on Sundays, and that this measure supplies a felt want of the people is undoubtedly proved by the fact that on the first Sunday about 6,000 visitors were registered. On the second Sunday nearly the same number were present, bad weather notwithstanding. The management have provided a series of sacred concerts. The visitors consist principally of clerks and mechanics—the classes on whose behalf similar concessions are pleaded for in England.

CHANNING AND SWEDENBORG.

THE Christian Register has seen the advanced sheets of a new book of 284 pages, entitled "Swedenborg and Channing," written by the Rev. B. F. Barrett. It is dedicated "to the Unitarian denomination in America," of which the author was once a minister, and in which he has retained a living interest, notwithstanding the profound modification of religious opinions brought about by long and admiring study of the writings of the Swedish seer, with which he is probably as familiar as any man living. Recurring in recent years to the writings of Dr. Channing, he has been more than surprised to find that on many points the spiritual insight of the Unitarian brought him into harmony with the doctrines of the "New Jerusalem;" and it is the purpose of this book to bring out these points of agreement.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

SHALL WE HAVE DOCTRINAL TEACHING?

AN ADDRESS AT A MEETING OF THE LIVERPOOL SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

I.

I BELIEVE, most earnestly, and for several reasons, that our ideas of religion should be taught in our Sunday schools, that our children should know what our conceptions of Christianity are, and on what basis they stand. I would put the first reason in the form of a personal reference. It is a natural supposition that no thoughtful, devout, and reverent soul has ever stepped out of orthodoxy into Unitarianism without passing through a mental crisis that has seemed to shake his being to its foundations. I can reanimate now the feelings which crept over me when I opened the first Unitarian book I ever saw, lent to me in Shrewsbury by the Rev. J. R. Mc.Kee—a little book of twelve lectures by the Rev. John Scott Porter. I can revivify the fear and dread which began to disturb me. There was the thought that what had been most dear might be put in peril. There was the sense of jeopardising what had seemed to be beyond question, and of loosening what had been secure. As the book was read through and through, and other books that followed—Channing, Theodore Parker, the Liverpool Controversy, and many others—there was the conflict, long and painful, full of sighs and tears, between the faith of youth and of early affections, and the now dawning faith of opening manhood and of more enlightened reason; between the faith of father and mother that had made their lives radiant, but that now was beginning to be anything but a luminous way to God, and the faith of reason that had hitherto been described as no faith at all, but unbelief, but that now was beginning to be a faith of light, and peace, and strength. It all ended in a full assurance that I had taken hold of permanent principles of religion; but it was such that, if I could, I would save every one from passing through such a crisis. Are we saving any? Are we not too much given to allow our children in our Sunday schools to grow up with the old ideas of the Bible, God, Jesus, even of the devil and hell? We do not, of course, teach these old ideas; but do we not too often hesitate to show their error? Do we not, by our silence, allow them to remain and abide? Are we not suffering our children to go on to a terrible experience—the experience of unlearning what they have believed was the truth; the experience of having to part with what they have felt were props; the experience that those are falsities which they have held as realities? See how, for example, we treat the Bible—often as, after all, an infallible book; and when the time comes, as assuredly it does come, when that error is discovered, there follows one of two things: either a sense that religion has lost its basis and totters on a sandy foundation, or a terrible reaction in which the Bible is flippantly and unjustly cast aside. All that, so far as our own children are concerned, we might save them from, at least, we might soften their mental crises, by indoctrinating them in our religious principles.

Then, again, I would give doctrinal teaching to strengthen them amidst the present religious conflicts. We are continually saying that this is a time of earnest religious enquiry, in which old faiths and systems are departing, in which science is displacing the traditional beliefs and revolutionising the creeds, in which questionings about God, the soul, and immortality are the elements of the atmosphere. Some minds regard these phenomena with dread. But we may be full of hope and confidence for the outcome of religion. Our onlook into the future of faith may be brave and fearless. But should we not have our children prepared for the times in which they live? I would ground them on principles which, as I feel with increasing firmness every day's dawn, need fear no discussion—ideas of God, man, human duty, human destiny, which are in harmony with reason and science, and which not only do not dwarf, but grow with every day's contemplation and use. Does it not seem to you that, not only the value of saving them from the agony of having to abandon an unsatisfying faith, but the very theological chaos of the time also calls upon us to provide our children with the sustaining principles of our own faith?

Then, once more, I would have doctrinal teaching in our Sunday schools to fortify our children with reasons for the faith that is in us. Why is that so many of our young people leave us when they come to manhood and womanhood, and join other churches, or absent themselves from all churches? There are several causes of this; but is not one cause this, that they see we do not hold our principles earnestly enough to inculcate them? We let them go out into the world unprovided with an intelligent knowledge of Unitarian Christianity, and ready, therefore, to fall in the presence of argument and opposition. That is the result in multitudes of cases. Dr. Freeman Clarke, of Boston, United States, tells of a young woman brought up in one of our American Sunday schools who, when one day in the company of a Roman Catholic priest, was asked by him, "What do you as a Unitarian believe?" She answered, "Well, really, I don't know." "But," he replied, "I know what I believe," and shortly afterwards she became a Roman Catholic. Can we wonder at the loss of many of our young people when we leave them open at all points to orthodox influences? I don't say that the teaching of our principles is an infallible preventive of perversion; but I ask you whether the absence of such teaching does not make perversion easy? Too many of our young people, having no firm footing in our Unitarian Christianity, are captured by those whose belief is clear to them, or, what is worse still, fall a prey to that floating but powerful influence of no belief which too easily takes possession of many minds. I hold, therefore that, not an infallible, but a strong security against both orthodoxy and indifferentism is the teaching of doctrines in our Sunday schools. S. F. W.

WEEK EVENING AMUSEMENTS FOR SUNDAY SCHOLARS.

THE principle suggestions contained in the foregoing reports* will be found, along with a few others, in the following circular which it is proposed to send to the Associated Schools.

CIRCULAR.

At the evening meeting on Good Friday last, the following resolution was passed:—

That this Conference is of opinion that the question of providing suitable amusements for our Sunday scholars during their leisure moments, is of such importance as to justify the Committee of the Association in considering the best means of arousing the different schools to take some action in the matter; and further, that it be a recommendation to the Committee to consider this question.

The committee, after carefully considering the matter and communicating with those who have made practical experiments in the direction indicated, find themselves unable to recommend any uniform plan for general adoption in the schools connected with the Association. The circumstances of each school in regard both to the position of the scholars and to the amount of attention which the teachers may be able to give, must determine what is possible in any particular instance; but the following general principles may be laid down as applicable to all cases alike.

First.—There are only two many cases in which the mere withdrawal of the scholars from the undesirable influences and surroundings in the midst of which they spend their leisure time and seek their pleasure, would be an immense gain; while on the other hand the Sunday school is so connected with all that is purest and best in their lives, that it would exercise a most favourable influence over any amusements associated with it.

Secondly.—The scholars when got to the school must be provided with amusements; and quite apart from the particular kind of amusements provided, the mere fact of being taught to employ themselves, and to amuse themselves in some definite way instead of merely lounging and idling away their time, would be to many a great gain. This invaluable lesson might be taught to even very young children by means of play-afternoons on a Saturday, when they might be set to amuse themselves with toys and games; and the influence might be perpetuated and carried into the homes if well selected toys and games were given as prizes and rewards. For boys there might cricket and football clubs; and it has been suggested that a drilling class (possibly with the addition of gymnastics) might prove attractive, and might also contribute much to the order of the school, if the discipline were maintained on the Sunday, and the boys' classes organised on a kind of military system, each class, forming a sort of little regiment, and being officered by scholars chosen for their good conduct. For the boys also there might be a reading room provided with games, such as chess, draughts, dominoes, and perhaps a bagatelle board or billiard table. For girls as well as boys there might be, in the summer, walks and short excursions, and in the winter singing classes and recreation-evening, with short lectures, readings (both to and by the scholars), round games, singing, acting, and dancing. In providing amusements for our young people it should be remembered on the one hand that they require, upon the whole, continual change and variety of amusements, and on the other hand that while, for the moment, they may be carried away by novelties and may be inclined to push them to excess, their enthusiasm in most cases, sooner or later burns itself out, and the balance at length rights itself.

Thirdly.—In all the amusements refinement of manners and feelings should be cultivated as far as possible, and this will require a great deal of personal attention and influence on the part of the teachers. It is not only that games which encourage roughness and over-familiarity should be forbidden altogether, but that quiet and respectful conduct should be cultivated throughout all the games and amusements. And in particular, where dancing is allowed, it may sometimes be necessary to have a dancing class, in order that the scholars may from the beginning be accustomed to a proper style. It must be remembered, however, that our object is not merely to create good tastes, but also to provide for their gratification; and whenever we undertake the former duty, we should try to discharge the latter also, else we may do more harm than good. A dancing class, without proper opportunities for dancing, may arouse and stimulate the desire for dancing, and drive our young people into undesirable company.

Fourthly.—Such recreation-evenings would afford to the scholars, under very favourable influence, the same kind of opportunity of meeting together, and becoming acquainted with one another, and acquiring common tastes and interests, and forming friendships in a simple, frank, and natural way, which is afforded by the social life and visiting of the upper and middle classes, but which is too often impossible in the small and often crowded homes of the working classes. The union of the classes of young men and young women for such meetings has been found in the cases where it has been tried to work satisfactorily. But in this, as in every other part of this scheme, it must be remembered that everything depends upon the influence and the authority of those who undertake to conduct such meetings. Without constant supervision and firm authority they may easily become sources of harm instead of good.

In enumerating these various modes of influencing our scholars in their amusements, your committee, of course, do not expect that any school will adopt them in their entirety, nor do they venture to recommend to any school any particular course of action. Most of the plans here mentioned (all, indeed, except the drilling class and the play-afternoons for the younger scholars) have, however, been practically tried, and for the most part with satisfactory and encouraging success; and the committee are so deeply impressed with the importance of this subject, that they most earnestly commend it to the serious attention of the associated schools, in the hope that during the next winter some experiments may be made in this direction. They will be happy to supply any further information which it is in their power to give, and will be glad to learn the results of any efforts which may be made; and they hope that, by the experience thus gained, they may be able to make more definite suggestions, and to afford more practical help at some future time.

FLAGG.—After the interesting harvest thanksgiving services that were held at Buxton on the 15th, and briefly reported in the Herald, Mr. Creery was invited to re-deliver his excellent morning sermon at Flagg last Sunday. Though the time for preparation was short, our friends at Flagg gathered together a considerable quantity of the fruit of the earth. The ample supply of corn, vegetables, and flowers helped the preacher to bring home to the people the great truths he desired to impress upon them. Notwithstanding the very stormy day, the attendance at the service was very good, and the utmost gratification prevailed at having the seasonable and interesting service.

OLD SAINTS.

'Tis not alone from legend and old story,
'Tis not alone from canvas, dark with time,
That holy saints, crowned with celestial glory,
Smile down upon us from their height sublime.

Not only from church-windows, coloured brightly,
Do their blessed shadows fall across our way;
Ah, not alone in niches gleaming whitely,
With folded hands, do they stand night and day.

Who is there in this world who has not, hidden
Deep in his heart, a picture, clear or faint,
Veiled, sacred to the outer world forbidden,
O'er which he bends and murmurs low, "My Saint!"

A face, perhaps, all written o'er with sorrow,
Whose faded eyes are dim with unshed tears;
And yet they hopefully look toward the morrow,
And far beyond it, into brighter spheres.

A face whence all the sunshine of the morning
And brightness of the noon have passed away;
And yet, where clearly, surely, there is dawning
The wondrous radiance of that perfect day.

That perfect day—when, crowned with heaven's brightness,
Without a pain, or care, or mortal need,
With conqueror's palm, in robe of snowy whiteness,
Our blessed shall stand as very saints indeed.

Yes, God be thanked! though the pure saints of story,
And holy martyrs that the artist paints,
Are veiled in radiance and crowned with glory,
There still are halos for these unknown saints.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1878.

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE AIMS AND MEANS OF JESUS.

II.

FROM the means JESUS employed let us pass to refer to the principles he taught. The spiritual truths that fell from his lips may be comprehended in these three: the Fatherhood of God, the Brotherhood of Man, the Reality of a Future Life. That GOD is the father of the human race is the basis and essence of Christianity. It is the sublimest of truths. It was known to the Aryan and Semitic races of old, who worshipped the Infinite under names that reveal some apprehension of His paternal relations to mankind. But it is only through its consecration in the teaching of JESUS that it is has become the conception which has superseded all others, which has been deepening through the Christian ages, but the height and depth and length and breadth of which we yet only faintly comprehend. The world rejoices in it and is glad. It is as the dawn of morning upon a darkened world. It is the pearl of great price, the unspeakable gift, the everlasting consolation. It harmonises so well with the wants and aspirations of all ages and religions, it has so much to recommend it in the teaching of nature, it receives such re-inforcement from the course of divine guidance over human life, it is such a source of peace and rest, joy and hope amid the shocks and convulsions of the world and amid the changes of individual experience, that surpassingly wonderful as it is, men have clasped the doctrine to their bosoms, and lived and died in its persuasion and trust.

Out of it arises the second grand principle, that all men are brethren, their fraternal relationship resting not upon natural equality, which is a baseless dream, nor upon social equality, which is an impracticable vision, but upon the fact that GOD is the Father of all, who are therefore all alike his children, born with equal spiritual rights, born to promote each other's good in various ways of mutual service, born to attain through varied experience and discipline a destiny of good to themselves and of glory to Him. Here is a solid and satisfactory reason for cultivating a spirit of universal benevolence, and for doing good to all men within reach of our opportunity. That this truth of human brotherhood has exercised a genial and humanising influence over modern civilisation is testified by numberless public movements for obtaining justice to the oppressed, or ministering help to the helpless and the outcast. The civilisation of Greece and Rome was marked by a certain hardness and want of benevolent feeling. Its surface was highly polished, but its heart gave no quick response to the touch of the kindlier sympathies of our nature. Its features were those of a face exquisitely chiselled, but which has a lack of geniality. Its manners were graceful, but characterised by a sad want of moral warmth. In a word, ancient civilisation lacked tenderness. But since the coming of CHRIST civilisation has become more genial, more gentle, more prolific of benefits, more redolent of the heart. And with every century the exercise of benevolence becomes more general, movements and institutions multiply to raise the depressed, to succour the wretched, to shelter the unfortunate, to reclaim the erring, to instruct the ignorant. It is indisputable by any fair-minded man that we owe this fuller development of the humane and kindly sympathies of our nature to the influence of CHRIST's teaching and life.

JESUS taught the reality of a future life. Immortality was not a new truth. He did not disclose it as a novelty. It had been in the mythologies, religions, and philosophies of the world before his time. But he took it out of the region of shadows and brought it into light. He did not argue it. Philosophising was not his habit. There is nothing of the logical method in any of his teaching. His appeal was not to the intellect. With a quiet faith he affirmed the immortality of man. With him it needed no argumentation: nor do the deep things of GOD answer to that test. The light of immortality shone upon his inward eye with a serene brightness. And he lived in it with a quiet confidence, which, in its rest and stillness, is to him that hath it strength beyond all logic, and certainty beyond all demonstration. The wealth of satisfaction with which JESUS has met the yearning of our being for perpetual life is manifested in the historical circumstance that the idea of immortality has prevailed in society not only more extensively, but in a form more operative than at any period anterior to the advent of CHRIST.

These are the three fountal truths with which CHRIST sought to attain his comprehensive aim. How they started a movement which rapidly extended itself throughout the civilised world; how they kindled a fire amongst a people to whom the idea of GOD's universal Fatherhood was obnoxious, and who erected themselves into a sacred caste; how they exerted an influence over polished Greek and haughty Roman in spite of forces to obstruct it; how, notwithstanding the lowly origin of their expounder and representative, they compelled the educated to cast aside prejudices, and elicited the admiration of the intellectual; how they exerted a plastic power among the common people of the Gentile nations, sunk in animal indulgences and debasing superstitions; how, in the first three centuries of the Christian era, they tore up deeply-rooted habits, and brought into subjection appetites and desires, affections and ambitions, by which men are wont to be governed; how, in that period, they grasped the very will of humanity, and controlled it as with the hand of God; how, after that period, they began to be overloaded with follies, and corrupted with absurdities, and burdened with crimes; how, nevertheless, they have not passed away nor spent their strength, but still live as permanent and imperishable powers: all this is a thrice-told tale. But there is one significant fact, giving promise of their triumph, to which sufficient attention has perhaps not been paid, and to which we would advert. It is the fact that they have won their greatest success amongst those races where intelligence has been most developed, and intellect has been most active. Where civilisation has been most advanced, there they have made way. Where the mind of man has been widest awake, there they have reached their most potent sway. No race under heaven has exhibited the mental activity and the restless energy of the Anglo-Saxons; and it is a significant fact that, not amongst theorists and dreamers, but amongst the Anglo-Saxons, amongst practical men of action, amongst men whose intellects have become strong from constant and healthful exercise, the power of these truths and of CHRIST's life has reached its highest vitality, notwithstanding constant and severe investigation. And we look upon it as full of hope for the fulfilment of CHRIST's aim. Those who now most firmly hold these truths are the Anglo-Saxons, with their active intellect, their strong will, their enterprising spirit. And when we see that this restless family is multiplying itself in America, in Australasia, in India, in China, in Japan, in Africa, that it is opening up highways into the very heart of the Old World, that its moral influence is extending beyond calculation, that it is supreme in intellectual and commercial power among the several races of mankind—we see in these circumstances providential movements concurring to favour the grand conception of JESUS of a universal conquest, when his spiritual kingdom shall be established, and when to him every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess, to the glory of GOD the Father.

THE PROTESTANTEN VEREIN AT HILDESHEIM.

THE Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has appointed the Rev. A. Chalmers, of Cambridge, as delegate to the forthcoming annual meetings of the German Protestanten Verein. These are to be held at Hildesheim, in the province of Hanover, and in view of the present religious and social troubles in Germany, are expected to be of unusual interest and importance. The following is an outline of the proceedings:—Tuesday, October 8, meeting of committee and social gathering; Wednesday, meeting of delegates, conference and debate on "Church Freedom and Congregational Rights," divine service, and in the evening the reception of the guests and foreign delegates in the concert hall of the Assembly Rooms; Thursday, divine service, second conference, and debate on (1) "Religion in Relation to the Life of the People," and (2) "The Sunday Question," and collation in the large hall of the Assembly Rooms; Friday, excursion of the delegates and their friends to Goslar. The two special preachers will be Professor Dr. Pfeleiderer, of Berlin, and Pastor Klapp, the travelling lecturer of the Verein.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. Arthur H. Moxon, of 12, Tavistock-street, has just published in his series of "Popular Novels" (crown 8vo., 2s.) a new and revised edition of The Master of Riverswood, by Mrs. Arthur Lewis.

A daily Protestant paper is projected in France at the price of a sou a day. It will be thoroughly Republican in tone. While supplying general news, it will be the special organ of the Protestant movement. The general direction and editorship will, says the prospectus, be in the hands of converts who have renounced Romanism and formally joined the Protestant ranks. The dogmatic and ecclesiastical questions now rife in the Protestant churches of France will not be touched upon. In regard to Church matters, its business will be to say to proselytes, go to the nearest church and get your families inscribed on the register as Protestants; the paper will wage war on Clericalism and Materialism. A capital of 130,000f. has been raised, but it is not proposed to begin the paper till nearly double that sum is forthcoming. The proposed name is Le Signal. The prospectus is signed by Leon Pilatte, editor of the Eglise Libre; by MM. Pillon and Remouvier, the editors of La Critique Philosophique, and by Eugène Réveillaud, who is to be the editor.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

A New Supplemental Charter having been granted to the University a few months since, on the joint application of the Senate and of Convocation, empowering the Senate to admit woman to graduate in its several faculties (Arts, Science, Law, Medicine, and Music), on such conditions as the Senate, with the concurrence of the Home Secretary, should deem expedient, the Senate lost no time in passing a resolution which made all the existing regulations, relating not only to Graduation, but also to the various honours and rewards granted at the several examinations, open to female as well as to the male candidates. This resolution having been now approved by the Home Secretary, female candidates will be admitted forthwith to the matriculation examination; and all such as have already passed the General Examination for Women will be considered as having matriculated, and will be admissible (after the required interval) to the First Degree Examination in either of the Faculties. Further, with a view to the special encouragement of female candidates desiring to go through a regular academical course, the Trustees of the Gilchrist Educational Trust have instituted two exhibitions, one of £30, the other of £20, per annum, tenable for two years, to the female candidates who pass highest in the Honours Division at the Matriculation Examination; and two exhibitions, one of £40, the other of £30 per annum, tenable for two years, to the female candidates who pass highest at the First B.A. Examination (provided that they obtain in the first case two-thirds, and in the second three fifths, of the total number of marks), to assist them in pursuing their studies at some collegiate institution approved by the Trustees; with the further reward of a gold medal of the value of £20 (or of a book prize of the same value) to the female candidate who passes highest at the Second B.A. Examination, if she obtains not less than two-thirds of the total number of marks. These rewards are quite independent of those granted by the University, and may be held in conjunction with them. Further particulars may be obtained by application to the Registrar of the University, London, W.

SERMONS AT THE SEASIDE.

REV. W. H. CHANNING ON PRAYER.

WE may consider ourselves very fortunate if when away for the benefit of our bodies we also receive refreshment for our souls. Having had the pleasure of listening two or three times to the Rev. W. H. Channing during his invaluable services at Hastings, I have endeavoured to jot down some recollections of a sermon at one of these on "The Transforming Influence of Prayer."

The minister commended to our most serious attention the very great importance of prayer. He spoke of the opinions current at the present day, among a large and increasing section of the community, on this subject, and classified these adverse opinions under three headings:—

1. Those who say if God is good, He will give us all we need without prayer.
2. Those who say God is so wise that he knows what we need better than we do; therefore it is folly to pray.
3. Those who say that we cannot alter anything if we do pray.

This last the preacher said was the central question of the whole, and would give the key to all he had to say. He acknowledged that we by prayer could not alter God's decrees, "but," said he "prayer alters our relations to God." Prayer is the central meeting point between God and man. The man who strives really to be at one with God in prayer is thus lifted above himself, and could look down from that height and see himself as he really is. It makes all the littleness and meanness of life vanish. Prayer is the only means of gaining true strength, calmness, peace. The man who prays is an immeasurably superior man to the man who does not pray. At the same time that prayer humbles the man and takes him out of self, it gives him true nobleness and dignity; it takes from him all selfishness. Selfishness is the great evil of the world; the one central cause of all other evil. If a man by prayer loses himself in oneness with God, he must hereby forego all self-will, and in so doing becomes more and more what God intends him to be. The man who is one with God has lost self-love, has lost fear, trusts wholly in God, becomes a new creature, is regenerated. The preacher had no hesitation in saying it was his belief that if there could be formed a community of really praying people, that community would transform the world. We should then have heaven on earth. Man would lose himself, his prejudices, selfishness; evil would vanish; men would become like little children, kind, loving, and good, and each would strive not for himself but for the good of others. By prayer the preacher did not mean the utterance of mere words, but the giving up of our will to be directed by the will of God; the losing ourselves in God.

E. C.

On Sunday evening last Mr. Channing preached the last of a series of discourses in the Unitarian Church at Hastings, from Ephe. iii., 14-19, which is fully reported in the St. Leonard Times.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

"SORRY IS NOT 'NUFF."

"ALLAN? Where is Allan?"

A moment ago he was playing with his little cart in the yard, hauling dirt to the currant-bushes. I cannot tell how many cartfuls he carried. He was as busy as a little man. But Allan was gone; there is his cart.

"Allan! Allan!"

"I'se here," at last said a small voice from the back parlour.

"What are you there for?" asked his mother, opening the door and looking in.

Allan did not answer at first. He was standing in the corner with a very sober look on his face. "Come out to your little cart," said his mother; "it is waiting for another run."

"I'se not been here long 'nuff," said the little boy.

"What are you here for at all?" asked his mother.

"I punishing my ownself. I picked some green currants, and they went into my mouth," said Allan.

"Oh, when mother told you not to! Green currants, will make my little boy sick," said his mother in a sorry tone.

"You needn't punish me," said Allan; "I punish my ownself."

His mother often put him in the back parlour alone when he had been a naughty boy; and, you see he took the same way himself.

"Are you not sorry for disobeying mother?" she asked Allan.

"I sorry, but sorry is not 'nuff. I punish me. I stay here a good while and thinks."

Is not Allan right? Sorry, if it is only sorry, is not enough. How often children say they are sorry, and yet go and do the same thing again! That is a very short, shallow sorrow. Allan felt this; so he was for making serious work of it.—Christian Register.

CURIOSITIES.

A lawyer once asked the late Judge Pickens, of Alabama, to charge the jury that "it is better that ninety and nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be punished." "Yes," said the witty judge, "I will give that charge; but in the opinion of the court, the ninety and nine guilty men have already escaped in this county."

NO "DEVIL" ON THE "NIGHT SHIFT."—One evening, when visiting the Dundee Advertiser office with some strangers, Mr. Gilfillan got heartily merry over an amusing incident. In the absence of the entire literary staff he was shown into the editor's room by an occasional contributor. On seeing the system of electric bells arranged on the wall at the back of the editor's chair he asked an explanation, and finding that the editor could by a touch of his finger summon into his room all or any of the heads of departments from all parts of the establishment, above or below, Mr. Gilfillan exclaimed with a pass of his hand—"The Editor here can therefore call devils from the vasty deep or draw an angel down." The guide having touched the devil's bell several times without that personage entering appearance, Mr. Gilfillan said, "The devil must surely be from home or taking a nap." The guide having again touched the bell, a sedate compositor entered and informed the astonished visitors that there were no devils there after six o'clock. The amusement of the visitors was still more heightened when on being asked for the reason, the grave compositor explained, "By Act of Parliament, no devil is allowed to work on the night shift, or after six o'clock at night." The idea of the devil being under Act of Parliament caused roars of laughter.

THE NOTTINGHAM DEBATE.

THEISM AND ATHEISM.

MR. ARMSTRONG: Mr. Bradlaugh has just been rebuking me for my laxness with respect to definitions, and has come down upon me with a great authority. Now, it is a habit of mine not to think much of authorities as authorities, but rather of the value of what they say. Mr. Bradlaugh came down upon me with Max Müller, and read a sentence in reference to the value of definitions, to the effect that they were wonderful things for preventing and avoiding controversies and disputes. Is it, I ask, Mr. Bradlaugh's experience that the number of definitions given from public platforms in his presence has tended to less controversy or to more? Has there been more or less talk with all these definitions, than there would have been without them? I fancied that Mr. Bradlaugh's career had been one very much connected with controversies, and that the definitions which he has been accustomed to give have not had the effect of leaving him in peace from controversy. I am perfectly amazed at Mr. Bradlaugh's memory, at the wonderful manner in which he manages to remember, with tolerable accuracy, what I have said, and to get down as he does the chief points of my speeches. I have, unfortunately, a miserable memory, although I have an excellent short-hand which I can write, but which I cannot generally read. (Laughter.) Trusting, however, to those two guides, I must endeavour to reply. Mr. Bradlaugh unintentionally misrepresented me when he alleged that I had said that the voice of God, called conscience, was not always clear. I did not say that that voice was not always clear—what I said was that it was not always clearly heard. I illustrated this by the simile of the bell, the sound of which was perfectly clear of itself, but which was not heard by those who would not heed. Mr. Bradlaugh also accused me of going in for the authority of majorities, because I quoted a number of names and said that I might quote many more who concurred in the belief in Deity grounded upon the sort of experience which I said that I had myself enjoyed. Now, the opinions of the majority have no authority—at least they go for what they are worth, but are not a binding or an absolute authority. But the experience of a majority, or of a minority, or of a single individual, has authority. The experience of a single man is a fact, and all the rest of the world not having had that experience, or thinking that they have not had it, does not make it less the fact. Therefore, if you have half-a-dozen men upon whose words you can rely, who say that they have had a certain experience, because Mr. Bradlaugh says he has not had such experience, that makes it no less the fact. Now I approach that awful question which stares in the face of the Theist—and which often seems to stare most cruelly—this question of the evil in the world. It is a question upon which the greatest intellects of mankind have broken themselves, one which has never been really explained or made clear, either by the Theist or the Atheist, but which is probably beyond the solution of the human faculties. All that we can do is to fringe the edge of the mystery, and to see whether the best feelings within us seem to guide us to anything approaching a solution. Do you think that these things of which Mr. Bradlaugh has spoken do not touch me as they touch him? Look, say, at the poor child born in misery, and living in suffering; it would absolutely break my heart if I thought that this could be the end of all. I believe that it would weigh me down so that I could not stand upon a public platform, or perform the ordinary business of life, if I believed that there were beings in the world of whom misery and sin were the beginning and the end. But I thank God that I am enabled to maintain my reason upon its seat, and my trust intact. I know, or I think I know, God as a friend. If he be a friend to me, shall he not be a friend to all? If I know by my own experience his wondrous loving kindness, can I not trust him for all the rest of the world, through all the ages of eternity? You may see a son who shall be familiar with his father's kindness, who shall always be kindly treated by his father; and there shall be a great warm love between them. But the child sees certain actions on the part of his father which he cannot explain. He beholds suffering apparently brought by his father upon others, and is, perhaps, inclined to rebel against his father's authority. But which is the truest child—the child who, having himself experienced his father's love, says: "Well, this is strange, it is a mystery; I would it were not so, but I know that my father is good, and will bring some good out of this which could not have been obtained otherwise;" or the child who says: "All my experience of my father's goodness shall go to the winds. I see a problem which I cannot explain, and I will, therefore, throw up my trust, rebel against the paternal goodness, and believe in my father's love no more!" It would be base in such of you as may be Atheists to rest in such a trust, since you do not know the love of God; but were you touched with that love, this trust would come to you. It would come to you in your best and truest moments, the moments when you feel that you are most akin with all that is good and holy, and when you feel, as it were, lifted above what is base. This problem of the evil in the world, I have said, surpasses the faculties of humanity to solve, either from the platform of the Theist, the Atheist, or the Pantheist. I ask you what you conceive to be the highest good to humanity? Is not the highest good, virtue? You say, it may be, happiness is better. Take the Huguenot. One way, with him, led to happiness, the other to destruction. Was the choice he made the better or the worse? You say the better. Then you hold that virtue is better than happiness. With regard to virtue, imagine, if you can, a world free from every sort of suffering, from every sort of temptation, every sort of trial, what a very nice world to live in, but what very poor creatures we should all be! Where would be virtue, where valour, where greatness, where nobility, where would be all those high functions which call forth our reverence, and make us look up from men to the man of God? The world is not made of sugar-plums. I, for my own part, cannot conceive how virtue, the highest good which we can conceive, could possibly come about in human character unless human character had evil against which it had to contend. (Applause.) If you can tell me how we could have a world in which men should be great, and good, and chivalrous, and possess all such qualities as raise feelings of reverence in our bosoms, where nevertheless all should be smooth and easy, you will have told me of something which, I think, has never been told to any human being. (Applause.)

Mr. BRADLAUGH: A large number of definitions lead to more controversy or to less. If the definitions are offered to the minds of people well educated, and thoroughly understanding them—to much less controversy and to more accuracy; and when they are offered to people who are yet ignorant, and have yet to understand them, then they lead to more controversy, but even there, also, to more accuracy. I am asked—Can you tell me how to make a world? I cannot. Do you intend to base your conclusions on my ignorance? If there be an onus, it lies on you, not on me. It is your business to show that the maker you say ought to be adored, has made the world as good as it can be. It is not my business at all to enter upon world-making. Then I am not sure—while I am quite ready to be set right upon a verbal inaccuracy—I am not sure there is very much distinction between the voice not being heard and not being clearly heard. It is said to be the voice of God that speaks; but he made the deafness or otherwise of the person to whom he speaks, or he is not the creator, preserver, "the dearest friend in whom I trust, on whom I rely." These are Mr. Armstrong's words. If God cannot prevent the deafness, then the reliance is misplaced; if he made the deafness, it is of no use that he is talking plainly; if he has made the person too deaf to hear his voice, then the voice is a mockery. Then I had it put to me that the opinions of majorities were not binding as authority; they only had their value as expressions of opinion, but that the experiences of individuals are binding. What does that mean? Is there such a certitude in consciousness that there can be no mistake in experience? What do you mean? When you have a notion you have had an experience, and I have a notion you have not had it? Supposing, for example, a man says, "I have experience of a room which raced with the Great Northern train to London; it was an ordinary room, with chairs and tables in it, and none of them were upset, and it managed to run a dead heat with the Great Northern express." You would say, "My good man, if you are speaking seriously you are a lunatic." "No," he would say, "that is my experience." Mr. Armstrong says that that experience deserves weight. I submit not unless you have this—that the experience must be of facts coming within the possible range of other people's experience; and must be experience which is testable by other people's experience, with an ability on the part of the person relating to clearly explain his experience, and that each phenomenon he vouches to you to be the subject possible of criticism on examination by yourself, and that no experience which is perfectly abnormal, and which is against yours, has any weight whatever with you, or ought to have, except, perhaps, as deserving examination. When it possibly can be made part of your experience, yes; when it admittedly cannot be made part of your experience, no. A man with several glasses of whisky sees six chandeliers in this room; that is his experience, not mine. I do not refuse to see; I cannot see more than three. Mr. Armstrong says the problem of evil never has been made clear by Atheist or Theist. There is no burden on us to make it clear. The burden is upon the person who considers he has an all-powerful friend of loving kindness, to show how that evil exists in connection with his statement that that friend could prevent it. If he will not prevent it, he is not of that loving kindness which is pretended. Mr. Armstrong says—"My dear friend is kind to me, shall I not believe that he is kind to the little lad who is starving?" What, kind to the lad whom he leaves unsheltered and ill-clad in winter, whose mother is drunken because the place is foul, whose father has been committed to gaol? Where is the evidence to that lad of God's loving kindness to him? God, who stands by whilst the little child steals something; God, who sets the policeman to catch him, knowing he will go amongst other criminals, where he will become the more corrupted; God, who tells him from the Bench, through the mouth of the justice, that he has given way to the temptation of the devil, when it is the very God has been the almighty devil. (Applause.) That may be a reason for Mr. Armstrong adoring his friend, but it is no reason for this poor boy to adore. "Ah," Mr. Armstrong says, "my reason for homage is this: I should be dissatisfied if this were going to last for ever, or if this were to be the whole of it; that it is so bad I should be in anguish were there no recompense." You condemn it if it is to continue. How can you worship the being who allows that even temporarily which your reason condemns? Has he marked his right to be adored as God by the little girl who is born of a shame-marked mother in the shadow of the workhouse walls, who did not select the womb from which she should come, and whose career, consequent on her birth, is one of shame and perhaps crime too? Ah! that friend you love, how his love is evidenced to that little girl is yet to be made clear to me. Then comes another problem of thought which I am not sure I shall deal fairly with. Is the highest good virtue or happiness? But the highest happiness is virtue. That act is virtuous which tends to the greatest happiness of the greatest number, and which inflicts the least injury on any—that which does not so result in this is vice. When you put happiness and virtue as being utterly distinguished, in your mind they may be so, but not in my mind. You have confused the definition of morality which I gave on the first opening; you have, without explaining it, substituted another in lieu of it. You would be right to say my definition is wrong, and give another definition, but you have no right to ignore my definition and use my word in precisely the opposite sense to that in which I used it. A very few words now will determine this question for this evening, and I will ask you to remember the position in which we are here. I am Atheist, my friend is Theist. He has told you practically that the word "God" is incapable of exact definition, and if this is so, then it is incapable of exact belief. If it is incapable of exact definition, it is incapable of exact thought. If thought is confused you may have prostration of the intellect, and this is all you can have. Our friend says that he prays and that his prayer is answered daily, but he forgot the millions of prayers to whom God is deaf. In his peaceful mountains and lakes, Vesuvius and Lake Michigan escaped him. The fishers in Torre del Grecco, they on whom the lava stream came down in the night, had their lips framed no cry for mercy? Did not some of those hundreds who were carried to death on the tide of the muddy Thames, did they not call out in their despair? and yet he was deaf to them. He listened to you, but it is of those to whom he did not listen of whom I have to speak. If he listens to you and not to them, he is a respecter of persons. He may be one for you to render homage, but not for me. First, then, the question is, "Is it reasonable to worship God?"—and the word "worship" has been left indistinctly defined. I defy anyone who has listened to Mr. Armstrong to understand how much or how little he would exclude or include in worship. I made it clear how much I would include. Our friend has said nothing whatever relating to the subject with which we have had to deal. His word "God" has been left utterly undefined; the words "virtue" and "happiness," and the words "right" and "wrong," are left equally unexplained; the questions I put to him of cause, and intelligence have been left as though they were not spoken. I do not make this a reproach to him, because I know it is the difficulty of the subject with which he has to deal. The moment you tell people what you mean, that moment you shiver the Venetian glass which contains the liquor that is not to be touched. I plead under great difficulty. I plead for opinions that have been made unpopular; I appeal for persons who in the mouths of their antagonists often have associated with them all that is vicious. It is true that Mr. Armstrong has no such reproach. He says that God will only try me by that judgment of my own reason, and he makes my standard higher than God's on the judgment day. God made Bruno; do you mean that Bruno's heresy ranks as high as faith, and that Bruno at the judgment will stand amongst the saints? This may be high humanity, but it is no part of theology. Our friend can only put it that because in his own goodness he makes an altar where he can worship, and a church where he would make a God kind and loving as himself, and that as he is ready to bless his fellows, so must his God be; but he has shown no God for me to worship, and he has made out no reasonableness to worship God except for himself, to whom, he says, God is kind.—Alas! that so many know nothing of his kindness. (Applause.)

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

BAPTISM AND RELIGIOUS REVIVALS.

THE annual meeting of this Assembly was held at Dover on Monday and Tuesday the 16th and 17th September. Among those present were the Revs. John Howard, A. Brinkworth, John Marten, J. C. Means, John Felstead, John Ellis, Thos. Rix, and Thos. B. W. Briggs; H. P. Buckler, Esq., and Messrs. J. E. Mace, jun., B. A. Igglesden, John Agate, James Gilfillan, John Browne, Edward Philpott, A. Wilson, Miss Chatfield (Ryde), Miss Squier, Mrs. G. W. Chitty, Miss Briggs, Mrs. Igglesden, Miss Pound, Miss Marten, &c.

On Monday evening a powerful and eloquent sermon on "Life and Light," founded upon John i. 4, was preached by the Rev. John Felstead, of Trowbridge, successor to the late Rev. S. Martin. The devotional exercises were taken by the Rev. John Ellis, of Portsmouth.

On Tuesday morning business commenced at ten o'clock, after prayer by the Rev. J. Howard, of Long Sutton. A paper was read by the Rev. J. Ellis, on the "Early Corruptions of the Rite of Baptism in the Christian Church, during the first Ten Centuries." It was replete with historical information, pointing out the fidelity of our forefathers to the apostolic practice of believers—baptism—showing the position held by the General Baptists as pioneers of religious liberty during the first thousand years of the Christian era. He traced the dogma of Baptismal regeneration to North Africa in the middle of the third century, and the practice of infant baptism, which sprung out of it, and its extension through the influence of Augustine. He spoke of Constantine, who deferred his baptism to the latest possible time in order that all his sins might be washed away at once; who converted Christianity into a State machine, put down religious controversy by force, set up the idol uniformity, and persecuted all who would not fall down before it. The General Baptists resisted the corruptions of the age, among whom he mentioned the Novatians, the Donatists, the Pelagians, and others, who were true Protestants long before the Reformation. He said that men should have been found in those dark days to defend freedom of thought and liberty of action was a credit to humanity—and he felt proud of their relationship.

Discussion by the brethren followed for some time, when the second paper was read by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, who had chosen the subject of "Religious Revivals." This paper referred to the low condition of religious life in our General Baptist churches; it pointed out that the revival of religious life depended upon the use of means suited to the time, place, and conditions of the several churches. Earnestness, activity, prayer, with entire consecration on our part to Christian work were required. It was ably and impressively delivered, and at the close one of the brethren requested that all would join in singing the hymn, "O Spirit of the living God," as the most suitable response thereto. At two o'clock the company adjourned to Fuh's London Hotel, where they sat down to an excellent dinner. Provision was generously made for all the ministers by Mr. Archibald Wilson, to whom a hearty vote of thanks was given on the proposition of the Rev. J. Marten, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Means, of London. Several speeches, with some reminiscences of the past, were given by several veterans of the Assembly, after which the friends went down to the Admiralty Pier, The Castle, Shakespeare's Cliff, with other of the many points of interest here.

In the evening, at six o'clock, a good number of friends partook of tea in the chapel. This was followed by a special service, in which the newly-appointed messenger of the Assembly, the Rev. T. B. W. Briggs, of Dover, was ordained to the important work belonging to that office. Scripture was read by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth. General prayer was offered by the Rev. T. Rix. The duties of the office were stated by the Rev. J. C. Means, to which the Rev. T. B. W. Briggs responded, formally accepting the office in a warm-hearted address.

The ordination prayer was offered by the Rev. John Howard, of Long Sutton, during which, according to ancient custom, the two messengers, the Revs. J. C. Means and John Marten, placed their hands upon the head of their newly-appointed brother, and after another hymn the benediction was pronounced.

Immediately afterwards a communion service was held. A hymn was sung; the Rev. John Ellis read the Scripture; the Rev. J. C. Means gave the address; the Rev. T. B. W. Briggs broke the bread and poured out the wine, which was handed round by deacons, and partaken of by a large and devout assembly, many of whom partook for the first time. Another hymn was sung, a parting prayer was offered, and the assembly separated after kindly adieus.

A more delightful meeting has never been held. Not one unkind expression, not one uncharitable remark, characterised any part of the proceedings. Every one felt that it was good to be there, and the language of all might have been well expressed in the words of Scott—

When shall our happy eyes behold
Thy people fashion'd in thy mould,
And charity our lineage prove Derived from thee, 'O God of Love.'

DUKINFIELD OLD CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL.

THE annual parents' party of this old-established and excellent school took place on Saturday evening, the 21st inst., in the large room of the school. At half-past five, over 200 parents and friends partook of a substantial tea.

At the meeting afterwards there was a large attendance, especially of mothers. On the platform, besides the chairman, the Rev. G. H. Vance, we noticed Mr. M. Wild (one of the three directors of the school), the Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A., F. H. Jones, B.A., J. K. Smith, N. Green, and J. G. Slater.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, after welcoming the parents and friends, said parents, teachers, and directors had a common bond of interest—the children who attended the school; and the purpose of these annual gatherings seemed to him to be how were they to help each other in doing their duty to the children committed to their charge? The character of that school had changed considerably from what it was at the beginning of its career. Since then good elementary schools had become commoner, and parents were now compelled to send their children to the day schools. It was no longer necessary for them to pay so much attention to secular instruction in the Sunday school. We now want to pay more regard to the moral and religious training of children, and he wished in a very few words to tell them how they could help in this. The speakers who were to follow would doubtless have something to say on that point, but he wished to refer briefly to one or two ways by which they were going to attempt to interest children and parents in the work of this school. They had drawn up an examination scheme for work to be done in the school during the next three months. There would be for the eldest scholars prizes offered for the best essays, or, if that be too grand a word, for the best papers on the life and character and lessons to be drawn from the story of Joseph. For scholars who were not quite old enough to write an account of Joseph's life they were going to offer prizes for a good verbal account of the same story; and for the youngest of all there would be repetitions of hymns and verses out of the Old and New Testaments. Now parents could help by taking an interest in all this, and by encouraging girls and boys to employ their long winter evenings in writing papers or in learning their repetitions. The next thing is that a night school for lads and young men between the ages of 14 and 22 is to be held. A night school also for girls and young women will be opened in the Astley-street schoolroom, by Miss Graham, a certificated mistress. And lastly, a Thursday evening class for dress-making and cutting-out and making of clothing will shortly be begun.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON, after referring to the pleasing contrast the platform presented to what it was a year ago when not a single minister who had been invited had put in an appearance, took up the question of examinations in Sunday schools, with special reference to the scheme of the Manchester District Association. Out of 200 candidates sent in for examination last year, the school in Dukinfield only sent in five. That must have arisen either from want of ability or from disinclination. That it was not the first he was certain, from the fact that all the candidates from the Dukinfield school passed in honours, and the report of their lamented friend Fred. Ashton, who was the examiner, spoke in the highest praise of the papers of those five candidates. One of the teachers—Mr. John Richards—at a meeting at Gee Cross about a year ago made one of the best speeches he ever listened to on that occasion, but unfortunately it was on the wrong side. In Gee Cross, since they began the examinations, they had had better work from teachers and scholars, and increased interest in the progress of the school. He quite agreed with those who said that our work is not to make the scholars sharp and clever, but to elevate the spirit and tone of their lives. He believed that no teacher, however learned, could do the right work unless he had the spirit of love in his heart. A teacher with some culture but the right spirit might be a blessing to his scholars. But would such a teacher be the less qualified if he had more knowledge and greater skill in imparting it? We are sometimes told we must go in for either making our scholars learned or good. But the best teacher will aim and succeed in both. Some object to prizes and competitions in the Sunday school on the ground that there should be such a desire for knowledge that stimulus is unnecessary. But what man or woman is there who would not like to excel? It is a legitimate passion, and ought to be judiciously gratified. He did not believe that prizes encouraged jealousy between those who do and those who do not succeed in obtaining them. If they were right-minded and generous in character, they could only admire the man who beats us in the college examination. No boy or girl is fit for life who cannot afford to be beaten. Then the examinations at Gee Cross had resulted in better and more systematic teaching. He therefore hoped that Dukinfield school would not only enter with spirit into the examination scheme mentioned by the chairman, but would in future send forward a larger number of candidates to the Manchester examinations.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, B.A., spoke as follows: When I was a bachelor I thought I would beautify my solitary sitting-room by having some flowers. I procured two beautiful fuchsias and placed them in my window, and paid them great attention, and watered them regularly. But somehow they drooped and died, and I took my once beautiful flowers and placed them in the back garden. They had been lying there some time, and I had nearly forgotten all about them, when one day I noticed that they had begun again to flower, and by and by they hung with beautiful flowers. How was it that with all my care I could not keep them alive, and when they were left to the exposure of the weather they prospered? Just this: In the back garden they had plenty of sunshine, but in my sitting-room window they had none. Men and women, when little children will die without sunshine, so the soul requires the sunshine of God's love if it is to be healthy and strong. I see about 100 mothers before me: they represent 100 households: allowing three children to each family, and with the fathers who were not present, that gave 500 souls. If they were all at chapel tomorrow, what a cheering sight it would be. You are hearing on all sides the complaint from men and women that the pressure of life is getting so heavy that they have never a quiet moment for thought. The cares of family life are so wearying—it is work, work for the fathers, and scrub, scrub for the mothers—that no quiet can be got. Well, now, there is a quiet retreat open for you every Sunday, where you can go in and listen to the reading of the Bible and the soothing voice of the organ, where there is peace and calmness—and yet how few avail themselves of it. When we ministers invite you to come to chapel you think we are asking you to come and hear us preach. No, no, it is not that. But we believe if you will come the holy influence that will bear in upon you will strengthen you for your week's work.

Mr. INGHAM, a former scholar of the school, but now settled in Canada, said: I am an entire stranger to most of you, but not to this school. Thirty-eight years ago I can remember coming, a little orphan boy, in my clean pinafore, and getting my name entered in the books by that good man John Whittaker. (Applause.) Whatever success I have had in life I owe to the lessons in truthfulness, honesty, and industry which I received, and I am sure the memory of the hours I spent here, and the associations of my childhood, have been a great help to me, and I feel that I cannot go back to my distant home without adding my testimony to the value of Sunday-school instruction.

During the evening there was some very good singing by the chapel choir, and songs by Mrs. Rooke and Miss Lomas, Mr. Jno. Moorhouse, Mr. Bentley, and Mr. Shirley. Mr. John Ogden presided at the piano. Before closing the report we should like to say that this large and useful school is deserving of better and more commodious premises. The present large room is at the top of a three-storeyed building, access to which is reached by a narrow staircase. The ceiling is far too low for purposes of ventilation. We hope the day is not far off when our Dukinfield friends may see their way to build a schoolroom as elegant as the chapel and better adapted to their requirements.

NEWS OF OUR CHURCHES

THE REV. ROBT. COLLYER.

VERY many friends in Manchester and neighbourhood have regretted that the Rev. Robert Collyer did not find it possible to visit this part of the country. Mr. Collyer desires that the following letter, addressed to one of us, should be laid before our readers:—

Leeds, September 20th, 1878.

I got your note yesterday asking me to come to Manchester. Will you let me say through the Herald that the only touch of heart-ache I have in me as I turn my face homeward, lies in the fact that I have not been able to come into Lancashire as I intended, to see a host of old friends, and preach in many churches to which I was invited, to some of which also I made a tentative promise, which must stay tentative, as I sail to-morrow. One does not like to tell these things! "out of meet'n," still it may stand for a slight excuse for this failure for lack of a reason, that I have preached every Sunday since I came to England, save one, when I was in France, and more week days than I would like my people to know about, who sent me here to rest. I have been very glad to do this, and to see so many I never hoped to see in this world, and shall think of it all when I get into harness again with exceeding joy, and believe that you and many others will accept the will for the deed and give me your blessing where I deserve your ban perhaps, for not doing what, after all, as things lay with me, was not possible.—Yours indeed,

ROBERT COLLYER.

The Yorkshireman has the following interesting paragraph: "Here is a 'striking' incident.. The Rev. Robert Collyer, pastor of the Unity Church, Chicago, is now on a visit to the home of his boyhood. Once a poor lad, working in the blacksmith's shop at Ilkley, he has risen to be one of the most celebrated men of his profession in America. He is a fine type of a Yorkshireman—as brother Jonathan would term it he is 'clear grit,' which, by the by, is the title of a lecture with which the rev. gentleman has been delighting the hardy sons of toil employed on the Washburn Valley Waterworks, and the natives of Pudsey, Ilkley, and Holbeck. Hundreds of Mr. Collyer's American admirers have visited Ilkley for the purpose of having a peep at the old smithy in which Mr. Collyer worked, and some of them went so far in manifesting their admiration for the original-minded, outspoken, eloquent man, as to purchase the anvil at which he worked as a young man, to carry it back with them to Chicago, and to set it up in the vestibule of his church, as a memento of what their pastor had sprung from. Queer folks these Americans. Mr. Collyer has his admirers here as well as across the water, however. One of them created quite a sensation the other Sunday, when the rev. gentleman preached at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. Whilst the swell congregation was dispersing, and as Mr. Collyer was also leaving the church to take his seat in the carriage which one of his well-to-do hearers had sent to convey him thence, a rough-looking working man accosted the preacher and said, 'Tha dusen't know me, Bob, dus ta?' 'No, I think not,' said Mr. Collyer, as with a curious twinkle of his eye he surveyed the man. 'Why, am Joe Wright 'at used to strike for thee.' Wasn't there a shaking of hands by these two old smithy friends? Mr. Collyer was to be the guest of the Mayor (Mr. Carbutt) that day, but having met Joe he begged to be excused, and accompanied his old fellow-workman to his home."

NOTICE.—Our friends would oblige if they would kindly send their news paragraphs so as to arrive never later than Wednesday morning, otherwise we are compelled to cut them down.

"THE THEOLOGICAL MOVEMENT IN SCOTLAND." An article on this subject, by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of Liverpool, appears in the September number of the Unitarian Review of Boston, United States.

BIRMINGHAM: FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.—The seventeenth anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, September 22nd, by special musical services. Sermons were preached in the morning by Mr. G. R. Twinn, in the afternoon by the Rev. Chas. Leach, and in the evening by Councillor Sam. Edwards. Though an extremely wet day, the congregations were large: total amount of offertories, £13. 12s. 3¼d.—The following evening there was a public tea meeting, when the annual report was read, showing 392 scholars in the schools, and 40 teachers to instruct them. Total amount saved by boys, £233. 3s. 1d.; by girls, £74. 8s. The library is increasingly useful. The congregation has suffered some few losses by death and removals, but the gain of new members exceeds the loss. A Dorcas society has been established; two poor boxes placed at the church entrances, with good results; and two members of the church engaged as visitors for the large district around the schools. Sixty-eight dispensary tickets have been supplied for the sick, and five eye hospital tickets for deserving cases. The total of offertories for the year is £70. 10s., exclusive of all grants for the relief fund.

CAMBRIDGE.—During last term a series of special sermons were given by the Rev. A. Chalmers on some distinctive points of Unitarian theology. The subjects were God, the Bible, Salvation, and the Story of the Fall, and the discourses awakened much interest and inquiry.—In August the first congregational excursion took place. The Rev. A. Chalmers and nearly all the members went by Great Northern rail to Royston, where they were hospitably received by the Rev. R. Shaen. The afternoon was spent in visiting the heath, Royston Cave, and other places of interest. Mr. Shaen threw open his grounds to the visitors, and kindly provided a most liberal supply of fruit for tea. The party returned to Cambridge about nine o'clock, highly delighted with their outing.—On the Sunday after William Cullen Bryant's funeral, Mr. Chalmers preached a most appropriate discourse, showing how through his long life the great poet had remained faithful to liberal Christian principles, and tracing their influence on his verse.—On September 8th, Professor Upton preached here the most eloquent among the many eloquent sermons he has given us. A strong wish was expressed by all that it might be printed.—On September 15th, Mr. Chalmers gave a very able and instructive discourse on Scotch Ecclesiasticism; and last Sunday, September 22nd, he preached a most appropriate sermon on the loss of the Princess Alice.—Special courses of sermons are being arranged for the October term; and it is in contemplation to considerably improve the musical part of the services.—The church here has lost during the summer two of its most active members, Mr. Burton, who has removed to London, and Mr. Stoddart, B.A., who has accepted the pulpit of Stockton. The latter especially has been most unwearied in his endeavours to promote the cause of liberal Christianity in Cambridge, and has lost no opportunity of spreading its principles. It is almost an unprecedented circumstance that this young congregation should have developed six lay preachers. Two of these—the Revs. H. T. Basford and W. Stoddart—are now in the regular ministry, and two others—Messrs. W. Clarke, B.A., and Herbert Burrows—are now well known all over the Eastern Counties and in other parts of England.

DENTON.—On Sunday last the annual sermons were preached, that in the afternoon by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., and that in the evening by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A. The congregations were good on both occasions. The choir at Gorton gave their services in the afternoon, and that at Gee Cross in the evening. The collections and donations amounted to £10. 7s. 7d.

DUNFERMLINE: LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—As intimated last week, an attempt was made on Sunday last to revive the mission in this town, which had from various causes fallen into a state of torpor. The Rev. H. Williamson (of Dundee) and Mrs. Soule have resolved to work together, and unite, if possible, both parties in a liberal Christian church. From local reasons it was determined to invite no immediate co-operation from either remnant of former parties. The first service was announced to take place at eleven o'clock. There was an attendance of twelve persons. Mr. Williamson discoursed on the "grain of mustard-seed," as an appropriate illustration of the new mission. In the afternoon, at two, another service was held, when twenty-four persons were present. Mrs. Soule delivered a sermon upon Jesus Christ and Him crucified. Several names were given in, and invitations offered to visit the homes. In the evening the attendance reached over 130, and gave good ground for the hope that with hard work, tact, skill, ingenuity, and every other available aid, with Christian faith and love, a church can be formed in this ancient town.

GLASGOW: SOUTH SAINT MUNGO-STREET.—On Sunday last the Rev. Wm. Mitchell preached the annual sermon in aid of this school. There was a good attendance, and a collection in aid of the school was made. Mr. Mitchell pleaded for the necessity of teaching our young the great and living truths of pure religion. Some, he said, objected that children were apt to be biassed in the Sunday school. But he denied that it was wrong to bias children in favour of truth. It was a duty to teach the children to love and serve God, their Maker and Father; to understand and obey the laws of nature, to set the highest value upon personal purity, honour, and truthfulness; to do their duty at home, at school, or at work; and to follow in the footsteps of Jesus Christ. That was what the school in connection with which they had met strove to do. No catechism or creed was used, and no theological dogmas beyond the comprehension of children were taught; and such noble and elevating truths must help to form the church of the future—a church which must rest on the sure foundation of truth, purity, and reason.

KING'S LYNN.—On Sunday, September 22nd, Mr. Herbert Burrows, of Cambridge, preached here morning and evening to most attentive congregations, who gave him their warmest thanks for his kindness in filling the pulpit at very short notice.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—The teachers and elder scholars took tea together on Friday night week, in the above place. Mr. and Mrs. Wright were invited as guests, the occasion being to bid farewell to three Sunday-school teachers—Mr. H. B. Smith, who has now entered upon his work as a student of the Home Missionary College, Manchester; Mr. J. J. Bowles, who has removed to Nottingham; and Miss Graveson, who has obtained a situation in Lincolnshire. After tea, which was provided by the teachers, Mr. J. Cooper, as superintendent of the Sunday school, wished the three teachers God speed in their new spheres. Other teachers and friends spoke in the same spirit, among whom were Messrs. T. Chattaway, Dale, Pratt, and Thos. Roberts. Mr. Wright also addressed the meeting, and gave some advice to the three teachers of whom they were taking leave. Mr. H. B. Smith responded. On Saturday afternoon the friends went off for an excursion to Swithland Woods. Two waggons conveyed the company, numbering about thirty.

MANCHESTER SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday last the first meeting of the present session was held at Blackley, the president, the Rev. J. Towle Marriott, in the chair. Over one hundred persons were present. A hymn having been sung, Mrs. Freeston read a paper on "Girls and Sunday Schools," which we reserve for a future occasion. A number of ladies and gentlemen took part in the discussion, which was closed by a few remarks by the Rev. J. Freeston. A vote of thanks was passed to Mrs. Freeston for her paper; and the meeting, in every way a success, was closed with prayer.

READING.—The anniversary services were held on the 8th inst. They were conducted by the Rev. H. Rylett, but the sermon in the morning was delivered by Miss Frances Power Cobbe on the subject, "The Kingdom of God." The address, which was a forcible and eloquent one, was delivered with much earnestness and feeling to a good and appreciative congregation. On the 10th the annual picnic of the children and their friends took place in a delightful park, the use of which was kindly granted by J. W. White, Esq. About 100 of all sizes enjoyed themselves immensely. The Sunday school is progressing satisfactorily. On the 15th inst., the church was decorated for the harvest festival, and sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Rylett.

MOSSLEY.—During the past three weeks revival services have been conducted in the churches here, and in the open air and the factories, and the old-fashioned orthodoxy has been preached for the conversion of the people, and some little bigotry has been displayed. On Sunday last, September 22nd, the Rev. J. G. Slater preached in the Free Christian Church two discourses bearing on the revival; in the morning on "What must I do to be saved?" and in the evening on "Are not we Christ's also?"

PADIHAM.—On Monday last a tea party was held in Nazareth Chapel schoolroom, for the purpose of presenting Mr. Thomas Holland with a portrait of himself. The portrait, which was generally pronounced an excellent likeness, was an enlarged photograph, life size, contained in a handsome oval gilt frame, and was accompanied by a framed card bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Thomas Holland, for forty-five years a teacher in Nazareth Chapel Sunday School, Padiham, by the first class of females, which he has taught for thirty-five years, as an expression of their gratitude for his services, and their high esteem and admiration for his character." The entire arrangements for the evening had been left in the hands of a committee of ladies, and it need hardly be said that the tea was particularly good, and that the most business-like capacity was displayed in proposing the election of a chairman, and moving him a final vote of thanks. A varied programme of songs and recitations occupied most of the evening, the only speeches being that of the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., in presenting the portrait on behalf of the class, and that of Mr. Holland in acknowledgment of the gift.

POOLE.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held here on Sunday last, the chapel being elaborately decorated with fruit, flowers, wheat, and barley. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Agar, and collections made on behalf of the funds of the Bournemouth Dispensary. We understand that the temporary engagement made with Mr. Agar has been renewed, the congregation hoping to be able to retain, as their permanent minister, one whose services are so highly esteemed and appreciated.

RAWTENSTALL.—On Saturday afternoon, September 21st, the teachers and elder scholars of the Sunday school, together with the friends of the Newchurch Sunday school, had a most pleasant ramble up Cribden Clough with the Rev. Joseph Freeston, who gave some very interesting descriptions of the trees and flowers. After the ramble, about fifty met in the school and had tea, and then the Rev. J. Freeston gave an instructive lecture on the flowers, ferns, and grasses that had been gathered. The meeting was also addressed by Mr. Thomas Aitken, of Bacup, Mr. John Ashworth, of Newchurch, and others, after which the Rev. Henry Hill closed the proceedings with a hymn and prayer.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A Philosophical and Musical Society has been formed at the Church of the Saviour, under the presidency of the Rev. D. Amos, and a varied programme has been printed of its work to be gone through weekly from October 3rd, 1878, to March 27th, 1879, ending with a musical soirée.

STOURBRIDGE.—The occasion of the marriage of Mr. James P. Maginnis, of London, eldest son of the Rev. D. Maginnis, of Stourbridge, was taken advantage of by his numerous friends to express their high appreciation of his character, and their hearty good wishes for his future happiness and prosperity. Not only in private life, but in congregational and Sunday-school work, and in the fulfilment of his professional duties, Mr. Maginnis has won the respect and regard of all who have been brought into connection with him. In addition to many wedding gifts from personal friends, there were two other interesting presentations. On Saturday evening last a deputation waited on Mr. Maginnis at the Old Parsonage, and presented him, on behalf chiefly of co-workers in the congregation and Sunday schools, with an elegant drawing-room timepiece; and, on the following day, he was much gratified to receive from the children of the Sunday schools (in which he had been for many years a teacher, and more recently superintendent) a handsome inkstand.

AN OFFER.

To the Editors.—As this is not a money-making announcement, but purely "for the good of the cause," will you allow me to say that I have a large quantity of my "Confession of Faith, concerning God, Jesus, Salvation, the Bible, and the Future Life," to give away, that I invite applications, and that I will forward them to any address. I only stipulate the applicants pay for postage. For every fifty asked for, twopence halfpenny in halfpenny stamps should be enclosed. People who can distribute the tract need not be afraid of asking for too many. It is stereotyped, and I will print and give away any quantity that may be asked for up to the end of October.—Yours, &c.,

UNITARIAN HOSPITALITY.

To the Editors.—Having frequently read in former times, both in the Herald and the Inquirer, complaints of uncivil treatment of strangers in Unitarian chapels, especially in London, may I be permitted, as a matter of justice to English Unitarians, to say that in a five months' stay in England my wife and I have attended some ten or twelve Unitarian places of worship in the metropolis and in the provinces, and that in every instance we have met with the greatest courtesy and attention, sometimes from the ordinary pew-opener, but more markedly from the regular attendants at the various churches. I may also add, in reply to another charge frequently brought against Unitarians, that we have had many offers of kindly hospitality, where our only claim was that of being co-religionists.—I am, &c.,

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AS READING ROOMS.

To the Editors.—Will you kindly grant me space to bring forward a suggestion which I think may be found useful in our towns during the coming winter months? It is with regard to the use that might be made of our schoolrooms on Sunday evenings. Is there any objection to their being opened as reading rooms when the Sunday school is over? We complain that free libraries and places of innocent amusement are closed on Sundays, and we ought to try and supply the want. A very small expense for fire and gas would make the schoolroom a comfortable resort on Sunday evenings for numbers who at present have only the streets or the public-house open to them. If members of the congregations were asked to lend books or papers (which they might bring with them to morning service), a good supply of reading would be obtained with very little trouble.

The experiment was tried here for one winter with success, and we found no difficulties in the way.—I am, yours obliged,

EDITH REID.

NON-SUBSCRIPTION IN IRELAND.

We have received another letter on this subject, which, however, adds no new element to the previous correspondence. Mr. Gordon once more explains the rules of the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, and says: "In satisfying themselves with regard to the theological mind of a candidate, our people do, undisguisedly, after their own fashion, no more in principle, and no less, than every Unitarian congregation in the world is in the habit of doing in the way which it deems most consonant with the duties of thought, of freedom, and of progress."

DOING AND SAYING.

The grand prize of 2,500*fr.* by the congress of Orientalists for the best essay on the different phases of Aryan civilisation in India has been awarded to Dr. Immer of Germany.

The health of Babu Keshub C. Sen has of late caused his friends much anxiety. From the Indian Mirror of last month we learn that his condition had at that time slightly improved, though he still passed sleepless nights, and his physician required him to be kept in perfect rest.

The discussion between the Rev. R. A. Armstrong and Mr. Bradlaugh, the account of which we have given, with very slight abridgement, from the columns of the National Reformer, has attracted so much interest among Unitarian circles that our agents inform us they could have disposed of many more copies of our paper than were supplied to them.

Lord Carnarvon presided on Tuesday evening at the opening of the winter session of the Salt Schools, Saltaire. His Lordship said he agreed with the view that it was right to make religion the foundation of all education. No man, however, could fail to recognise that just in proportion as society grew more artificial and complex, so the difficulty of making religion an integral part of our school education grew greater and greater. The obligation of inculcating religious teaching rested, therefore, all the more heavily upon the parent.

The letter recently addressed to the Porte by Cardinal Nina has been the object of several inquiries on the part of the different foreign governments, and the Pontifical Secretary has in consequence despatched an explanatory note to the Papal Nuncios abroad. In this it is declared that the intention of the Pope was to show his willingness to assist the foreign governments in overcoming the existing spirit of insubordination against the altar and the throne. As regards Italy, the note says:—"His Holiness claims perfect liberty for the Vatican, contending that this is necessary in the interest of the other Powers themselves." The Vatican has decided that the concordat with Austria shall not be applied to Bosnia and Herzegovina until their complete organisation has been effected by Austria.

A Church Congress is being held at Sheffield, and at Wednesday's meeting a very lively and interesting discussion followed the reading of a paper by the Hon. C. Lindley Wood, president of the English Church Union, on "The just limits of comprehensiveness in a National Church." Canon Ryle discussed the subject from an Evangelical as opposed to the Ritualist point of view. The Archbishop of York said that at present the Church of England was so full of life and was doing such an enormous work in leavening the population with the "true leaven of the Gospel of Christ" that it seemed to him deplorable, a thing to make angels weep, that they should be pursuing a course which would cause the candle of the Church of England as a National Church to be taken away.

The "Rutland," a second coffee and cocoa house, was opened in Leicester last week. It is eleven months since the first place, the "Granby," was started. The whole business was begun and is carried on by a company, of which E. Shipley Ellis, Esq., is the chairman. The capital is taken up in £1 shares, so arranged that working people may easily, safely, and profitably invest their money. The houses are conducted on two cardinal conditions—(1) to sell no intoxicating drinks; (2) to be self-supporting; and these conditions are adhered to, and the business pays well. In eleven months the "Granby" has been visited by 304,000 people; 72,000 have paid pennies to go into the game rooms, £4,400 have been received. The refreshments are good and cheap, the situation and accommodation excellent. Two other houses are to be opened. May they prosper!

Mr. Gladstone has contributed to this month's Contemporary Review an article entitled "The Sixteenth Century arraigned before the Nineteenth: a Study on the Reformation." The paper is a reply to Abbé Martin's article in the August number of the same magazine. Mr. Gladstone denies the general proposition of the Abbé which was, he says, "that the Ritualists much resembled the Latin Church in ritual, usage, and doctrine, and that it was therefore matter of astonishment that the resemblance did not merge into identity." The same argument, he contends, would apply to the Eastern Church, and yet nothing is so rare as a conversion from the body to the Latin Church. Mr. Gladstone expresses his conviction that there is in this country a great mass of positive belief, both within and without the Church of the nation. Theology, he says, is on the rise, and culture is held in increased esteem.

No little stir has been created in France by a pamphlet entitled Le Grand Peril de l'Eglise de France au Dix-Neuvieme Siecle, published by the Abbe Bougand, Vicar-General of Orleans, an ecclesiastical writer of some note. He shows that, apart from 3,000 communes which have no church or priest, there are 2,881 vacant cures, and he raises a cry of alarm at this clerical famine. The Radical papers have made great capital out of this pamphlet, and have drawn from it the inference that departments with the most education produce the fewest priests; but in a letter published subsequent to his pamphlet M. Bougand disputes this conclusion. The Times Paris correspondent writes that in the French Protestant Church there is also a scarcity of pastors, and that both bodies are evidently suffering from a common cause, partly, perhaps, the inadequacy of clerical stipends and partly the prevalence of theological doubts.

The Rev. W. Robinson, of Runcorn, who has just seceded from the Congregational body and joined the Church of England, preached on Sunday night a most remarkable "farewell sermon" to his old congregation. Mr. Robinson said that Nonconformity had been a passion with him, and he had for eighteen years been a Nonconformist minister. His present opinion was that Independency was sublime as a theory, but as a practice it was deplorable. It would do exquisitely for the Millennium, but in this age something else was required. Dissenting ministers had to submit to an "awful degradation" in occupying "on approval" a pulpit for which there might be half-a-dozen candidates. In some of their churches the ministers were cruelly tortured by their deacons; but it seemed to him (Mr. Robinson), in "his altered frame of mind," that "the greatest curse of Independency was their church meetings, which sometimes beggared description."

Monsignor Capel, in a recent sermon, mentioned a fact which he considered to be typical of English Sabbatarianism. When in Paris lately, the distinguished preacher visited the Exhibition on a Sunday, and went to the British section. Of course it was closed. Works of art, works of beauty, and works of skill were all carefully concealed from view because it was Sunday; but the English refreshment saloons were opened, and the visitors were at liberty to console themselves for their disappointment by indulgence in "English beef and sandwiches, British beer and London stout, and the rest of it." Englishmen, who see every Sunday an exactly parallel state of things at home, are too familiar with the spectacle to be shocked by its inconsistency; but it must strike the foreigner as a most ludicrous piece of pietism. It might have edified the frivolous Frenchman to know that we closed our museums on Sundays. But he is hardly to be fascinated by our example when he finds that, while pictures are strictly prohibited, porter is freely allowed.

The "Bulletin de l'Association de St. François de Sales" mentions among the most recent cures effected by the agency of the late Pope Pius IX. that of a young nun at Paris, who was relieved of a frightful attack of colic by the application to her body of a pair of white silk drawers which had belonged to the late Pope, and happened to be in the possession of the convent; also that of an Augustine nun at Sienna, who was cured of a bad cancer in the face by the application to it of a portrait of Pius IX.; and that of a medical man at Malaga, who was cured of a number of diseases by touching an old stocking of Pius IX., and who took immediately an oath never to apply to his clients any other means of cure but that which has succeeded so well with himself. In Texas a stillborn child was brought to life by the touch of the cross blessed by Pius IX.; and in the convent of the Enfant Jésus at Corie, near Lyons, a nun who had a cancer in the tongue and serious internal disease, invoked one night, when suffering acute pains, the aid of the late Pope, and, after being comforted by his apparition, was found completely cured next morning. These cures are cited, among others, to make good the claim of immediate beatification set up for Pius IX.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE KIRK IN THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Nonconformist, writing on the Western Highlands of Scotland, says: "On Sundays, at least, it was easy to see what an anomalous institution the Establishment in Scotland is. Go to what Presbyterian place of worship you might, the worship was the same, and very often the preaching in the parish kirk was as evangelical and earnest as in the churches of the unestablished bodies. Why, then, should one be established and the others not? was the question which naturally suggested itself. But if there were resemblance in other respects, the difference in the matter of attendance was great indeed. The Free Church minister at Gairloch told me that he had a congregation of 900, while the parish church was attended by but three families, consisting of about a dozen persons; yet the former was maintained by voluntaryism, and the latter by a State endowment. There were also other places in which the parish churches were almost deserted; while the Free and other churches seemed to attract nearly all the inhabitants. I saw, too, some parish burial-places in a wretched state of neglect, and though I cannot speak to the fact myself I saw in a Glasgow paper the statement that in a kirk in Mull the grass grows as freely as in the churchyard, and the minister has to leap over a gap of four stairs before he can 'wag his pow in the pulpit!'"

AMERICAN NOTES.

Dr. Laird Collier, who has been in England for some months past, has been compelled, on account of ill health, to tender his resignation as pastor of the Second Church of Boston. More than a year ago his medical advisers urged his leaving the Boston climate, and at that time he placed his resignation in the hands of the vestry of his church, but they declined to consider it. It is now understood that his physicians consider a change of climate and rest from work absolutely necessary, and that Dr. Collier will not return to Boston. The Boston Journal says:—"This community will learn with surprise and regret of Dr. Collier's resignation, and his withdrawal from the Boston pulpit will be seriously felt, not only by the members of the Second Church, but by the public at large."

The Rev. W. E. Griffis, an American clergyman, who has spent about twelve years in Japan, has published an interesting paper on social progress in that wonderful country. His facts about religion are of peculiar interest. Whereas Japan was, for over two centuries, a shaking of the head to Christian nations, and a proverb to the historian of persecution, she has, since 1873, withdrawn her public edicts against Christianity, and to the Protestant, Roman, and Greek forms of that faith the country is practically and equally as open as to foreign trade and commerce. There are now fifteen organised Protestant churches, with a membership of nearly as many hundreds, and a following of many thousands in Japan. Russian missionaries have at least three churches, and a following of probably 5,000 souls. French missionaries report a following of over 12,000 persons, with several handsome church buildings. Then the translation of the Bible has been "like building a railway through the national intellect; though, after all, we suspect the tendency among educated Japanese is not to adopt any special form of Christianity, but to construct for themselves a sort of selected religious creed, drawn from a variety of sources. Still, the churches, schools, colleges, hospitals, dispensaries, Christian literature, and Romanisation of the language, established and carried on by a small army of philanthropic ladies and gentlemen, must have their effect. In the work of national education, elementary and special, first-class private schools maintain a healthy rivalry with those established by Government."

A UNITARIAN CHURCH.*

BY REV. CHARLES G. AMES.

I HAVE come from the art gallery of the Exposition at Philadelphia, and have here a little painting of my own which I am stimulated to put on exhibition, which professes to represent, in very rough outline, an average Unitarian church in an American town,—the average church; a good sort of a church you know; no archangel up in the pulpit, and no very big thing down in the pews; but made of good, honest, plain, regular-going sort of people, such as makes up the majority of Unitarian churches.

One feature of this average Unitarian congregation, in the average town, is a certain vital relation of the life of the people who belong to the church with the life of the town, which does not seem to me to belong to the other sort of churches. The Unitarian church such as I describe is an extension of the home, of the school, of the shop, of whatever else is legitimate in the life of the town; and these various departments in the town are related to whatever religion there is in that Unitarian church. Whatever religion there is in it is good for home consumption. So the population, as far as this Unitarian church affects it, is under a system of culture which rests on faith in man,—faith that it is well to take whatever is good in man and make the best of him. It sets itself to work to do that; and so it trusts to the orderly growth of the human individual. It believes, indeed, a good deal in growth, and therefore it expresses its faith in God and good men as truly as it expresses its faith in human nature.

Another feature of this Unitarian church is that it does not promote religious paroxysms. There are not many in it who took their religion in a fit. And so they never connected religion with the smell of brimstone. They never swallowed religion as though it were a medicine to be taken with wry faces, but had a sort of notion that it was the good bread of life which the Father appointed for the nourishment of his children. And along with this there is a theory that religion is not something outside of man, grafted on to him, but that it is a complete and vigorous condition, unmixed by evil influences from within or without, of his own spiritual nature. Then along with this would be a general notion that the way to have religion is not to "open your mouth and shut your eyes," and take it from somebody else, from priestly authority, dead or living; but that the more you keep your eyes open and the less you put your head in a cloud, the more you will have God's own truth. There will be a caution about swallowing things wholesale. There will be a notion that this is God's world, and that if there is any truth around it will be a good thing.

In the Unitarian church there will not be a great many professions of religion. Love to God and fidelity to man, and fitting into general relations of living the best we know how, will be regarded as likely to win approval up there, and a good thing down here. The doors will be held open for general progress in an intellectual direction. There will not be a great amount of suspicion that the knowledge which has been developed by science, and which is yet to be developed by the human mind, is likely to turn out a profane and cursed thing. It will be understood that whatever science shows will be incorporated into the general religious life of the community.

There will not only be a conviction that knowledge is not profane, but there will be a general hankering after it. So the mental life of the town will be very largely represented by that Unitarian congregation. There will be no particular shock felt by the development of religion in that town, because it will not be tortured by the theory that there is a probable conflict between faith and reason or between religion and science.

Now, under the conditions, let me say reverently that I think the Spirit of God has an unembarrassed chance to promote the religious life of the people in this congregation which it would not have under other circumstances, and under the theology which assumes that men are all run out of one bullet-mould into one pattern. Then there will be in this average Unitarian church a centre of religious life and thinking, where honest men of all opinions find themselves treated with a certain respect. There will be no element which is related to the Inquisition, even of a moral kind. So there will be no baneful, corrupting necessity of pretending to agree. If there are five hundred different people in this congregation, there may be five hundred different ways of looking at a question, and they will tolerate each other. The right of free inquiry will be maintained in close relationship to the blessing of free fellowship. The majority of people don't know exactly what to think about the subject of religion; when it comes to theories they are more or less afloat. In this community which I describe there will be this freedom of dissent and freedom of inquiry closely connected with the great blessing which all human hearts hunger after, of being related in fellowship, in hope and sympathy, with people from whom, in many ways, there is an intellectual difference. The emphasis in such a church being on right living, it will be a blessing not only to its own members, but it will be a sweet, reconciling element in the bickerings and antagonisms which infest the life of our towns.

Let this go on for half a century, and then judge this tree by its fruits. Your judgment will be generally just. You will find that the church is never the main thing. They value it as a means and take care of it as a means. As a rule, it will be a church whose internal affairs are as well administered as those of the community. The church will go for little; but so do the sunlight and the common air of God. But the church has created a moral and intellectual climate in that town which has been favourable to the growth of general intelligence, habits of honesty and sobriety, and, on the whole, of good citizenship.

Now our business is to maintain and multiply these centres of religion. Too long our Unitarian lamp has merely smoked. God grant his own pure breath may kindle it in a calm, pure flame like that of his own spirit. In God's name when he says forward, let us march.

REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE REV. GEORGE PUTNAM, D.D.

[UNITARIAN REVIEW.]

EVERY man has his own work. Happy is he who does it, and not another man's work! Thrice happy when he does it so well, so perfectly, so grandly, that the fame of it creeps from household to household, from church to church, and we see how it is that he who shunned the general gaze, who loved not the applauding crowd, took supreme rank as a preacher of our liberal faith, and moulded the character of so many men and women. We who love our organised Christianity, and feel that we must put our shoulders to the wheel, all together, in the machinery of the church, are in danger of censuring a man who works in his own place, and takes little notice of our work. But it depends upon how he works. If he is building up human character every day, and also strengthening his own local religious society—a society metropolitan in its character—he is actually doing, in the quickest and best way, the very things which our machinery is made to accomplish. Dr. Putnam belonged to a race of ministers who cared much less about organisation and denominational unity than we of this age. We think we are right in principle, and that a great, comprehensive, liberal church is better than a denomination of isolated societies. But, practically, let us ask ourselves how the average societies that we form nowadays compare with some of those old and prosperous churches, in full sympathy with their pastor, knowing what they believed, and doing it. Poorly, we are afraid.

Who ever built up a church so well as Dr. Putnam, and stayed by it to the last, in spite of all the allurements from abroad? It was a beacon light for years. Listeners came in from all the neighbourhood to hear this gifted man, who gave his whole soul and life to his pulpit, which was his joy and throne. But his pulpit was not all. His Sunday school was as successful and effective as any in the country. His scholars generally became teachers; and a goodly company of young men and women have gone forth from his society to serve the world in the far West, tracing their first inspiration to him. The Roxbury Home for Aged Women was maintained in his society; also the Benevolent Society for Poor Women, of which Mrs. Putnam was President. The Freedmen's Aid Society and the Sanitary Commission, during the war, were more aided by his church than by any other in Roxbury; while Mr. Ritchie's Mission to the Poor was for many years chiefly sustained in his society, and was, in fact, started by Dr. Putnam himself. If we may trust the words of his people, of those who knew him best, he was the very noblest type of the parish priest and minister. The book of eternity only can tell of the households which he entered to bless. He carried the power, the majesty, of the Christian religion into disordered, broken-hearted families, laid out his life's strength to reconcile those who were separated, nor could he rest until he had "seen of the travail of his soul and was satisfied." Who could keep up his unchristian animosities in the face of such a wonderful man as this, who was willing to leave the enjoyment of his study and his home and friends, and spend hours in desolate houses in order to bring peace? He reminds us of Bossuet in the majesty of the mission which he carried; but we cannot imagine Bossuet to have possessed that tenderness which he showed to those whom he could serve or love.

A friend quotes from a parishioner's diary as follows:—

I stopped at —'s to-day and heard some new traits of Dr. Putnam's unwearied goodness and pastoral services. She knows of many instances of youths whom he has reclaimed, and family differences which he has smoothed, by his magic power over the hearts and minds of others. She read me a letter to her son with a few of those golden sentences of advice which can never be forgotten, so from the heart they come. I know well enough what he is; but what he does, how imperfectly I know, as I feel, when these revelations come! What is a mere parish routine to these services where the heart is poured out like water, and to so noble an end, by wisest means!

Nothing could exceed his tenderness in his own home, where he was worshipped by wife and children:—

His word was law to them; but it was the law of kindness and wisdom. Even in his busiest years his study was never closed to them. His boys loved to take their books and sit there in the privileged corner. There was the utmost confidence in the mutual relations of father and sons, and to his wise counsels and mingling of due restraint with loving indulgence and constant sympathy was greatly due the admirable success of their training, aided no doubt by pure and noble natures inherited from gifted and excellent ancestry on both father's and mother's side. As they grew older that study was still, and to the last, the favourite "place of refuge" for his children, as they loved to call it.

It has been said that Dr. Putnam loved the company of business men. It is true that he had reason to value among his friends many men in the active business of life. They sought him far more than he sought them; and why? Not because he flattered or spoke smooth things to them, but rather because he had touched their consciences and hearts, and led them to seek higher aims and joys than money or success could yield. It was their veneration for his character and delight in his preaching which induced two such men to leave him legacies, which, added to the little inheritance from his father and the salary which he so well earned, laid the foundation for the property which gave him the comforts of life, and enabled him to leave a moderate competence for his children.

Perhaps if more of our young ministers could escape for an hour or day entirely from a purely intellectual and professional atmosphere, and mingle and sympathise with those engaged in the struggles and active business of the world, it would save them from morbid or narrow views of life and bodily or mental dyspepsia.

Many a modest school-teacher or worthy farmer counted him a friend. In his native town of Sterling the reverence and love for him were unbounded. The people there were proud and fond of him, and loved to relate anecdotes of his pure and happy childhood. The farmer who bought the old Putnam farm, and for many years was his host in the summer months, was always welcomed to his home in Roxbury; and touching was the grief of the good old man as he once more entered that dwelling a few hours after the death of his venerated friend. He remembered how the great preacher was a kindly man, and loved to make hay with him in his summer holidays, and chose to sit down with the hay-makers at their noonday meal, or rest with him in the porch after sunset, to see the evening shadows creep over the beautiful, sloping meadows.

A life-long friend writes: "I wish I could give you an idea of him, my ideal, as it has dwelt clear and undimmed in my mind for over forty years, changing and varying in aspect, indeed, from youth to age, assuming new colours and lights and shades as the great experiences of life, its joys and sorrows, brought them out; but always noble, true, consistent, and expanding."

At last the end came; and very fitting was the close of a noble Christian life. It was cheerful and serene, full of patience, gratitude, and faith. On his last birthday he wrote to a friend:—

There are two kinds of happiness for man. The first and best is in work—useful, unimpeded work. This is highest. It gives a sense of life and growth. With reasonable success, it is God's best boon. The second is rest. When the powers flag and work cannot be done, to sit still and think, and remember, and hope. This last kind I am trying, and I succeed in it. I enjoy life about as well as ever I did. I get reconciled to doing nothing. I miss the bounding delight of exertion, but I escape the partial sense of failure—the haunting feeling that I do not quite come up to the mark—and the anxious uncertainty about future efforts. I sit waiting. Friends are kind, children good, and the world goes fairly well with me. I think, on the whole, I never liked living better. The summer is beautiful. I wait for winter, and for summer again if it comes, with placid expectation, but shall not be disappointed if it do not come. Then I shall have the great beyond instead. . . . My cup is full. Providence is kind. If I am dying, it is euthanasia.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE LITTLE FOXES.

A SERMON FOR THE CHILDREN.

CHILDREN! it is to you I am to talk. This is the text. Listen! "The foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes." Vine trees and little foxes. Vine trees on which the grapes grow; foxes that steal into the garden and suck the juices out of the grapes.

I suppose every boy and girl likes grapes. Grapes are good when you are thirsty; juicy when you are tired; cool and pleasant when you lie sick in bed, and your head is hot, and your tongue is dry.

Wouldn't it be nice to live in a country where the grapes grow? What would you do with your vineyard; your garden full of red-purple fruit? Why you would just have to do like the people do in the East. They make their grape garden at the top of a little hill. Then they build a wall all round it, and a hedge; and then, right in the middle of the grape garden—right on the top of the hill—they build up a tower, like a tiny house, with windows all around it, and then the man in tower can look out, and see every way over the grape garden.

What is all this for? All round the garden outside the walls and hedges are hundreds of foxes, and foxes are fond of grapes, and they are sly and swift. They will slip in any way—over the walls, through the hedges. But that watchman in the tower won't let them. He sees all round; and so he keeps out the cunning little foxes, and keeps the grapes unspoiled. And by and by, when the fruit grows rich and ripe, there is a glorious grape gathering. The people sing their happy songs, gather the juicy grapes into baskets, and in gladness carry them home.

You and I can't have a vineyard like those people in the East, because we live over here in the West. But we have a kind of grape garden after all; and in this grape garden of ours the grapes never grow green and sour; never get dry and withered, unless we choose to let them. Don't you know that you have something within you which thinks good thoughts and loves good people? Something, I mean, you have in you that wants to do right; that hates a lie, and that makes you brave and gentle and sweet and true. Something that is within you that doesn't like boys and girls or men and women who say bad words and tell what is not true. What is it within you that makes you feel all this? It is your heart that does all this. Some people call it your soul; and is it not a wonderful, curious thing that heart of yours within you! It is your grape garden. Within there juicy fruit will grow—fruits of goodness, truthness, bravery and love. All grow there; and that is fruit which everybody likes. But look! There are some sly little foxes always ready to creep cunningly into your heart—that is your grape garden. And what would these foxes do? They would spoil all the beauty and the purity, all the richness and winsomeness of your young heart. But I want you to learn to look out for these foxes, and to say to everyone of them, "You shall not!" Don't you try to come inside here. I'm looking out in my watch-tower, and if you come ever so silently, if you come on tip-toe, I won't let you in. My heart is my grape garden; you sly, cunning foxes want to get in, but you shall not!

Well now, you may wonder what these little foxes are that would steal into your heart and suck away your goodness. There are many of them. Hundreds? Thousands! I dare say everybody here has had one fox in his heart to-day. I mean a Bad Thought, a Bitter Feeling, a Wicked Wish. These are the foxes that get into the grape garden of the heart and suck up the juicy goodness inside. But I can only tell you about two of these foxes to-day. One is called Disobedience, the other is called Deceit.

You know what this fox Disobedience does. Your mother tells you to go straight to school; you start off, and then you forget, the fox steps in; you begin to play on the road; you reach school late, and lose your mark.

Your mother asks you, in such a kind way, to take care of baby, or play a bit with your little brother and sister, and you think you will, because your mother is so kind; and then, after a little while, you forget, or think you won't, and so like a thief run off. Ah! then the fox has stolen in; the sly, cunning, cowardly fox that doesn't stand to its duty, but runs away and is Disobedient.

Whenever your workmaster or your school-master, your father or mother tells you to do anything, and you don't do it, then you have let in this cunning fox Disobedience, and he will spoil all the sweetness and goodness out of your heart—very soon.

Then I said there was another fox called Deceit. This fox is more wicked than the other, I think. Do you know it is this fox that tempts you to tell a lie? It is Deceit which helps you to do anything not true. This fox Deceit nearly always slips into your heart on the other side, just when the fox Disobedience has crept in on the hither side. I'll tell you how. Boys sometimes play truant. The fox Disobedience has slipped in. Then they go home just when school or service is over, and in jumps the second fox Deceit, and from their hearts they utter a lie, telling their parents they have been to school and church. Girls are sometimes left to mind the house. You promise to be good and take care of the little one, and then you get tired of toys and games, you look up all round the house. What can there be in the drawer, you wonder? Father's watch. How you have longed many a time to look inside that watch! You take it out; you try to open it; you can't. You pull and squeeze and tug and twitch—Smash! Crash! What now? Watch-wheels, watch-fingers, glass, case, chain, all lie shattered and scattered on the floor. How your heart trembles! How the tears spurt out of your eyes! Why what is the matter? Is it not that the fox Disobedience had slyly slipped into your heart just when you weren't thinking? and so you touched the watch. And see what a mess and a waste it has made. You look at the broken bits upon the floor, and then, ay then, worse than all, the second cunning fox Deceit is ready to creep into your heart, and if you don't drive him off, he'll tempt you to tell a lie about that watch, and say you didn't touch it.

Children! what would you do with your good heart—your own grape garden? Would you have it spoiled, and all the red-purple fruit of pure feeling, brave thinking, bright lovingness, be withered up within you? No! You want to be a true-minded boy, or a tender-hearted girl. Then I tell you what to do. Take care of the little foxes: keep a sharp look out from your inside watch tower. Bad temper, Tell-a-lie, Idle hands, Wicked tongue—these are cunning little foxes creeping about everywhere around you. And they want to get into your heart—your grape-garden. And if they do, and you don't drive them out, they will surely suck up all the goodness in you. Take care of the foxes, and then you will grow in sweetness, bravery, and beauty, branching upward into men and women; until, by and by, you may branch still higher up among the angels in the happy, happy "Harvest Home."

WILLING TO LIVE HONESTLY.

"PRAY for us," said the apostle, "for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly."—We may conclude from this that men who are willing to live honestly need praying for, in such a world as this; and we can certainly pray with some confidence for persons of this description. But unless men are "willing to live honestly," it is doubtful whether our prayers will do them much good.

To live honestly in all things, we must first be willing to earn our own living. God said that man should eat his bread in the sweat of his face. Paul said, "If a man will not work neither shall he eat." The man who is "willing to live honestly" in all things, accepts these primary conditions of existence, and rejecting the bread of idleness, labours, working with his hands and with his brains, that he may earn his daily bread. The man who is not willing to win his bread by honest labour, is not willing in all things to live honestly.

Again, a man who is willing in all things to live honestly, is willing to accept such a living as he can earn. There are very few people who cannot live honestly, if they will be content with such a living as they can earn. Many a man can live honestly, in a cottage or a cabin, who cannot live honestly in a costly mansion. He can live honestly in the quiet country, when he cannot live honestly in the roar and rush of the crowded city. He can live honestly by dressing himself in comfortable raiment, and his family in clean and decent apparel, but he cannot live honestly while he robes himself in broadcloth, and decks his wife in satins and in silks. He can live honestly if he is willing to live on roast potatoes and corn cakes, but he cannot live honestly if he must fare sumptuously every day. He can live honestly if he will go on foot; he cannot live honestly if he must have his coachman and his carriage.

The man who is willing to live honestly in all things, is a man who submits to the necessities of his position, and who limits his desires and brings them within the range of his means. The man who resolutely determines to do this; to live within his income, to earn his money before he spends it, to labour diligently and dispense with things which he cannot purchase and pay for; the man who has given up the idea that the world owes him a living, and has set himself to earn a living, by hard and diligent labour; the man who will persist in such a course as this, though he may not be able to gratify every taste, nor follow every fashion, nor move amid the gaiety and hollowness of a wicked and perverse generation, may yet be blessed in the enjoyment of good health, a good conscience, a good appetite, and a good living. For he who lives honestly in all things, has little fear of the afflictions and troubles which come upon dishonest souls, and which make the way of the transgressor so hard.—The Christian.

Charles Lamb, sitting next some chattering woman at dinner, she observed he didn't attend to her. "You don't seem," said the lady, "to be at all the better for what I am saying to you!"—"No, ma'am," he answered; "but this gentleman on the other side of me must, for it all came in at one ear and went out at the other!"

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

SHALL WE HAVE DOCTRINAL TEACHING?

AN ADDRESS AT A MEETING OF THE LIVERPOOL SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

II.

LET us now touch on the question—How should doctrinal teaching be given?

It may be given in the course of Bible lessons by explaining such passages of Scripture as have a doctrinal relation. I have in my mind one teacher, not in this part of Lancashire, who told me he was in the habit of passing over with as little comment as possible all passages that had any doctrinal significance—a course which I ventured to say was unworthy of him in his important position—a course which was mischievous in its effects, and which produced among his scholars an impression that such and such passages were incapable of interpretation in any but an orthodox sense. Well, we may teach our ideas in this way, little by little, line upon line, and I believe those who adopt that plan find that, as a rule, a genuine interest, and an ever fresh and living interest, is taken in such teaching. It is not set and formal. It does not set out with a mere cut and dried system, but it presents frequent opportunities, in an incidental way, of bringing out some points believed among us.

Or, again, such teaching might be given by taking a tract, or a lecture, as a basis, and thoroughly discussing its subject both on its rational and scriptural side. Take, for example, on the Deity of Jesus, Brooke Herford's lecture, The Christ of the Gospels and the Christ of the Creeds, or Mr. Gaskell's lecture on The Person of Christ. Here we have the Scriptural evidence that multitudes of minds still need—for it is a great mistake to suppose that the textual argument is out of date—put in a brief and concise way. Or, on the Bible, take Mr. Millson's thoughtful and thoroughly informing lessons in Teachers' Notes. Or, on Eternal Punishment, Dr. Vance Smith's pamphlet, W. Miall's Can it be True? Samuel Cox's Salvator Mundi, or Canon Farrar's Introduction to his Eternal Hope. So with Carpenter's or Scott Porter's lectures on the Atonement, or Dr. Martineau's Scheme of Vicarious Redemption in the Liverpool Controversy. On our theological position generally take Dr. Vance Smith's Bible and the Popular Theology, and on our conceptions of religion Mr. Armstrong's very suggestive and helpful lessons in Teachers' Notes.

Then, again, such teaching might be given to young scholars by a systematic use of such books as Page Hopps's First Principles, or of such a little tract as Mr. Crosskey's Principles of Religion—an admirable, altogether excellent tract, free from all objections on the score of Unitarian sectarianism, broad, suggestive, devout.

Such teaching might be given in the form of periodical addresses to the scholars, each address to be mixed up with, or to be followed by, questions on what is said; and each address, too, to be opened by references to, and questions on, the preceding one. I am sure that this association might do excellent service if its committee could induce some gentleman or lady to visit each school in turn, say for a few Sundays in each winter, to give a series of such addresses, and if it could induce the teachers of such schools to accept such a service. If we could only get hold of the right person, and throw aside that excessive assertion of individuality, that jealousy of all thought that is not exactly after the pattern of our own, which are the bane of all associated work, the blight of all union, and the depression of earnest souls, do you not think that such addresses would be fruitful of good to our scholars' future lives, to ourselves, and to our Union?

Now, having thrown out these hints for discussion, two observations, by way of objection, must be mentioned.

The first is that, with the perfect freedom of our teachers, a variety of doctrinal ideas may be presented, the only result of which will be confusion in the minds of the scholar. One teacher may hold one view of God, of Jesus, of immortality, of the Bible, of miracles; another teacher may hold another. We must have perfect freedom. We must put away that spirit which was manifested in one of our schools, where a teacher was expressing his disbelief in miracles, as they are usually understood, and explain a particular miracle in an allegorical sense, when the superintendent, hearing him, entered the class, and warned the scholars against what they were then hearing as infidelity. We must have room for all opinions; and I hold that it is better for a class to hear six contradictory opinions than to hear no opinion at all. Appeal to their intelligence, and we shall find them quicker to discriminate between one opinion and another than we imagine.

The second observation is this: that I have no regard at all, not the slightest, for the charge of making little Unitarian sectarians. It is said: leave them free, let them determine for themselves. Agreed. Perfectly right. But they cannot determine for themselves until they have the materials to determine upon. They cannot form their own views until they have the knowledge, the thought, and the data on which to form them. It is thoroughly inconsistent to say, let them have freedom to decide for themselves, and yet to withhold from them the evidence on which to decide. It is thoroughly inconsistent to say that we are giving them a bias. Why, the undoubted reality is that the minds of the young cannot be unbiassed. While we say, don't predispose them, their own reading, their schoolfellows, their companions, that influence which we call "the course of things"—all these are predisposing them. The demand that we should leave them free from our own theological tendency would be commendable only in a condition of entire freedom from bias all round. Such a condition is impossible in the constitution of the mind; and hence it so often happens that minds which we will not bias towards us become biassed away from us. No, I would not make them into Unitarian sectarians; though a Unitarian sectarian is better than a Unitarian nondescript, anythingarian or nothingarian. I would try to instil into them a faith which in my heart and soul I believe is calculated to save them from the hard struggle between the conceptions of ripened age and the sweet and cherished feelings of childhood—a faith which is imperishable amidst all the controversies of the time, and so give them anchorage amidst the tempests of discussion. I would fortify them with the grounds of that faith that they might be strong against both aggressive orthodoxy and insidious indifferentism. Above all, I would try and train them into religious men and women; and believing that what theology is good for is to make piety, and that Unitarian theology is calculated to produce the highest style of piety, as it makes morality and religion one, as its aim culminates in character not creed, I would teach them Unitarian theology.

TASTE—THE FITNESS OF WORDS TO MUSIC.

THE Irish Presbyterians last year appointed a committee to consider in their psalmody the matching of words and music. The result is that Messrs. Novello are to be asked to publish a new volume for them, edited by Sir R. Stewart. The Rev. A. C. Murphy, of Londonderry, in recommending the work of the committee to the Assembly, said: It is not easy to estimate the advantage which will arise from having the same tune sung invariably to the same psalm throughout all the congregations of the Church. It will not be denied that there is some tune which, on the whole, goes better than any other tune with each particular psalm. We have laboured to find that fittest tune. It may be affirmed that the fitness of a tune to a psalm is a mere matter of taste, and that tastes differ. I do not admit that it is a matter of taste in the sense in which it is said that tastes differ. True taste is not arbitrary. It is not one thing in one place, another thing in another. It is not one thing in one person, another thing in another. It is not the accident of a land, or an age, a civilisation or a religion. It is founded on principles of the human mind, which are as fixed and as ascertainable as the principles which lie at the root of physical or moral science. Taste, like every other natural endowment, is one of those good and perfect gifts which come down from the Father of Lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. If, then, there be some tune which is fittest for each particular psalm, and if we have done our best to find it out, it is obvious that, through the use of a common book embodying the best results we have been able to reach, the general culture of the church will be advanced in a far more effectual way than through the happiest hap-hazard arrangements of separate congregations. Besides, it will be an incalculable benefit that a member of the church, in passing from one congregation to another, should meet everywhere the same familiar strains uniting themselves to the psalms of the sanctuary. A bond of union, tender, and strong, and permanent, will thus weld together the entire praise element in our public worship.

Yes; But What Does Scripture Really Teach Concerning the Sabbath? Sermon by Alexander Gordon, M.A. Belfast: William Henry Greer, 43, Donegall Place.

THIS sermon, we are told in a note, was given extemporaneously and without thought of publication, and is now printed at the earnest desire of some who heard it. The occasion was the appearance of a Memorial, addressed to the Belfast Carriage Company, deprecating the tramway traffic on Sundays, recently commenced. Mr. Gordon gives his reasons for declining to sign the Memorial, and for not recommending others to sign it. The Memorial asserts that the running of tram-cars on the Lord's Day is "a violation of the Divine Law, requiring us to remember the Sabbath Day and keep it holy." Mr. Gordon shows that the Lord's Day and the Sabbath Day are two entirely different institutions; that the Mosaic commandment was for the Jews alone; that, while the Sabbath was to be a day of rest from all labour, the least violation of which was to be punished with death, there was no restraint put upon recreation. "Anything more unlike the 'let us all be unhappy on Sunday' of our 'substituted' day, could not be imagined than the ordinary unrestraint and mirth of a Hebrew Sabbath. The good souls who lift up their hands in horror at the thought of a Continental Sunday, have surely very little idea of the actual Sabbath as held under the vines and fig-trees of Judea." Mr. Gordon recognises, in the Sabbath, apart from its special character, the conservation of a custom far older than the Sabbath law, and of durable and important utility—"the rule of proper and proportionate rest for man and beast, for rich and poor, for brain-worker and hand-worker alike." He thinks that tram-cars may render effectual aid to the religious culture of many worshippers, "by placing increased facilities for the weak at all times, and for the lazy (I suppose lazy people have souls to be saved), and even for the strong in wet weather, to convey them to their accustomed houses of prayer." Besides, they will do good by taking people out of the town, "where a paternal government gives us open whiskey shops on the Lord's Day." In conclusion, the preacher gives utterance to his own deep feeling of the sacred associations and the sweetness of the Lord's Day; but "religion, nevertheless, is not a matter of days: it is to live to God in the Spirit of Christ."

"Now, Johnny," says grandma, "I want you to sit still as a mouse." "Mouses don't sit still, grandma."

"I hope you will take care of the Constitution," said a reeling citizen to John Quincy Adams, on a presidential tour. "Yes," was the answer, "and I commend to your good keeping your own!"

A melting fast day sermon being preached in a country church, all wept except one man, who on being asked why he did not weep as well as the rest, replied, "Oh! I belong to another parish."

WAIT AND SEE.

WHEN my boy, with eager questions,
Asking how, and where, and when,
Taxes all my store of wisdom,
Asking o'er and o'er again
Questions oft to which the answers
Give to others still the key,
I have said to teach him patience:—
"Wait, my little boy, and see."

And the words I taught my darling
Taught to me a lesson sweet;
Once, when all the world seemed darkened,
And the storm about me beat,
In the children's room I heard him,
With a child's sweet mimicry,
To the baby brother's questions
Saying wisely, "Wait and see."

Like an angel's tender chiding
Came the darling's word to me,
Though my Father's ways were hidden,
Bidding me still wait and see.
What are we but restless children,
Ever asking what shall be?
And the Father in his wisdom,
Gentle bids us, "Wait and see."

A purer Christianity, however slowly, is to take the place of that which bears but its name. Cannot we become the heralds of this better day? Let our hearts bid it welcome! Let our lives reveal its beauty and its power.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

THE NOTTINGHAM DEBATE.

In one point the discussion between Messrs. ARMSTRONG and BRADLAUGH stands almost without parallel, viz., in the temper with which it was conducted from first to last. There may be room for doubt whether a public debate produces any direct result, on one side or the other, towards a conclusion of the argument. But if it be in this case, as in the famous tussle between ROBIN HOOD and FRIAR TUCK, when ROBIN could not worst the Friar and the Friar did not worst ROBIN, still the doughty and good-natured antagonists learn to respect one another. They know each other as they did not before; and if they have acquired nothing new in the way of reasons and rejoinders, they have had experience of that which brings out the best in man, the conflict of high thought with thought.

Throughout the discussion, indeed, we have been more interested with the men than with the matter, or rather with the matter as revealing the men. On the one hand there was the Sceptic; for the name is applicable in this case under its proper signification,—that of the Inquirer who will take nothing for granted, who will have everything explained, and who, when perfect explanation fails, will either doubt or boldly deny. This turn of mind is essentially what the mental philosopher would call of the objective kind. It deals with external facts and uses the hard logic which is fit for the outward mechanism of observed facts. On the other side we see manifested the Religious mind; accustomed to self-contemplation; seeking its experience in the depths of the soul; which scientific analysis has not reached, perhaps can never reach. It would be unfair to Mr. BRADLAUGH to imply that he is unaware of the existence of such facts of the inner consciousness. He admits them to a certain place in his system. He gives full credit to the good that is in humanity. The sacrifices of the martyrs, the love and pity which good men have for the unfortunate and the bad, the promptings and rebukes of conscience are all recognised by him as facts; he thinks well of human nature and is a lover of his kind. But he has no way of seeking communion with the "soul of goodness." Against the facts that go for good, he pits other facts that go for bad; cruelty against compassion; selfish sin against self-sacrifice; storm against sunshine; pain against pleasure. Having thus ranged his two groups of facts, he leaves them. Classification and logic have done their work. This contentment of the reasoner with a mere arrangement of things, is a cause of infinite wonder to the religious mind. Conscious of an imperative voice distinguishing utterly the right from the wrong, it cannot see how it is possible that wrong and right should be in the universe as two equal potencies. It knows them to be altogether opposite in kind. Its own nature affirms the one to be law, the other to be breach of law. Within its own consciousness, therefore, there is an inevitable conviction that God, the Supreme Being, is good.

Mr. BRADLAUGH does not find a place for God. The state of scientific contentment here again astonishes the mind which has grown under religious culture. If there is no place for God, there is place for simply inscrutable mystery, which mystery includes the existence from everlasting of that Fountain of Being, out of which the things we see have flowed. This you may not name God. You may say it is metaphysical to speak of it. It no less remains before the mind as an inevitable presence. Mr. BRADLAUGH surely did not rise to the fair treatment of this subject when he once and again put forward the demand for a definition of God. He ought to have recognised at once and candidly, that in the nature of the matter no definition is possible. If any Theist had gone so far as to define God, a fair and free thinker not bound by a dogmatic state of belief should have corrected him. Whatever belongs to the thought of God at all, belongs to the region where scientific thinkers like Professors TYNDALL and HUXLEY acknowledge a mystery beyond the reach of their science. Mr. Armstrong, therefore, was perfectly justified in refusing to define God, and Mr. Bradlaugh's weakest point will be felt by candid and thoughtful readers of both sides to lie in the demand for definition in such a case.

This is, indeed, the peculiar weakness of the sceptical mind. It works with logic upon facts; but it comes to ignore all facts that do not adapt themselves to its logic. It seems to begin with facts; it really begins with definitions. Logic first; facts afterwards. The religious mind, on the contrary, finds its difficulty in the nature of the facts on which it rests. Its weakness is that it cannot define them. It is found bowing before the Great Wonder and Awe of the Universe, naming the Infinite source of being Father of its spirit; acknowledging its own conscious law of good to be Law of His. These are constructive efforts of the mind; the highest work of that imagination which Professor TYNDALL has taught us to admire as chief agent in all fruitful thinking. When questioned, the only answer that may be possible to a mind full of such contemplations may well be—I am naming the Fact beneath all facts, the Being of all beings, the Life of all life; but this I cannot and do not pretend to analyse.

Mr. ARMSTRONG's direct concern was not with the question of the being of God, but with that as to the character of God, though the question as to the existence of Deity was involved in the other. He was engaged, too, on the positive side of the argument, else he might have insisted, in reply to his opponent's demand for definitions, that Mr. BRADLAUGH should help him to his own explanation of the origin of things. This, however, was out of the question, and the discussion turned principally on the problem of good and evil. It does not appear how Mr. BRADLAUGH accounts for evil. He may think it a result of things being as they are. Good for mankind he defines to be the greatest happiness of the greatest number, with the least injury to any one of them. But what is happiness? and on the other hand, What is pain? The man of science has told us that "pain is the prayer of the nerve for healthy blood." Our range of experience shows that most of the ills and accidents of life, to which we can trace an origin, arise from the same sort of causes as the accidents that befall our little children. The children are ambitious, and love enterprise, and delight in risks and dangers. They play with tools which are beyond their present skill. They dare the force of swollen river-currents, and will balance themselves to the verge of falling headlong from perpendicular rocks and towers. From time to time they come to grief, and their parents are left to bitter and unavailing tears. Just such are the miseries of human life—the results, in very great part, of free action misdirected in the pursuit of pleasure. A parent may ask himself, Is such freedom better than restraint? But if he ventures to think "no," where is he? He finds himself following the absurd advice—

If you would have them safe abroad
Pray keep them safe at home.

Pain, and accident resulting in pain and death, are things the nature of which we may admit to be beyond our power to explain. But at least we can go a little way towards understanding how they come to us—enough to see that they come not out of altogether unfriendly circumstances. But this feeling after some intelligent sympathy with their cause and meaning, which is the first impulse of the religious mind, does not seem to afford any satisfaction to the sceptical.

We may be unfair to Mr. BRADLAUGH. Our own position is one of such cordial agreement with Mr. ARMSTRONG that we may easily fail to obtain an unbiased view of the controversy. It appears to us, however, that after all it was something of a triangular duel that was fought. While Mr. BRADLAUGH set his face against Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. ARMSTRONG set his face against the Problem. But by this arrangement the Problem ought simultaneously to have its revenge on Mr. BRADLAUGH! Our serious belief is that it had. The Everlasting Yea will be too much for him yet.

The late B. P. Gundry, Esq.

MR. BENJAMIN PEARKES GUNDY died at his house in West-street, Bridport, on Sunday, September 22nd, in his fifty-seventh year. He was a member of a family which has for centuries held a conspicuous place in Bridport; and since the death of his elder brother, last year, was head of the well-known firm of Joseph Gundry and Co., in the trade of the town. He had been for twenty years a magistrate of the county of Dorset, had twice been mayor of the borough, and had filled many offices of trust. He was highly respected for his integrity, for his ability and readiness to render service, and for his charitable disposition. In politics he was a Liberal, but the Conservative paper, as well as the Bridport News, paid an ungrudging tribute to his worth. His remains were attended to the sepulchre of his fathers in the parish churchyard by the Corporation, magistrates, &c., and by a large assemblage of persons of all ranks and parties. On Sunday last, the Rev. R. L. Carpenter referred to the loss of one in whom the Unitarian congregation, in common with all the institutions for the welfare of the town, had lost a generous friend. He never married, and was the last of his family to remain among the Nonconformists. The Rev. Hugh "Gundry" was one of the "Two Thousand," having been ejected from the rectory of Maperton, near Bridport, in 1662.

THE TRIALS OF A STATE CHURCH.

DR. E. DE PRESSENE describes the increasing perplexity of the French Minister of Public Worship, M. Bardoux, over the claims of the rival parties in the Reformed Church, in a very effective way. New elements are coming into the problem, making it more and more difficult of solution, and adding to the chances that it will be postponed from time to time, till a new minister comes in, who, of course, will have the right to plead for a year or so to permit him to become acquainted with the matters at issue. M. Bardoux appears almost in the light of a persecuted official. A man of liberal sentiments in the right sense, he desires to do what is just to both parties, and in his attitude of impartiality finds himself swayed first to the one side, then to the other. To-day the orthodox party presents its case in such a light and with so much force that the minister is inclined to accede to its demands at once; but to-morrow the Liberals come, and succeed equally well in convincing him that the contemplated action will do them great injustice. Thus perplexed, his only refuge is in delay; but time in this case has no healing powers. How simple a solution seems to us on this side of the Atlantic! The Gordian knot cannot be untied, but it can be cut; and the moment that it is cut the struggling parties will be free from each other and free from a hurtful bondage—the connection with the State. So long as they draw upon the Treasury of the State, so long must they submit to State control.

In the latest phase of the question the Liberals appear to have the advantage, gained in this indirect way: owing to the loss of the Rhine provinces to France, the Lutheran Church was deprived of a very considerable part of its adherents, and a reorganisation on the plan of the Reformed Church was deemed necessary. It had formerly been governed by a directory, in which representatives of the Church and of the State sat side by side. The Lutherans drew up the constitution they wished, and obtained the consent of the minister to present it to the Senate for ratification as a whole. But in the commission which the Senate appointed to consider it were several friends of the Liberals of the Reformed Church, who reasoned that if the constitution was summarily approved it would open the way to the approval of everything the synod of the Reformed Church might adopt to the detriment of the Liberals. It was decided, therefore, that it must be examined and voted upon article by article, and this plan the Lutherans have accepted with regret. This, however, has roused the orthodox party in the Reformed Church, who have made energetic protests against what they regard as an unwarrantable interference with the liberty of the Lutheran Church, creating a precedent for an infringement of the rights of the Reformed Church. Some modifications of the constitution have been proposed by the commission and accepted by the Lutherans, and the orthodox party saw that they must make a determined fight in the Senate, or be beaten on what they regarded as an important point. It would have been natural for them to have selected some of their own number in the Senate—Baron de Chadband Latour, for example—to conduct their case for them; but they did nothing of the sort, but proceeded to the very unusual and suspicious resource of an alliance with the Ultramontanes. They succeeded in their negotiations, and Count de Richemont, representative of the Ultramontane Bishop of Orleans, appeared as their spokesman, and demanded that the discussion, which involved such important matters, should be deferred until next fall. It is probable that this motion will prevail. Meantime the position in which the orthodox party is placed is not a pleasant one. It is the device of the cunning and unscrupulous politician which it has adopted and not the straightforward policy of men representing a Christian Church. Unhappy Reformed Church of France!—New York Independent.

THE NOTTINGHAM DEBATE. THEISM AND ATHEISM.

"IS IT REASONABLE TO WORSHIP GOD?"

SECOND NIGHT.

THE chair was again taken by Mr. G. B. Rothera. The room was filled to excess, and both debaters were loudly cheered on entering.

After a brief address from the Chairman, who spoke of the high tone and excellent temper of the debate as a healthful sign of the times, the discussion was resumed.

Mr. BRADLAUGH occupied the first half hour, and the following is an abstract of his speech:—If he were meeting an antagonist who strove to take every verbal advantage, he might be tempted to pursue only the same course; but when he found a man speaking with evident earnestness, using language which seems to be the utter abandonment of his cause, he would rather ask him whether some amendment of the language he used might not put his case in a better position. No definition whatever is given by him of the word "God." There was not even the semblance or attempt of it. The only words bearing even the semblance of a definition are "an awful inscrutable somewhat." Now, what is the definition of which Mr. Armstrong says that he is incapable of saying whether or not it is correct? "That God is a self-existent, eternal being, infinite in power and wisdom, and perfect in holiness and goodness, the maker of heaven and earth." Does Mr. Armstrong mean that each division of the definition comes within his answer? Does he mean that in relation to no part of that which is predicated in this definition is he capable of saying whether it is correct or not? Because, if he does, he is answered by his own speech, as a portion of this defines God as being perfect in holiness and goodness, in power and wisdom; and it defines him as eternal in duration, and infinite in his existence; and also defines him as being the creator of the universe. If Mr. Armstrong means that "as a whole, I can't say whether it is correct or not," or if, in defending his position, he means that, having divided the definition in its parts, he cannot say whether it is in any one part correct or not, then he must be reminded that in this debate the onus lies upon him of saying what it is he worships, and what it is he contends it is reasonable for us to worship. If he cannot give us a clear and concise notion of what he worships, and of what he says it is reasonable for us to worship, his case has fallen to the ground. It must be unreasonable to worship that of which you in thought cannot predicate anything in any way, accurately or inaccurately. What is meant by God should be given us in such words that we can clearly and easily identify it. If you cannot even in thought identify God, it is unreasonable—absolutely unreasonable—to talk of worshipping "it." What is "it" you are going to worship? Can you think clearly what it is you are going to worship? If you can think clearly for yourself what it is, tell us in what words you think it. We shall then have an opportunity of testing for ourselves how little or how much clear thought you may have on the subject. If you are obliged to state that it is impossible to put your thoughts in words so clear and so distinct that we may understand the meaning of it as clearly as you do, or that a person of ordinary capacity cannot comprehend the words in which you describe it; if that is impossible, then it is unreasonable to ask us to worship it. (Applause.) It is unreasonable to ask us to worship an unknown quantity—an unrecognisable symbol expressing nothing whatever. If you know what it is you worship—if you think you know what it is you worship—it is your duty to put into words what you think you know. We have had in this debate some pleas put forward which, if they had remained unchallenged, might have been some sort of pleas for the existence of a Deity, but each of those pleas has in turn failed, each in turn has been abandoned. We must have consistency of phraseology. Either the problem is soluble, then the onus is upon you to state it in reasonable terms; or it is insoluble, and then you have abandoned the point you set out to prove, because it must be unreasonable to worship an insoluble proposition. How do you know anything of that

God you ask us to worship? After listening carefully to what has fallen from Mr. Armstrong, he had been unable to glean what he knows of God, or how he knows it. He has said something about a "voice of God," but he has frankly admitted that the voice in question has spoken differently and in contradictory senses in different ages. Mr. Armstrong said that in one hundred years there had been a purification, and an amelioration, and a clearing away; and that that change had been vaster still since one thousand years ago. Now, what God is it that you are to worship? Is it the Jewish God? Is it the Mahometan God? Is it the God of the Trinitarian Christian? Is it one of the gods of the Hindus? Or is it one of the gods of the old Greeks or Italians, and, if so, which of them? And in each case from what source are we to get an accurate definition of either of those gods? Perhaps Mr. Armstrong will say that it is none of these. He will probably decline to have any of these gods fastened upon him as the proper God to worship; but the very fact that there are so many different gods, different with every variety of people, contradictory in their attributes and qualities—the very fact that there is a wide difference in believers in a God makes it but right that we should require that the God we are asked to worship should be accurately defined. Mr. Bradlaugh then quoted from Professor Monier Williams's article in the current number of the Contemporary Review, to show that a definition of God cannot be given that does not originate in the ignorance of man as to the causes of phenomena which are abnormal to him, and which he cannot explain. The wonderful, the extraordinary, the terrific, the mysterious, the mighty, the grand, the furious, the good, the highly beneficent—all these that he did not understand became to him God. He might have understood them on careful investigation had his mind then been capable for the search, but instead of that he attributed them to huge personifications of the Unknown, the word behind which to-day is God, and it is the equivalent for all he observed but did not comprehend, of all that happened of which he knew not the meaning. (Applause.) It was not education but ignorance which gave birth to the so-called idea of a God. And in truth, all forms of worship have arisen from exaggeration and misapplication of what men have seen in their fellow-men and fellow-women. A man found that a big furious man might be pacified and calmed by soothing words; that a big avaricious man might be satisfied and pleased with plenteous gifts; that this one might be compelled to do something by angry words or harsh treatment; and that this one could be won by supplications to comply with his wishes, and what he imagined or observed as to his fellows he applied to the unknown, thinking, no doubt, that that which he had found efficacious in the known experience might also be efficacious in that in which he had no experience. And what did you find? You found the sailor at sea, who did not understand navigation, offering candles to his Deity, or special saint, and promising more offerings of a similar character if the Deity brought him safe into port. It is more reasonable to teach him how to steer than how to worship, and also more reasonable to know something about the science of navigation. That would prove much more serviceable than worship, for when he relied upon candles he ran upon rocks and reefs, but as soon as he understood navigation he could bring his own ship safely into port. Prayer is spoken of by Mr. Armstrong as an act of worship. What does it imply? It implies a belief held on the part of the person who prays that he may be noticed by the being to whom he prays; and it also implies that he is asking that being to do something which he would have left undone but for that prayer. Then does he think that he can influence the person whom he addresses by his rank or by his position? Does he think he can influence his Deity by his emotion? Does he think that as he would win a woman's love so he would gain God by passionate devotion? Does he think that as he would frighten a man so he would influence God through fear? Does he appeal to God's logic or to his pity? Does he appeal to his mercy or to his justice? or does he hope to tell God one thing he could not know without the prayer? We want an answer here clear and thorough from one who says that prayer is a reasonable worship to be offered to God. Something was said last night about a cause being necessarily intelligent. Nothing was said to explain what was meant, nothing was done to further explain the matter. He had seen a hut crushed by an avalanche falling on it as he had been crossing the Alps. Does Mr. Armstrong mean to tell us that the avalanche which crushed the hut was intelligent, or that it had an intelligent wielder? If the avalanche is intelligent, why does he think so? If the avalanche has an intelligent wielder, please explain the goodness of that intelligent wielder who dashes the avalanche on the cottage. If you tell us that it is a mystery which you cannot explain, it is unreasonable to ask me to worship such a mystery, and as long as you call it a mystery, and treat it as that which you cannot explain, so long you have no right to ask us to adore it. There was a time when man worshipped the lightning and thunder, and looked upon them as Deity. But now he has grown wiser, and, having investigated the subject, instead of worshipping the lightning as a Deity he erects lightning conductors and electric wires, and chains the lightning and thunder God: knowledge is more potent than prayer. (Applause.) As long as they were worshipped science could do nothing, but now we see to what uses electricity has been brought. When they knew that the lightning conductor was more powerful than the God they worshipped, then science was recognised the mighty master and ruler, instead of ignorant faith. Mr. Bradlaugh concluded as follows:—Delusions on religious matters are open to the remark that of all hallucinations of the senses—as Dr. H. Maudsley shows in the Fortnightly Review—of all hallucinations of the senses those on religious matters only keep current with the religious teachings of the day. Sight, touch, smell, hearing, feeling—all are the subject of illusion, as is shown over and over again. Any man bringing as evidence to us the report of experience which is only of an abnormal character is bound to submit it to a test which is something beyond in severity that which we should apply to normal events. The more abnormal it is the more particularity in detail do I wish, in order to examine it, so that I may be able to identify it, and the more curious the statement the more carefully do I wish to test it. Loose words in theology will not do, and here I submit that at present we stand with, at any rate on one side, nothing whatever affirmed against me. I gathered last night—I hope incorrectly—I gathered last night—I hope the words were spoken incautiously—that Mr. Armstrong held it to be natural that a man should have to struggle against wrong, vice, and folly for the purpose of bringing out the higher qualities, and that it was alleged that it was to that struggle we were indebted for our virtue. If that were a real thought on the part of Mr. Armstrong, it is but a sorry encouragement to any attempts at reformation and civilisation. Why strive to remove misery and wrong if the struggle against them is conducive to virtue? It would take a long time to bring about any ameliorating change in society if such doctrine were widely held. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, who was applauded on rising, after some introductory remarks, said that the doctrine of Atheism had indeed the very ablest defender that its friends could wish; and if what he says is not enough to demolish Theism, then we may be sure that Theism cannot be demolished. Mr. Bradlaugh either did not listen to, or did not understand, what he endeavoured to put in plainest words about the function of that voice of God which we call conscience. Observe, that while in different climes and ages, aye, in the same man at different times, the conceptions of the particular deeds that come under the head of right differ; the idea of rightness itself, of rectitude, is always and invariably the same from its first faint glimmer in the savage, little removed comparatively from the lower animal, from which he is said to be developed, to the season of its clear shining, luminous and glorious, in hero, prophet, martyr, saint—in Elizabeth Fry, in Mary Carpenter, in Florence Nightingale. To speak metaphysically, the abstract subjective idea of right is the same and one, but our ideas of the concrete and objective right develop and progress ever towards a purer and more beautiful ideal. We have by our own powers to satisfy ourselves as best we can what is right. But when we have made up our minds, the voice of God sounds clear as a bell upon the soul and bids us do it. The latter part of the first night's debate turned on the mystery of evil. But Mr. Bradlaugh did not then venture to allege the possibility of a world in which noble character could be developed without the contact with suffering and pain. He said he was not called upon to make a world. Happily not; but at any rate he should not question the excellence of the world in which he lives unless he can at least conceive a better; and I say that where evil had never been, or what we call evil, manliness, bravery, generosity, sympathy, tenderness could never be. A world without temptation would be a world without virtue. A world all pleasurable would be a world without goodness, and even the pleasurable itself would cease by sheer monotony to give any pleasure at all. A world not developed out of the conflict of good and evil, or joy and pain, would necessarily be an absolutely neutral world, without emotion of any sort. Unless the whole tint is to be neutral, you must have light and shade; and the only test by which to judge whether the power controlling the world is good or evil—God or Devil, as Mr. Bradlaugh says—is to note whether light or darkness preponderates; and not only that, but whether the movement, the tendency, the development, the drift of things is towards the gradual swallowing up of darkness by the light, or light by darkness; whether freedom, happiness, virtue are in the procession of the ages losing their ground, or slowly, surely winning ever fresh accession. If we are to have a final predominance of goodness—nay, even of happiness, if you make that the highest good—it can only be by these things winning their way by degrees out of the evil which is their shadow. After giving some illustrations of faith and trust in the goodness of God in the darkest experiences of life, Mr. Armstrong continued as follows:—To the Atheist the world's sorrow must, indeed, be insupportable. If he be sincere and have a heart, I do not know how he can ever eat and drink and make merry, still less how he can make a jest and raise a titter in the very same speech in which he dwells with all the skill of practised eloquence upon that woe. If I were an Atheist I hardly think I could ever throw off the darkness of this shadow. But, believing in God, whom I personally know, and know as full of love, I am constrained to trust that though this evil be a mystery the full significance of which I cannot understand, and though relatively to the little sum of things here and now it seem great, yet that relatively to the whole plan and sum of the universe it is very small, and that that poor child, born of sin and shame, who knew no better than to steal the loaf, shall one day wear a diadem of celestial glory, and be by no means least in the Kingdom of Heaven. And when I see the Atheist smiling, laughing, having apparently a light heart in him, I am bound to suppose that he too, somehow, trusts that goodness and happiness are going to win in the end—that is, that goodness is the ultimately overruling power. And if he believes that, he believes in the power which men call God. Now, Mr. Bradlaugh has castigated me with some severity for not obliging him with definitions. It is impossible, he says, to be too precise in the use of words, and I agree with him. But by definitions I cannot even make the simplest words in the English language more plain to you. He himself has given us some specimens of definitions which I do not think have made things much clearer than they were before. There are three words of importance in the title of this debate, and I will try, since Mr. Bradlaugh has experienced difficulty in understanding me, whether I can tell him more distinctly what I mean by them. Those three words are “reasonable,” “worship,” “God.” When I say it is reasonable to do a thing, I do not mean that I can demonstrate to you with the precision of mathematics that every proposition, the truth of which is assumed in that act, is true; but I do mean that the propositions, on the assumption of which the act proceeds, are at least sufficiently probable to win the verdict of an unbiased judgment, and that the act itself is likely to be found to be a good. Mr. Bradlaugh himself has defined “worship” as including “prayer, praise, sacrifice, offerings, solemn services, adoration, and personal prostration.” If Mr. Bradlaugh will kindly occupy his next fifteen minutes by defining to me exactly what he means by each of those terms, I may be better able to tell him whether I include them all in worship, and whether he has left anything out. But at present I do not find that any one of them is simpler or more comprehensible than the term worship, while “prayer, praise, sacrifice, and offerings” each might mean at least two very different things; “solemn services” is hopelessly vague; “adoration,” as I understand it, is included in some of the others; and before we know what “personal prostration” means, we must define a “person”—no easy matter—and then explain what we mean by the “prostration” of that person. Meanwhile, I have described, at the very outset, that energy of my soul which I call worship—namely, that in which I address myself to God as to one immeasurably surpassing me in goodness, in wisdom, in power, in love. I don't think this is plainer than the good old Saxon word “worship;” I think that word conveys a pretty clear meaning to most men. God: You ask me to define God, and you say I have not in any way done so. You quote the metaphysical definition of Flint, and want me to enter into metaphysics. What do you mean by defining? Do you mean to draw a circle round God, so as to separate him from all else? If you do, I reply, I can't, because as far as I can see, or my imagination can extend, I discern no boundaries to God. But if you mean to ask simply what I mean by God, I mean—and I said this again and again last night—the source of the command that comes to me to do right, to abjure wrong; the source of the peace that comes to me even in pain, when I have done right, and of the remorse that comes to me even in prosperity when I have done ill. I mean also the source—which I believe to be identical—of the wondrous sense of a divine presence which seizes me in the midst of Nature's sublimest scenes—aye, and even of Nature's awful catastrophes. I mean also the source of the moral and spiritual strength that comes to me in response to the worship which my soul pours forth; and if you want to know what I mean by my soul, I mean myself. What else besides the source of these things God may be, I cannot tell you. It is only so, in his relation to me, that I directly know him. Beyond that he is the subject of philosophy, but not of immediate knowledge. I believe him to be very much more; but that does not affect the reasonableness of worshipping him, and that is the subject of our debate. So that I cannot define God in the way I can define Nottingham, or Europe, or the earth. I cannot tell how much is included in his being, how much, if any, is excluded. I can tell you what he is to me, in relation to me, and that is the only way in which any entity can be defined, and I can tell you what other men testify by word, by deed, by martyrdom, he is to them. Beyond that I have no instruments by which to measure, and therefore I take up no pen with which to write down the measurements, or define. But Mr. Bradlaugh says if we cannot exactly define an object we are incapable of exact thought or belief concerning it. Did Mr. Bradlaugh do algebra at school? That most exact and prosaic science consists largely in reasoning about unknown quantities—that is, about some x or y , of which you only know that it has some one or perhaps two definite relations to certain other things. You don't know what x or y is in itself, only some function by which it is related to a and b and c . From that relation you reason, and sometimes from it you get by subtle processes to infer a vast deal more, and it will perhaps prove just from that relation that x must be such and such a number, or that it must be infinite. Does Mr. Bradlaugh say we can have no exact thought about the x in the algebraic equation before we have worked out the whole sum? Yes; we know it in its relations, or some of them. Yet the very essence of algebra is that x is undefined. The human soul is the a , b , or c , the well known, the familiar. God is the x , related wondrously thereto, yet none has ever yet worked out that sum. The supreme philosophers, who here are school-boys indeed, have only displayed workings on their slates which, to use again mathematical language, show that x approaches towards a limit which is equal to infinity. But Mr. Bradlaugh says there should be no belief in that which we cannot define. Now, I challenge Mr. Bradlaugh in all respect and sincerity to define himself. If he declines or fails, I will not say we must cease to believe in Mr. Bradlaugh, but that is the necessary inference from his maxims. By “cause” I mean—and you mean, if you will search your thought—the initiating power, that which begins to produce an effect. Now, my mind is so constituted that to speak to me of a power which initiates effects, yet is not conscious, intelligent, is sheer nonsense; therefore, I hold the power which displays itself as one in the uniformity of the laws of nature, and lies behind all phenomena—the growth of the grass, the rush of the cataract, the breath of the air, the stately sailing of the stars through their geometric paths, to be intelligent, conscious, to do it all by distinct purpose, and I can in no way otherwise conceive. I conceive this source of the geometric motion of all the spheres and of the minutest dance of protoplasm in the nettle's sting as always, everywhere, of purpose producing these effects. And the worship which I give God as I know him in relationship to me is refined and glorified by the conception which thus dawns on me of his being. And in the words of François Marie Arouet Voltaire, I commune thus with myself: “Where,” says he, “is the eternal geometrician? Is he in one place, or in all places without occupying space? I know not. Has he arranged all things of his own substance? I know not. Is he immense without quantity and without quality? I know not. All I know is, that we must adore him and be just.” (Loud applause.)

Mr. BRADLAUGH: I have been told to-night that the idea of righteousness and rectitude has always been one and the same amongst all human beings, from the savage to the highest intellect. If telling me so is evidence of it, then, of course, I must be content. But, unfortunately, I am not content, but say that the evidence is all the other way. I have read carefully Wake's latest book on the Evolution of Morality, tracing out the growth of notions of morality amongst savages. I have read Tylor, Broca, Lubbock, Agassiz, Giddon, Pritchard, Lawrence, and I think I am familiar with the best of ancient and modern authors on the subject; and I say it is absolutely contrary to the fact that the notions of morality are, and always have been, identical from the lowest savage to the highest intellect. It is absolutely contrary to the fact that one and the same idea of right always and everywhere prevails. It is not a question of my opinion; it is a question of the conclusive evidence laboriously collected on the subject, and I am sorry to have to put it in that plain and distinct way. Mr. Armstrong, in his speech, pointed out what he terms an intelligent purpose. It may be for an intelligent purpose that millions of the Chinese should die of starvation, and actually eat one another for want of food; but if it is, I cannot understand the goodness of the intelligent purposer. You cannot take one illustration and say that it is the work of an intelligent person, and then take another and say that it is not. If it is the intelligence of God displayed in one case, it must be in another, unless Mr. Armstrong contends that there are a number of Gods, amongst which number there must be a good many devils. There are many things of a similar kind I could point out, and ask the same question with regard to; where is the intelligence of God as displayed in permitting the Bulgarian atrocities, the Russo-Turkish war, the Greek insurrection—or in the world nearer home, its crime, misery, and want? Then there was an astounding assumption that freedom, happiness, and virtue, through the power of God, were continually winning their way. How is it that an intelligent and omnipotent God does not look after them more, and see that they overcome opposition a little faster than they have done? Mr. Armstrong has been trying to put himself in the Atheist's place, but he has not been very successful. The Atheist does not think that all the evil which exists in this world is without remedy; he does not think that there is no possible redemption from sorrow, or that there is no salvation from misery. He thinks and believes that the knowledge of to-day a little, and to-morrow more, and the greater knowledge of the day that will yet come, will help to redeem, will help to rescue the inhabitants of this world from their miserable position; and further, that this is not to be in some world that is to come, but in the world of the present, in which the salvation is self-worked out. The Atheist will not make promises of something in the future as a compensation for the present miseries of man. Instead of saying that for prayers and worship the poor woman or man will have the bread of life in future, he tries to give her and him the strength to win bread here to sustain and preserve life as long as it is possible to do so. The diadems, too—which our friend has to offer to the poor—which are to be worn in heaven by those who have had no clothes here—possess no attraction to the Atheist; therefore he does not offer them, but, instead, tries to develop such self-reliant effort as may clothe and feed those who are naked and hungry while they are here. He directs his efforts towards human happiness in the present, and believes that in the future humanity must be triumphant over misery, want, and wrong. A diadem of celestial glory may or may not be a very good thing; of that I do not look upon myself as a judge, so long as I have no belief in its possibility. That there is much misery and suffering in the world I know, and it rests with Mr. Armstrong to prove whether it is better to try and remedy it here or to worship its author in the doubtful endeavour to obtain as recompense a crown of celestial glory. But which God is it that we are to worship? Is it the Mahometan God, or the Jewish God? Is it one of the Gods of the Hindus? Is it the Christian's God? If so, which sect of Christians? You must not use phrases which mean different things in different mouths. We have worship defined as "the energy of my soul." Well, but you have not explained your soul. Why do you call it soul? Where is its place in your body? Is there anything about soul you can notice so as to enable me to know anything at all about it? Will you take your definition of soul from Voltaire, whom you have quoted against me? When you reply, will you tell us what Voltaire, Professor Newman, Paine, or Martineau say upon the subject of God, and in which of their writings you will find that which all the others would accept as a definition? You must remember the Theist of Paine's time is not the Theist of to-day, and I want you to tell us what are the specific opinions of each of those you have quoted—of Francis William Newman, of John Henry Newman, of Martineau, of Thomas Paine, of Voltaire—as to the questions I have asked. Which of the Gods is it that I am to understand Mr. Armstrong as defending and asking me to worship? (Loud applause.)

MR. ARMSTRONG: We have been told by Mr. Bradlaugh what the Atheist will do; how he will give the bread of this life to the hungry child; the Theist will do the same. The Theist will—but no, I will not institute these comparisons; we are each, I feel sure, striving to do our best. Mr. Bradlaugh says it is unreasonable to worship an insoluble proposition. A proposition is a grammatical term signifying a statement, and I am not aware that I asked anyone to worship a statement or proposition at all. I have called upon you to worship God. He says I did not separate the lower instincts from the higher mental qualities in man. I do not say I did. But I did separate the lower instincts from the voice of God in conscience. I said that it was entirely distinct from the lower instincts in man. I said that the voice had a right to command and rule these lower instincts. He asks me which God it is that I am preaching. I will tell you what God I ask you to worship—the best that you can conceive, whichever it is. I want you all to worship the best that you can conceive. If the Hindu's idea is the best he can conceive, let him, by all means, worship it. If the Jew's God is the best he can imagine, let him pay homage to it. If the Christian's idea of God is the highest he can conceive, let him be true to it and worship it, and it will make him a nobler man. It is not mere names which signify in a matter of this kind. Though each sect may give him different names, it is still the same God. Mr. Bradlaugh wants to know which of them all I uphold as God; which of the different types I acknowledge, or ask you to acknowledge. Is it the God of Martineau, of Newman, of Parker, or of whom else? I say it is that which is common among them all—namely, the conception of goodness and excellence which you will find in every one of their definitions. It is that God which they all recognise, and concerning which they only go wrong when they begin to try and define it metaphysically. Mr. Bradlaugh wants me to define God; further than I have done so, I cannot. In the words of the Athanasian Creed an attempt is made to define the undefinable. The Athanasian Creed tries to explain the whole of that which overrules the universe instead of describing simply that which is in relationship to you. I have always been under the supposition that that was a practice of the theologian which had greatly retarded the progress of the world. Mr. Bradlaugh says that prayer implies a hope of inducing God to do what he would not do without it. For my part, I doubt whether some things that have been called prayers—such as the prayers for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, for wet weather, and for fine weather—have very much influenced the divine counsels. But what do I mean by prayer? As I have said before, the addressing of my soul to this power which I feel and recognise above me; and the law of the answer of prayer—and it is as much a law as any law of nature—is, that they who do thus energise themselves towards God become thereby more susceptible to the energising of God towards them. The law is that he who energises or addresses himself towards God, conscientiously, reverently, and of set purpose, thereby sets in motion a law by which he becomes more susceptible to God's addressing of himself to him, and so he gains to himself the strength, moral and spiritual, which we find in prayer. I have striven to the best of my power to be precise and clear in my words. It is true I have not dealt with the matter from a platform purely metaphysical. I am a positivist in most things, understanding by a positivist one who founds his philosophy on observed phenomena. I have passed out of the stage in which men believe that theological theories will solve all the problems of the universe. I have passed out of the stage in which Mr. Bradlaugh now is, in which metaphysics are looked upon as the best ground of reasoning we can have. I have passed into the stage in which positive thought, the recognition of phenomena, is recognised as the best starting point we can have from which to get at the truth. Auguste Comte traces the progress of the thought of the world, and of the individual, from the theological stage to the metaphysical stage, and from that to the positive stage. I invite Mr. Bradlaugh to look at things from that stage, and to see whether he cannot make his thoughts clearer by the use of the positive method than by the use of the metaphysical. (Loud applause.)

MR. BRADLAUGH: The curious thing is that I have never used the word metaphysics, and I have offered to affirm no proposition that does not relate to phenomena. I am astounded to hear that I am a metaphysician. Is it because I only used language which I can make clear that my opponent gave me that title? It is because he does not use language that is related to phenomena that he is obliged to commend his Theism by speaking of it as a problem which is insoluble. I have not done anything, as far as my case is concerned, except use language relating to phenomena. What God is it that we are to worship? Oh, the God it is reasonable to worship is the best we can conceive; but no conception has yet been put before us. You have been told a great deal about stars, but the more important facts and arguments still remain unchallenged. Now, I am asked, does belief in God hinder philanthropy? Yes; when it is held as those do hold it in some parts of the world who think that God has designed, in his thought and intelligence, and for good purposes, that a famine should take place, such as the one in China. There are at least people among the Mahometans and the Hindus whose virtue has been clearly shown to have suffered much more from religion than from civilisation. The case put as to prayer is one which I think has something peculiar about it. We are told first of the law of prayer, which is said to be as much a law of nature as any other law. Well, now, by law of nature I only mean observed order of happening. Law of nature is order of sequence or concurrence, the observed order of phenomena. What observed order of phenomena is there in the order of prayer? When the prayer prays "himself he sets a law in motion." Is this so? We are told that the prayer for the recovery of the Prince of Wales did not much tend to alter the divine counsel. Mr. Armstrong did not tell you how he knew that. His own admission here proves that prayer is sometimes offered in vain, taking the observed order of its phenomena. He spoke of the holy discontent in pious men which set them to seek to remedy evil. Holy discontent against the state of things which God in his intelligent purpose has caused! Then the holy discontent is dissatisfaction with God's doings. How can you worship the God with whom you are dissatisfied? But what is the truth of the matter? In the early ages of the world man saw the river angry, and prayed to the river-god; but science has dispelled the river-god, and has substituted for prayer weirs, locks, dykes, levels, and flood-gates. You see the same thing over the face of nature wherever you go. What you have found is this: that in the early ages of the world gods were frightful, gods were monstrous, gods were numerous, because ignorance predominated in the minds of men. The things they came in contact with were not understood, and no investigation then took place; men worshipped. But gradually men learned; first dimly, then more clearly, and god after god has been demolished as science has grown. The best attempt at conception of God is always the last conception of him, and this because God has to give way to science. The best conception of God is in substituting humanity for deity, the getting rid of, and turning away from, the whole of those conceptions and fancies which men called God in the past, and which they have ceased to call God now. Mr. Armstrong thought that it was because men had given different names to God that I tried to embarrass him by bidding him choose between them. It was not so. It is the different characteristics, and not the different names, that I pointed out as a difficulty. We have gods of peace, gods of war, gods of love, a god of this people, or of that tribe, a god of the Christians, a god of misery, of terror, of beneficence—these are all different suppositions held by men of the gods they have created. It has well been said that the gods have not created the men, but the men have created the gods, and you can see the marks of human handicraft in each divine lineament. I cannot hope, pleading here to-night, to make many converts. I can and do hope that all of you will believe that the subject treated wants examination far beyond the limits of this short debate. I have a very good hope indeed, and really believe that some good has been done, when it can be shown that two men of strong opinions, and earnest in their expressions, can come together without one disrespectful word to each other, or want of respect in any way; without any want of due courtesy to the other; and with a great desire to separate the truth and the falsehood. If there has been unwittingly anything disrespectful on my part, I am sorry for it. I have to thank Mr. Armstrong for coming forward in the manner in which he has done, and I can only ask all to use their services in making the spread of virtue, truth, and justice easier than it has been. I am aware that I have nominally a vast majority against me, but I do not fear on that ground, and still shall continue to point out falsehood wherever I may find it. At any rate, the right of speech is all I ask, and that you have conceded. I have only an earnest endeavour to find out as much as I can that will be useful to my fellows, and to tell them as truly as I can how much I grasp. It is for you—with the great harvest of the unreaped before you—who can do more than I, to gather and show what you have gathered; it is for you who have more truth to tell it more efficiently; and when you answer me I put it to you that so far as the world has redeemed itself at all, it has only redeemed itself by shaking off in turn the Theistic religions which have grown and decayed. So far, it seems to be a real and solid redemption. When religion was supreme through the ignorance of men, the people were low down indeed, and a few devoted men had to grapple with the hereafter theory and all the content with present wrong which the belief in it maintained. Take a few hundred years ago, when there was little or no scepticism in the world. Only a very few—the mass unable and too weak to doubt or endure doubt. Look at the state of things then, and look at it now. Could a discussion like this have taken place then? No. But it can since the printing-press has helped us; it can since the right of speech has been in good part won. Two hundred years ago it could not have been. Two hundred years ago I could not have got the mass of people together to listen as you have listened last night and to-night, and had not men treated your religion as I treat it, we should not have the right of meeting even now. If you want to convince men like myself, hear us; answer us if you can—say what you have to say without making it more bitter than we can bear. We must believe it if it is reasonable, and if not we must reject it. So long as there is any wrong to redeem we shall try to redeem it ourselves. We may be wrong in this, but at least we do our part. I do not mean that in the same ranks as my friend there are not men as sincere and as earnest, men as devoted, men as human-redemption seeking as myself, but I, or the best of those for whom I plead, urge that their humanity is not the outcome of their theology. Then their experience of right, their hope of life, and their experience of truth, rest entirely on what they do here. And I will ask you this: Do you not think it is quite possible, as Lessing says, that he who thinks he grasps the whole truth may not even grasp it at all? Like the one deceived by the juggler's trick, he may think he holds something in his hand, but when it is opened it is empty. Take the truth as you can—not from me, not from him, not from any one man. There is none of the bad which is all bad, none of the good all good, none of the truth all true; it is for you to select, to weigh, to test for yourselves. Many of us stumble in trying to carry the torch in dark places in the search for truth, but even in our trembling steps the sparks we scatter may enable some to find the grains of truth we miss ourselves. (Loud and prolonged applause.)
